After a decade of slow but steady progress in returning America's permanent underclass, the nation's poverty rate jumped dramatically between 1979 and 1982, according to the U.S. Census Bureau. During that period, the poverty rate rose from 11.7 percent (26 million poor people) to 15 percent (34 million). Some of the blame belongs to the recession, but analysts also assign part to administration policies that have undermined the working poor.

Under guise of rendering "fat" from social programs, Reagan reversed the trend toward helping those on poverty's borderline. Many have no private or public health insurance and some report they have been denied medical or dental care because they could not pay for it. And this for "savings" that have been trivial when measured against the $200 billion federal deficits that the administration has piled up from tax cuts and increased military spending.

The nation is saving a few pennies now—and buying long-range problems. Many who cannot afford food, medical attention or pay their rent will, sooner or later, wind up on the streets, on the welfare rolls or in hospitals with serious maladies. Those costs will be borne by taxpayers.

And the growing frustration created among those who see no way out of their poverty could cost us even more in social alienation, potentially another setback after years of progress in that area. With the cutbacks, the government has realized only a 9.3 percent savings in its monthly welfare outlays, while running up long-term bills that are almost certain to be far costlier.

[From the Washington Post, Saturday, Apr. 7, 1984]

SINK OR SWIM

Here's a surprise. It turns out that when you take money away from poor people they are worse off. Just like rich people. Except that the poor, not having had much to begin with, tend to be driven to doing things like standing in food lines, bargaining for discarded produce at grocery stores, outfitting their kids at the thrift shop, pawning their belongings and collecting discarded bottles and cans. They neglect medical care for their children—and are often refused care because they can't pay. And, of course, they fall into debt if they're lucky enough to find anyone who will extend them credit.

These findings come from two new studies of the Reagan administration's policy of throwing most working welfare recipients off the rolls. The sink-or-swim philosophy guiding this policy held that if these families were put to the test, they would be able to keep their heads above water on their own. The studies—by the General Accounting Office and the Center for the Study of Social Policy—confirm that most of the heads are still visible out there, but their owners are having to paddle hard to stay afloat.

Both studies found that most of the families had not returned to welfare in the year following their removal from the rolls. This is not surprising, since working poor families generally stay on welfare for less than a year, and most don't return. Still, the return rates were somewhat lower than usual in most sites. The GAO found that this was not because the families were better off as a result of the changes but simply because the tighter rules had made it harder to qualify for welfare aid.

Both studies found that these welfare mothers—almost all the families affected were headed by women with children—were eager to work. Relatively few were able to find additional hours of work, and some lost jobs or suffered pay cuts. All the same, many were able to increase their earnings in the low-paying service or clerical jobs they typically held. But these earnings increases were far from adequate to make up for the losses in welfare aid—not to mention medical and food aid—so that many of the families fell into poverty. Others, already poor, became poorer. For example, in Memphis 86 percent of these families are now in poverty, in Dallas 75 percent, in New York 46 percent.

Finally the good news. The GAO estimates that the cutbacks saved the government about $93 million a month. Alas, those savings, modest as they were in federal budget terms, seem to be disappearing—for reasons the GAO can't explain. Still, think of the satisfaction these struggling mothers must feel knowing that their efforts have helped—however slightly—to lighten the tax burden on the wealthiest families in the country.●

NEW YORK STATE ASSEMBLY URGES REPEAL OF TAXATION OF MUNICIPAL BONDS UNDER SOCIAL SECURITY

HON. MARIO BIAGGI

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, May 2, 1984

● Mr. BIAGGI. Mr. Speaker, support continues to grow against section 121 of the Social Security Act which allows for the income from tax-free municipal bonds to be taxed as part of income under social security.

I believe that inclusion of this particular provision was ill-considered for it strikes at the heart of the intent of the program—which is to encourage the purchase of these bonds based upon their tax-free status. The revenues generated by the sale of these bonds are critical to municipalities which rely upon them in order to improve services in local communities.

Legislation has been introduced in the House, H.R. 3028, which I have cosponsored, that repeals this provision. This legislation has been the subject of congressional hearings in the Senate where companion legislation has been introduced. For the benefit of my colleagues, I wish to insert into the RECORD a copy of a resolution recently adopted by the New York State Assembly which underscores my concern in this matter. I direct my colleagues' attention to this resolution and once again call for speedy action on H.R. 3028 so that we reverse this back-door attempt to drain the retirement incomes of our senior citizens.

The material follows:

ASSEMBLY OF STATE OF NEW YORK,
Albany, NY, April 2, 1984.

DEAR MARIO: I urge the repeal of Section 121 of the Social Security Law.

The enclosed Resolution on this subject, introduced by myself in the Assembly and in the Senate by Senator Marchi, was unanimously adopted in both houses.

I would appreciate you responding to this Resolution.

Sincerely,

IVAN C. LAFAYETTE,
Member of Assembly.

RESOLUTION

Whereas Congress amended the Social Security laws in 1983 to require the taxing of Social Security Benefits for recipients whose adjusted gross annual income reaches a threshold of $25,000 for a single taxpayer or $32,000 for a married couple; and

Whereas the formula for calculating combined income will now be computed by including adjusted gross (taxable) income plus one-half of his or her social security benefits; and

Whereas in addition to the taxing of Social Security Benefits, tax exempt municipal bond interest must also be added as part of any tax calculations; and

Whereas the Federal government is projecting an increased income of 27.5 billion dollars over the next 5 years; and

Whereas eight percent, (two billion dollars) of the expected federal revenue will come from the senior citizens of New York State; and

Whereas financial writer Sylvia Porter explains that "Social Security recipients will be the only taxpayers required to include income from municipal bonds when computing income tax liability"; and

Whereas the burden of increased taxes is falling on senior citizens, who are on fixed incomes and have made specific plans for retirement; and

Whereas to illustrate this point, a social security recipient's $20,000 taxable income plus $5,000 interest from municipal bonds will total $25,000, the minimum amount that will cause a taxpayer to pay tax on his or her social security; and

Whereas in this case the taxpayer will suffer a $602 tax burden; and

Whereas this would result in an effective tax rate of 12.04 percent on those bonds; and

Whereas a social security recipient with zero dollars in taxable income and $100,000 interest from municipal bonds, will pay only $238, or one quarter of one percent; and

Whereas these illustrations clearly show that tax exempt income will cause a higher tax liability on social security income; and

Whereas as a result, tax exempt income will thus become identified with higher taxes; and

Whereas revenues from tax free municipal bond sales are used by municipalities for the betterment of our communities; and

Whereas the interest on tax free municipal bonds is lower than many other investments, but are purchased for their tax free advantage; and

Whereas according to securities experts, the new laws will have a chilling effect on the State, its subdivisions, authorities, special districts, and population and on the purchase of these tax exempt and formerly non-reportable forms of income; and

Whereas at a hearing held by Senator Alfonse D'Amato, Jim Lebenthal, Chairman of the Board of Lebenthal and Co., Inc., testified "tax exemption is part of the rate the investor bargained for"; and

Whereas allowing interest from tax free municipal bonds to be figured into combined taxable income is an indirect tax on the purchase of municipal bonds; and

Whereas Prudential-Bache Securities, Inc., has warned that the tax will make it difficult to float the amount of bonds necessary for smooth state administration; and

Whereas a lower demand for tax free municipal bonds will result in the interest rate of these bonds to rise perhaps at least one-half percent; and

Whereas New York State and its subdivisions floated $30 billion in tax free bonds during the fiscal year ending 1982; and

Whereas a one-half percent rise in interest rates on $30 billion of tax free municipal bonds will cost New York State and its subdivisions 150 million dollars a year; and

Whereas the amount of debt incurred in New York State rises annually; and

Whereas the loss of scores of millions of dollars in revenues derived from tax free municipal bonds would have a devastating impact on cities, towns, villages and special districts; and

Whereas this impact would increase the inflation rate of New York State; and

Whereas the Supreme Court ruled in McCullock v. Maryland (1819) that the power to tax is the power to destroy; and

Whereas taxation of the exempt municipal bonds would be the first step in destroying the states ability to issue low interest debt; and

Whereas although many have questioned the validity in a constitutional sense of the new measures, we will leave the courts to make such constitutional determinations; and

Whereas this new federal tax burden is a repugnant interference into the economy of New York State; and

Whereas the Legislature of New York State has voiced bi-partisan objection to this issue by the Senate passing a bill to uncouple with the federal government for the purposes of taxing social security and tax free municipal bonds income; and

Whereas the Assembly is expected to follow suit promptly by passing one of four uncoupling bills presently being considered by the Assembly; and

Whereas Senator Alfonse D'Amato and Representative Major R. Owens have introduced legislation (S. 1113/H.R. 3028) to repeal Section 121 of the Social Security law. Now, therefore, be it

Resolved, That the United States House of Representatives and the Senate recognize the harsh and unnecessary burden that has been placed on the citizens of New York State and other taxpayers across the country; and be it further

Resolved, That Congress act quickly to rectify this horrible situation by passing the D'Amato/Owens bill; and be it further

Resolved, That a copy of this Resolution, suitably engrossed, be submitted to the President of the United States and the New York delegation of the United States House of Representatives and the Senate.●

A TRIBUTE TO MRS. LUCY PETREE

HON. EARL HUTTO

OF FLORIDA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, May 2, 1984

● Mr. HUTTO. Mr. Speaker, I rise today to honor a great lady in the community of Escambia County, Fla., Mrs. Lucy Petree. She is a pioneer in the field of education for handicapped children.

Mrs. Petree found herself a widow in 1946 when her husband, Eugene, was killed in an automobile accident. In 1947, as a memorial to her husband, she began Escambia County's first school for mentally and physically handicapped children and dedicated it to her husband.

Originally, the school was in Mrs. Petree's garage. Later, with the help of many volunteers, she had a one-story building built behind her home. As an outgrowth of the school, the first public school kindergarten class for mentally retarded children was started and the Association for Retarded Children (ARC) was created in Escambia County. Today, the ARC consists of an infant and preschool program, the Pollak Training Center and Rehabilitation Workshop, a very active recreation program, the men's group home, and the residential training center for women.

In 1956, Mrs. Petree was chosen the outstanding career woman of the year. Among her many other civic achievements, she founded the crippled children's home in Pensacola.

She has contributed so much to the handicapped child and also to the handicapped adult in her work. Mrs. Petree is a most enthusiastic supporter of education and employment opportunities for those who are physically and mentally less fortunate. She is a tremendously compassionate humanitarian.

It is indeed a pleasure to pay a special tribute to this extraordinary lady who has spent years working to make life fuller and richer for the handicapped.●

THE 10TH ANNIVERSARY OF ST. MARK SENIOR CITIZENS

HON. GARY L. ACKERMAN

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, May 2, 1984

● Mr. ACKERMAN. Mr. Speaker, I would like to bring the 10th anniversary of the St. Mark Senior Citizens, Inc., of East Elmhurst, NY, to the attention of the Congress. This festive occasion will be celebrated on Saturday afternoon, May 5.

St. Mark Senior Citizens was founded in 1974 with the guidance and assistance of the then-pastor of St. Mark's African Methodist Episcopal Church, the Reverend William Faush. Over the past 10 years, the senior citizens group has been involved in many noteworthy activities that enhance the quality of life in the East Elmhurst and Corona communities of Queens County, NY. The center's most important service is to provide lunches to thousands of senior citizens each year, at the church in East Elmhurst, at a satellite program at the Elmcor Senior Citizens Center in Corona, and through delivery to the homebound elderly in the community.

But, Mr. Speaker, the activities of the St. Mark Senior Citizens go far beyond nutrition. The center is also a major recreational facility for the senior members of the north Queens community. The center provides a conducive atmosphere for socializing, offers an arts-and-crafts program, and sponsors frequent trips and outings around New York and other States.

I am proud to inform my colleagues in the Congress that the group has recently embarked on a new project which will greatly enrich the community. On Saturday, April 21, the St. Mark Senior Citizens, Inc., broke ground for its new building, which will allow this fine organization to expand its activities and better serve the senior citizens of northern Queens County.

Mr. Speaker, the St. Mark Senior Citizens helps its community and membership maintain a vibrant and healthy environment, and sets an example for other organizations to emulate. I ask that the Members of the Congress of the United States join me in congratulating St. Mark Senior Citizens, Inc.; Barbara Wingate, executive director; Stanley Leach, chairman of the board; the Reverend Terrence Carl Hensford, pastor of St. Mark's Church; the Reverend William Faush, former pastor of St. Mark's; the entire board of directors of St. Mark Senior Citizens, Inc., and the many individuals who are served by this fine organization.●

SISTER ROSE THERING TESTIFIES FOR MOVING THE U.S. EMBASSY IN ISRAEL TO JERUSALEM

HON. TOM LANTOS

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, May 2, 1984

● Mr. LANTOS. Mr. Speaker, yesterday morning the Europe and Middle East Subcommittee and the International Operations Subcommittee of the Foreign Affairs Committee held historic joint hearings on the bill to move the U.S. Embassy in Israel from Tel Aviv to Jerusalem, which I introduced with my friend from New York, Congressman BEN GILMAN.

One of the outstanding witnesses at this hearing was Sister Rose Thering, professor at Seton Hall University; board member of the National Coalition of American Nuns; and vice president of the American-Israel Friendship League.

Sister Rose typifies the kind of intelligent, thoughtful support that our legislation to move the U.S. Embassy in Israel to Jerusalem has received from Roman Catholics and other groups throughout the United States. For the benefit of my colleagues in the House, who were unable to participate in these hearings, I place in the RECORD the statement of Sister Thering:

I am Sister Rose Thering, a Catholic, a Dominican Sister from Racine, Wisconsin and since 1968, a Professor of Education at Seton Hall University, South Orange, N.J. I am most grateful that you have granted me this opportunity to testify today.

In my own name, and as a member of the Executive Board of the National Coalition of American Nuns, and as Vice-President of the American-Israel Friendship League, I speak in support of Congressman Lantos' Bill: that the United States Embassy in Israel and the residence of the American Ambassador to Israel shall hereafter be located in the City of Jerusalem.

Israel is the only country in the world in which our embassy is located outside the capital city.

Jerusalem, the capital of Israel is today, truly, an open city where almost 420,000 people—300,000 Jews, 100,000 Muslims and 12,000 Christians, as well as 8,000 others—live, work together and pray. It is a unique city not only because of the diversity of its population, but because of its holiness, its sanctity for Jews and also because within its boundaries lie the places sacred to Christians and Muslims.

Jerusalem is today for Jews, as it has always been, an indivisible part of an unbroken history of three thousand years. Jerusalem is today and always has been the capital of Israel. That is where our United States Embassy should be located.

The Jews of Jerusalem today are the inhabitants with the longest unbroken historical association with the city of Jerusalem. Their memory of it is recorded in the Bible, the Mishna, and the Talmud; in prayer and in poetry. Three times a day, for nineteen hundred years, Jews have prayed for their return to Jerusalem.

From birth until death, during these past 3,000 years Jews in Jerusalem and around the world are reminded in each of their liturgical functions of their attachment to Zion—Jerusalem. Each Passover Seder, the concuding words are: "L'shona ha'ba'a b' yerushalayim;"—"Next year in Jerusalem."

The traditional words of comfort to a mourner are: "May the Lord comfort you and all those who mourn for Zion—Jerusalem."

At the Jewish wedding ceremony, the breaking of the glass which commemorates the destruction of the Temple is followed by the recitation of Psalm 137—a prayer dear to Jews and Christians:

"If I forget Thee O Jerusalem
Let my right hand lose its power
Let my tongue cleave to the roof of my mouth if I remember thee not,
If I do not place Jerusalem above my greatest joy."

The return to Jerusalem is symbolized even at the burial of each observant Jew by the placing of a small bag of soil from Jerusalem in the coffin.

Jerusalem is the heart and soul of the Jewish People! Jerusalem, not Tel Aviv, is the capital of the State of Israel.

Within the city of Jerusalem are found the holy places of Christians and Muslims. Again, the historical record reveals the scrupulous care given the Church of the Holy Sepulchure—all Christian Holy places—and to the Dome of the Rock and all Muslim sacred shrines when under the jurisdiction of the Israel government. Israeli law, passed by the Knesset in 1967 and reaffirmed in 1980, protects the holy places from desecration and guarantees free access to them for all people. In the years of Jordanian control of the eastern part of Jerusalem, no Jews had access; there was no freedom of movement for Christians to their Holy Places. In fact, desecration of the holy places took place during Jordanian occupation.

Having visited Israel and traversed the Holy City of Jerusalem (East and West) twenty-one times since 1970, I know for a fact that today Jerusalem is, indeed, a free, open city for Jews, Christians, and Muslims. The holy places of all Faiths have never before received such loving care, attention and maintenance. Jerusalem, today, under Israeli jurisdiction, is the center and example of religious freedom. Jerusalem is the capital of the State of Israel.

The National Coalition of American Nuns, on whose board I serve, and the America-Israel Friendship League (non-sectarian) which I serve as Vice-President, support Congressman Lantos' bill that the United States Embassy be moved from Tel Aviv to Jerusalem. Other nations of the world look to the United States for leadership—leadership in working for Peace—leadership in recognizing Israel as a member of the family of nations. In fact, recognition of Jerusalem as Israel's capital would facilitate the peace process, not hinder it.

I, and those for whom I speak, respectfully request that our administration recognize Jerusalem as the capital of Israel and move the United States Embassy to the city of Jerusalem.

Thank you,

Respectfully submitted,

ROSE THERING, O.P., Ph. D.

P.S.—Jerusalem is ardently loved by the Jews who have always preserved her memory, emphasized through many signs and monuments from the time of David who had chosen it as his residence, and of Solomon, who had built the Temple. Jerusalem is thought of daily by the Jews, and for them it signifies the existence and freedom of this nation—Israel. Pope John Paul's Apostolic letter on Jerusalem released April 19, 1984.●

THE COCAINE ALLIANCE

HON. ROBERT J. LAGOMARSINO

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, May 2, 1984

● Mr. LAGOMARSINO. Mr. Speaker, it is becoming increasingly evident that Cuba, under Fidel Castro, is in no small fashion involved in drug trafficking into the United States. It is also becoming more certain that he is involved in the drugs for guns trade.

The following outstanding investigative report appeared in the April 29, 1984, edition of the Ventura County Star-Free Press. In it, reporter Ernest Volkman uncovers the cocaine alliance between Castro and Robert Vesco, known for his shady underworld dealings.

It has been long known that Castro is determined to undermine U.S. credibility in the Western Hemisphere. One can now begin to see the whole picture of Castro's interest in poisoning our populace with cocaine, marihuana, and qualudes.

I urge my colleagues to read this important and outstanding piece of investigative journalism.

The article follows:

[From Family Weekly, Apr. 29, 1984]

THE ODD COUPLE

(By Ernest Volkman)

(In November 1982, a Federal grand jury in Miami took the extraordinary step of indicting four Cuban Government officials, including an admiral in the Cuban Navy, on charges of smuggling drugs into the United States. The indictments caused a worldwide sensation, but the real kingpin of the smuggling operation was not among those charged. He is Robert Vesco, the fugitive financier who has led a shadowy existence in the Caribbean region for the past eight years.

(Family Weekly assigned investigative reporter Ernest Volkman the job of tracking down how and why Vesco and the "Cuban connection" came about. Volkman, who last year in Family Weekly exposed Nazi butcher Klaus Barbie's connection with American intelligence, spent two months, in this country and the Caribbean, tracing an extensive drug-smuggling empire that has been masterminded by Vesco. What follows is the result of Volkman's investigative effort, which included interviews with many U.S. intelligence and narcotics agents, Cubans and others directly involved with the cocaine conspiracy.)

The villa is one of the luxurious homes that dot the breath-takingly beautiful seaside area about 17 miles east of Havana, Cuba. Complete with private dock and beach, the sprawling white house with the red tile roof currently belongs to the Cuban Communist Government, which seized it when its wealthy owner fled to the United States nearly 20 years ago.

The villa is used by the Government for VIP guests of Fidel Castro. Ordinarily, it would not be worthy of mention, except that its current occupant—at this writing—is a very special guest of the Cuban Government.

His name is Robert Vesco, and his presence there is tangible evidence of one of the most unusual partnerships in the history of crime. Simply put, Vesco and Fidel Castro have gone into the drug-smuggling business.

How this bizarre partnership came about involves an extremely tangled tale, the bottom line of which is money—and lots of it. According to admittedly imprecise estimates, believed to be on the conservative side, Castro and Vesco sit at the center of a huge drug-smuggling operation that is responsible for a significant portion of the illegal narcotics coming into the United States. The operation has generated nearly $20 billion in profits during the past four years alone, and Castro is believed to have made about $50 million thus far on his end of the deal.

"Fundamentally," says one U.S. narcotics agent, "the story of Vesco and Castro is a story of pure, unadulterated cynicism. These are people who deserve each other."

THE BAHAMIAN CONNECTION

The story begins with Robert Vesco, a criminal mastermind who has been eluding U.S. authorities for years. Probably the most wanted white-collar criminal in recent U.S. history, Vesco was indicted in 1971 for looting $224 million from investors who had put their money into a Swiss-based mutual fund known as Investors Overseas Services (I.O.S.). Additionally, Vesco is wanted on charges that he made an illegal $200,000 contribution to President Nixon's 1972 reelection campaign—in the hope of having the I.O.S. charges dropped.

Since then, Vesco has popped up all over the Caribbean, living at various times in Antigua, Costa Rica and, most significantly, the Bahamas. It was while residing there three years ago, according to U.S. law-enforcement officials, that Vesco began smuggling drugs.

As Vesco could not have failed to notice, the Bahamas have been notorious for years as a prime trans-shipment point for marijuana, cocaine and other narcotics moving northward from production centers in South America, primarily Colombia and Bolivia. Dotted with tiny islands and secluded anchorages, and only 50 miles from the United States, the Bahamas are ideally suited for drug-smuggling operations. Fast boats regularly run the gauntlet of the U.S. Coast Guard and Drug Enforcement Administration (D.E.A.) attempts to stop them. The potential profits, however, are worth the risks: A boat loaded with 100 kilos of cocaine can being up to $25 million in street sales.

The hundreds of millions of dollars passing through this Bahamian connection—the single most important entry point of illegal drugs being shipped to the United States—attracted Vesco's interest, and by 1981, U.S. officials became aware that a new sophistication and style seemed to have entered the Bahamian trade. They were right: Vesco was organizing the traffickers into a much more efficient business organization, and, in the process, subverting Bahamian Government and police officials with an extensive bribery scheme that soon converted some Bahamian bureaucrats into virtual partners. "It's almost indescribable what goes on out there," says one U.S. agent of the Bahamas.

Vesco's most sophisticated contribution was the solution of a problem that had been bedeviling major narcotics traffickers for years: What could they do with all the money they were earning? This may not seem much of an obstacle, but in fact it is. Some traffickers have so much money, they tally it up in pounds. More importantly, bundles of unaccounted-for money tend to attract the attention of Federal agents, especially from the I.R.S.

Vesco devised a solution that Federal agents concede was nothing short of brilliant: He set up a series of small banks in the Caribbean, where secrecy laws make it easy to protect the identities of depositors. Working in concert with corrupt lawyers and accountants in the Southeastern United States, Vesco then devised a complex scheme to launder all that drug money through a series of bank transactions that converted cash into holdings in offshore corporations based mostly in the Caribbean.

But although the drug business was flourishing, Vesco had some worries. One was an escalating U.S. effort to stop it, including a crackdown on big dealers in this country and an increasingly successful effort to infiltrate the major drug-smuggling rings. More significantly, the advent of the Reagan Administration brought a renewed campaign to block smuggling routes, using increased air and ship patrols. Clearly, the smugglers would need a lot of help if they were going to be able to evade U.S. patrols.

One of Vesco's most important partners, a notorious trafficker named Carlos Enrique Lehder Rivas, is believed to have provided the answer: the Government of Cuba.

A COCAINE PARTNERSHIP

U.S. agents were well aware of Lehder. For years, the Colombian had been listed as one of the world's major cocaine traffickers. Operating out of the Bahamas, he virtually took over one small island, Norman's Cay, setting up landing strips and a sophisticated communications system (including a 120-foot radio antenna, which probably allowed for contact with most of the U.S. East Coast) in order to run cocaine into the United States via a small fleet of boats. U.S. agents say Lehder and Vesco met in 1980, when the Colombian was trying to figure out a way to hide the money from his drug profits. He decided to go into partnership with Vesco, and by 1981 the two men were the most important suppliers of cocaine to this country—in the process, ranking in nearly $300 million a year.

By 1982, Lehder had established contact with agents of the D.G.I., the Cuban intelligence service, operating in Colombia. The Cubans needed Lehder; they were trying to run guns to leftist MI9 guerillas in the Colombian countryside. Lehder, with his extensive smuggling operation, was perfect for the job, and a deal was struck: Lehder would aid Cuban arms smuggling into Colombia, while the Cubans would provide protection, anchorages and other help for his drug-smuggling operations into the United States.

As a highly successful smuggler, Lehder attracted a lot of attention from U.S. drug agents. It was an interest that increased substantially when the agents noticed Lehder in deep conversation with known D.G.I. agents in Colombia. "You didn't have to be much of a genius to figure out that the Cubans were cooking up a deal with Lehder," says an American intelligence official. "The formula was simple: For the Cubans to be talking to Lehder could mean only that their orders came straight from the top. In other words, Castro. Lehder worked with Vesco, which meant that sooner or later, Vesco and Castro would be working together too."

It was not long before U.S. officials had proof of the Cuban involvement: tracking of drug-laden boats revealed that some of them were operating in Cuban waters and berthing at Cuban ports. Obviously, there was official Cuban Government sanction for the drug boats. What the Americans did not realize then was that the Lehder-Cuban connection was only the beginning of what would become a much more extensive business partnership.

As Vesco realized, the Lehder-Cuban deal was important, but given the Castro Government's apparent willingness to work with drug smugglers, there was potential for an even greater business arrangement. Before Vesco could make a move, however, the Cubans themselves acted. In late 1981, D.G.I. operatives in Colombia contacted another Vesco drug business associate—Johnny Crump, an American with a severe stutter, whose family had settled in Colombia years before. After his cattle-ranching business failed in 1979, Crump went into the narcotics racket, running a large-scale cocaine and marijuana-smuggling operation with Vesco in the Bahamas.

Crump knew Jaime Guillot-Lara, another Colombian listed by U.S. agents as one of the biggest and most successful marijuana smugglers in the world. It turned out that Guillot and Crump shared a problem: U.S. agents were consistently knocking off their associates and seizing their boats. There were heavy losses, and Crump—who at one point was making $3 million a year from drugs—was in trouble. So was Guillot, who had lost six ships.

Apparently aware of their problems, the Cuban D.G.I. agents had a proposition: official Havana protection for the drug ships, in exchange for which Guillot and Crump would obtain American arms in the United States, then smuggle them into Chile to be used by anti-Government forces. Both men accepted the deal, and the Cubans then proposed a more efficient method for smuggling drugs. The problem, the Cubans noted, centered on the large "mother ships" (big merchant vessels) the Colombians were using to move drugs into the U.S. Those ships, loaded to the gunwales with tons of narcotics, represented a huge investment; if the American agents seized such a craft, the loss would be considerable. The solution, the Cubans noted, would be for the mother ship's load to be transferred into a number of smaller and faster boats. The Americans could not hope to intercept every craft. Thus, the traffickers could afford to lose a small boat or two, as long as the other boats got through.

Since transferring drugs from a big ship to smaller ships is difficult on the high seas, the key to the scheme was the use of Cuban ports. The mother ships would dock at several Cuban Navy bases (most often at Cayo Largo), where the drugs would be transferred to smaller boats, anything that could make the run. The large ships involved in the operation would have the name "Viviana" painted on their sterns, a signal to Cuban Navy warships that they were to be protected and escorted into Cuban ports. ("Viviana" was the name of Crump's infant daughter.)

The "Viviana" operation was a key piece of evidence about the entire conspiracy. "We learned," says a U.S. official familiar with the case, "that the D.G.I. agents in Colombia had established a very close relationship with Crump. So close, in fact, that one of the senior D.G.I. men served as godfather for Viviana, Crump's daughter. Crump may have thought it was clever to use his daughter's name as a codeword in the operation, but it ultimately backfired, providing an important link between the Cubans and Crump. When Crump was arrested last year in this country for drug trafficking, it was the Viviana business that indicated an undeniable tie with Crump and his Cuban friends. Obviously, it can be fairly deduced that it was all a D.G.I. operation, with the D.G.I. men taking their orders from Castro himself. There's no way the D.G.I. and the Cuban Navy would have carried out drug smuggling without Castro's official permission, that's for sure."

The deal was somewhat similar to the one worked out with Lehder, but with an important difference: This time, the Cubans demanded a cut of the drug profits, according to U.S. agents, amounting to $500,000 to $700,000 for each large boatload sailing in Cuban waters, depending on the size and type of cargo.

ENTER CASTRO

The Cuban insistence on money caught Vesco's attention immediately, for it suggested that Castro might be willing to do real business with drug smugglers, despite the Cuban Government's official (and stiff) prohibition against all narcotics. As Vesco further noted, the Cuban involvement initially seemed mainly political, connected with smuggling arms to leftist guerillas. But the Cubans were now looking for a cash piece of the action.

No one is quite certain exactly when it came about, but some time late in 1982, Vesco established contact with Castro's representatives and apparently suggested that there were a number of attractive business propositions to be discussed, all of which could lead to extensive profits for the regime. At first glance, there is cause to wonder why the Cubans, officially a revolutionary government firmly opposed to having anything to do with drugs, would want to get involved with an especially notorious capitalist like Vesco and his drug traffickers.

It is probable that Vesco did not know the real answer to that question, but the C.I.A. did. The answer, the agency discovered, had nothing to do with capitalism, but a lot to do with a very serious problem Castro was facing. The problem was the D.G.I. itself. Created, nurtured and funded by the Soviets, the D.G.I. had been taken over by the K.G.B. in 1967, and since then, operated as a virtual K.G.B. branch office. Its Moscow-trained leaders were total Soviet puppets, and Castro fretted that as long as Moscow controlled the D.G.I. purse strings, he would never have his own intelligence service.

Castro concluded, say U.S. agents, that he would have to form his own intelligence agency, one loyal only to him. To do that, however, required money—lots of it—and money was in very short supply in Cuba. Operating the country on a Russian dole estimated by the State Department as $1 million a day, Castro had no access to the very large amount of cash that would be required to fund and operate a competing intelligence agency.

The connections with drug runners provided one source of secret income, and Vesco then proposed another lucrative scheme. Cuba was the target of an American trade embargo, which meant that Castro lacked the kind of high technology he needed for modernization of the Cuban economy, especially the sugar industry, the country's staple. Vesco proposed a plan under which he would arrange to smuggle into Cuba advanced American technology, the kind the Soviets could not provide—in exchange for which Castro would protect the drug traffickers. As an added bonus, the Cubans would be paid a cut of the cocaine and marijuana traffic moving into the United States.

It is unknown at this point how much advanced technology Vesco was able to procure for Castro, but it must have been extensive, for by last year, U.S. agents had begun to receive reports that Vesco had taken up residence in Cuba, where he was being treated like royalty, at the magnificent seaside villa just outside of Havana.

Further confirmation of the extent of the Castro-Vesco partnership surfaced last year, when U.S. Customs agents, investigating a case of illegal shipment of goods out of Texas ports, unearthed a businessman from that state who had shipped a load of bull semen—vital for breeding high quality cows that are especially suited to tropical climates—to Cuba in an arrangement with Vesco. But as the agents dug deeper, they found that the illegal shipment of semen was evidence of a larger conspiracy: In an extensive arrangement involving four countries, Vesco had contrived to smuggle out of the United States a large amount of embargoed equipment to Cuba, including computers and $700,000 worth of sugar-processing technology.

The investigation also provided intriguing peeks into Vesco's special status in Cuba. For example, the agents found a man whom Vesco used as a conduit for money to be given to several men charged in the United States in connection with the illegal shipments. According to the man, he flew in a private plane hired by Vesco into Havana, where despite the fact he had no visa or passport, Vesco waved him through customs and took him to the large villa mentioned earlier. Vesco, he told U.S. agents, handed him $240,000 with instructions to use it raising bail for defendants in the case involving illegal shipments.

Some time before this incident, Federal narcotics agents in Florida had uncovered another part of the Vesco operation. The key was the arrest of Crump while he was trying to unload cocaine in Florida. Crump agreed to become a Government informant, and equipped with a new identity and under round-the-clock protection, has since been revealing the connections between the Vesco drug operations and the Cuban Government.

Crump's revelations—along with other information from several defectors from the D.G.I.—have led the Reagan Administration to publicly accuse Castro of running a drug-smuggling operation. In testimony before a Senate subcommittee in April 1983, James H. Michel, Deputy Assistant Secretary of State for Inter-American Affairs, said: "We have a report that the Communist Party Presidium, and specifically Fidel Castro, in early 1979 considered a scheme to begin dealing with narcotics smugglers, using Cuba as a bridge and support base for the networks to the United States."

The Cuban Government has consistently refused to discuss such allegations.

Although the arrests in Texas and Florida may have put a crimp in Vesco's operations, it would be an illusion to think that they have slowed him much. For one thing, U.S. agents have no real idea how much American technology Vesco has managed (and is still managing) to smuggle into Cuba. For another, the drug traffic northward into this country continues at even greater levels (it is now estimated that traffickers in Colombia alone ship about 50 tons of cocaine here each year. Further, despite indictments of crooked lawyers and bankers who have worked with Vesco in his scheme to hide drug profits, money is still pouring into new banks that Vesco seems able to create overnight.

The problem is the enormous potential profit to be made in smuggling. Vesco's standard payment of 7 percent of a drug deal to those willing to run the risk of laundering the money in Bahamian banks is tempting to anyone who wants to take a chance on becoming a millionaire overnight. And to the traffickers, who also stand to make millions, trying to get boats past the U.S. bloodhounds seems a risk well worth taking.

More importantly, the gamble is still appealing to Fidel Castro, who, thanks to Vesco, has found a source of the money he so desperately needs. As U.S. authorities are the first to concede, stopping men of the ruthlessness, shrewdness and sheer amorality of Fidel Castro and Robert Vesco is not easy. After all, they are proven survivors.●

THE TAX GAP

HON. LEE H. HAMILTON

OF INDIANA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, May 2, 1984

● Mr. HAMILTON. Mr. Speaker, I would like to insert my Washington report for Wednesday, May 2, 1984, into the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD:

Tax time for 1983 is over, as millions of Americans scurried to meet the April 16 deadline. For 1983, Uncle Sam will pull in $290 billion in revenue from 170 million individual income tax returns. However, an extra $100 billion will be lost because of tax evasion. Closing this "tax gap" would be enough to cut the federal deficit in half, but despite repeated attempts by the Internal Revenue Service (IRS) to beef up its collection procedures, even the agency's Commissioner admits that the problem is getting worse. By 1985, the tax gap may be half again as big as it is today. Although the recent tax cuts were expected to curb evasion, Americans seem more determined than ever to beat the system.

The problem is not just the billions lost due to illegal underground activities and questionable corporate behavior. The most significant tax evasion by far arises among the ordinary individuals who account for most of the $300 billion in unreported income. The tax system works well when aided by mandatory collection tools, such as payroll withholding by employers and information reporting by third parties. But when the system relies on voluntary compliance, collection drops. The failure to report is high, for example, for investors' capital gains (41 percent unreported) and royalties (39 percent unreported), and even higher for off-the-book services (such as home repairs) and farm proprietors' income.

Many reasons have been offered to explain why people cheat on their taxes. Several relate to basic changes in Americans' attitudes about their civic responsibilities.

There is the growing feeling that "everybody cheats, so why shouldn't I?" Tax evasion is no longer kept a secret, but is widely admitted, even joked about. There is probably some spillover as well from the "me first" attitude of the 1970s. In addition, many taxpayers believe that they are being required to pay more than their fair share, as inflation pushes them into higher brackets. There is also a suspicion among taxpayers that they are not getting their money's worth. Strong public statements from the President on down about the government's ineffectiveness are convincing people that their money is simply being wasted. Overall, there has been a general erosion of the old-fashioned idea that citizens ought to pay their taxes because it is the patriotic thing to do.

A second reason for cheating is the belief that "nothing will happen to you if you do." People no longer seem to share the once common impression that the IRS is invincible. Budgetary restraints have dropped the number of audits from 5 percent in the 1960s to 1.4 percent this year. In addition, it is well known that auditors focus primarily on abusive tax shelters. There is also the belief that even if a taxpayer is caught cheating, he will face only minor penalties. The dockets of the tax courts are clogged with slow-moving cases, and although stiff penalties are possible, last year only 1,800 people were prosecuted. In the final analysis, most individuals found to be underreporting income or overstating deductions usually have to pay only the taxes owed plus 11 percent compound interest. This has led observers to remark that the evader's main punishment is a low-interest loan from the IRS.

A third reason for cheating is the incredible complexity of the tax code. President Carter called it a national disgrace a few years ago, but it has only gotten worse in the interim. Today, it covers 5,105 pages, a document longer than the Bible, the Koran, and the Talmud put together. The code's complexity fosters evasion in several ways. People will not obey laws that they cannot understand, but even IRS officials interpret the code's provisions differently. Compliance falls as people lose confidence that the code treats everyone equally. By putting hundreds of credits and incentives into the code, the government encourages people to be as creative as possible in trying to escape taxes. Overall, the code's complexity adds a gaming aspect to tax time, as people try to outwit the IRS. This has made some feel ashamed of paying what they really owe, as if compliance were a sign of stupidity.

Because the reasons for cheating are so varied, we must attack the problem on several fronts. We have to raise the number of audits, increase the likelihood that evaders will be prosecuted and punished, upgrade our ability to match information by computer, and eliminate abusive tax shelters. Our leaders must set an example of honest compliance, avoiding the spectacle that may be created by corner-cutting and personal greed. Also, we must show taxpayers that their money supports many worthy programs, from health research and highway repair to higher education and pollution control.

Although these steps are helpful, a major simplification of the code may be the best way to reduce cheating. It is not surprising to me that Congress has a growing interest in a simpler tax system with lower rates and a broader base. Several proposals under consideration would cut the number of brackets and mandate lower rates with a degree of progressively (higher rates for higher incomes) while repealing most itemized deductions, credits, and exclusions (except those generally available to most people, such as the home mortgage interest deduction). General tax reform and increased enforcement would make tax shelters less appealing and noncompliance easier to discover, as well as less profitable. Also, it would make the code more understandable and would help ensure that people who earn the same amount pay the same tax.

Our staggering federal deficits will be putting pressure on Congress to narrow the tax gap. Nonetheless, my feeling is that major simplification of the code will come hard and slowly. Ideas for reform take some time to be digested, and special interests will fight hard to retain their tax breaks. However, there is a growing realization that the code is becoming too complex to function. The President has called on the Treasury Department to make recommendations by December on how to simplify the code, and all three Democratic presidential candidates support simplification. We will be hearing much more on the issue in the months ahead.●

UNFAIR TREATMENT OF SOCIAL SECURITY RECIPIENTS

HON. ROMANO L. MAZZOLI

OF KENTUCKY

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, May 2, 1984

● Mr. MAZZOLI. Mr. Speaker, many of my constituents, like yours and those of our House colleagues, have had to undergo a review of their eligibility for continued disability benefits. These people—many heavily dependent on their disability benefits for survival—have suffered anguish and traval when their benefits are challenged even when the review process yielded a result in their favor.

The original intent of the disability review process—to make sure that only those who are actually disabled and unable to work receive social security disability benefits—was correct and necessary. However, the zeal and the methods by which these reviews have been conducted leave much to be desired.

Deserving people have lost their disability benefits on the basis of an initial review. They have been found guilty without a trial so to speak. And, as I said earlier, even if the benefits are restored, the person loses out and is much worse for the wear.

Therefore, I applaud Chairman JAKE PICKLE of Texas and his Social Security Subcommittee in drafting H.R. 3755, the Social Security Disability Benefits Reform Act. And, I commend the House on passing his measure overwhelmingly. It was one of the more satisfying votes I have cast since coming to the House.

Despite the welcome recent moratorium placed on these disability reviews by the Secretary of Health and Human Services, the need for firm and conclusive legislative action remains. I hope that the Senate will move expeditiously on H.R. 3755.

I commend to the attention of my colleagues an editorial from the Washington Post which further testifies to the need for reforms in the social security disability review process.

The article follows:

HARDSHIPS AND HEARTBREAKS

The House has now passed—by a walloping 410 to 1 vote—amendments to the Social Security disability program that would put a stop to the harshest effects of the review of disability rolls begun in March 1981. The strength of the House vote, and the fact that the amendments are a cautious and well-balanced compromise, increase chances for prompt action in the Senate, where a similar measure has already gained bipartisan support.

Health and Human Services Secretary Margaret Heckler, arriving in office after the review was well under way, had hoped to head off legislation by proposing an 18-month hiatus in further reviews and by instituting administrative reforms. But continued White House and OMB opposition to her efforts should remind the senators that her more moderate views need reinforcing. Without a clear legislative check, an administration so minded might revert to the slipshod, insensitive purging of the rolls that, as Mrs. Heckler has acknowledged, brought "hardships and heartbreaks" to many disabled people.

The Senate will no doubt note that an 18-month moratorium on disability reviews is likely to cost more than modest reforms passed by the House. The House bill—and the one proposed in the Senate by William Cohen, Carl Levin and John Heinz—would allow the overdue review of disability rolls to continue. These measures would leave unchanged the current strict rule that denies benefits to disabled people as long as there is—anywhere in the economy—a job they could conceivably hold.

The measures would simply require that HHS follow a few common-sense guidelines. HHS could not terminate disability benefits unless recipients' medical conditions had improved sufficiently to enable them (at least in theory) to support themselves. This rule would not apply if it were found that the recipient should never have qualified for benefits, or if medical advances could now enable recipients to work. Can anyone really believe that it makes sense to throw people with long-term continuing disabilities into a job market in which millions of able-bodied people can't find jobs?

The other safeguards—requiring face-to-face interviews before benefits are terminated, continuing benefits during appeals (with required payback if the appeal is lost) and other procedural safeguards—are similarly uncontroversial. In fact, the only fault in the measures is that they would deny these protections to many people whose benefits were cut off during the last three years. The administration says that including these people would greatly increase costs. But most of the cases in which benefits were initially terminated have either been reversed or are still on appeal. Unless the review was totally disreputable, most of the cases actually closed can be presumed to have merited their closing even if stronger safeguards had been applied.

It's hard to imagine that the administration would be well served in an election year by the continued threat of another outcropping of horror cases. Congress would do both the White House and the nation's disabled people a great favor by passing the proposed reforms promptly.●

TRIBUTE TO MARGARET ELLEM McCULLY

HON. RICHARD C. SHELBY

OF ALABAMA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, May 2, 1984

● Mr. SHELBY. Mr. Speaker, Margaret Ellen McCully, from Selma, Ala. has been named the fourth annual Kathryn T. Windham Girl of the Year. The highest congratulations are certainly in order for this outstanding young person, and I would like to share with my colleagues in the House of Representatives the editorial that appeared in the Selma Times Journal about her selection:

The article follows:

A CREDIT TO HER COMMUNITY

Margaret Ellen McCully has set the example of what a young woman should be.

She was selected as the 1984 recipient of the Kathryn T. Windham Girl of the Year award. The fourth Selma student to be so honored, Miss McCully was named Girl of the Year Saturday night.

A list of her accomplishments is evidence of why the Selma High School senior was named by Delta Kappa Gamma members for the honor. She also received a $1,000 college scholarship from the national education honorary, which was made possible by support from local residents and business.

Already the recipient of a $4,000 presidential scholarship to the University of Alabama, Miss McCully has maintained a 4.5 grade point average on a 4.0 scale. She was a National Merit semifinalist and secretary of the National Honor Society.

A Bible School leader who has worked in "Clowns for Christ," sung in the youth choir and been president of her church's youth group, Miss McCully is also a member of the school band and student council.

The daughter of Mr. and Mrs. Robert A. McCully, Miss McCully is a credit to her family and her community.

Like the other 15 girls who were nominated for the Girl of the Year honor, Miss McCully represents what's good, descent, conscientious and moral in young people today.

We are proud that she and others like her are a part of Selma. We congratulate her and her family. And all of Selma's appreciation should go to Delta Kappa Gamma for promoting this type of achievement in our young women.

It is young people like Margaret Ellen McCully that help to make Alabama the excellent State it is. I know that she will go far in life and I wish the very best for her in all future endeavors.●

REMEMBERING "HANK" PALEY

HON. MARIO BIAGGI

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, May 2, 1984

● Mr. BIAGGI. Mr. Speaker, it is with a deep sense of regret that I wish to note the passing of Henry D. Paley, president of the Commission on Independent Colleges and Universities of the State of New York. For those of us who had the pleasure—and privilege of knowing "Hank"—the news of his passing brought on a deep sense of remorse in those of us who valued his work on behalf of higher education. More importantly, those of us who worked with him on matters related to education, have come to realize that his passing also means that one of our Nation's most effective advocates on behalf of private and independent colleges and universities is lost.

Today a memorial service is being held in Albany in remembrance of Hank and it is fitting that one should take this opportunity to recall the many contributions that he made to many people and institutions during his lifetime.

Since 1975 he held the post of President of the Commission on Independent Colleges and Universities in New York which serves as the statewide coordinating body and public policy forum for our 116 independent colleges and universities. His tenure during his 9 years at CICU was marked by an unfailing dedication to fair and equitable treatment of students at these schools—both at the State and the Federal level of Government.

In addition to being an advocate on behalf of higher education—he was also a scholar, although those of us who know him also know that he would laugh at such a label. He earned his baccalaureate degrees from Antioch College in Yellow Springs, OH, and the U.S. Merchant Marine Academy at Kings Point, NY. He held a special place for the Merchant Marine Academy and never missed an opportunity to tell me so—knowing of my position on the House Merchant Marine Committee and Chairman of its Merchant Marine Subcommittee. When I say Hank was a scholar I meant it in the most literal sense since he was also awarded a senior Fulbright fellowship from the London School of Economics. In addition to his academic training, he has been the recipient of numerous honorary degrees including doctor of laws, New York Institute of Technology (1975); doctor of humane letters, College of St. Rose (1979); doctor of laws, College of Mount St. Vincent (1982); doctor of laws, Skidmore College (1982); and doctor of humane letters, Canisius College (1983).

His activities on behalf of academia have been numerous. He served as a trustee of Antioch College from 1974 to 1976; cofounded and directed the State Legislative Institute of Baruch College, from 1973 to the present; served as a member of the New York State Education Commissioner's Advisory Council on Higher Education from 1975 to the present; chaired the State Association Executive's Council of the National Association of Independent Colleges and Universities during 1981; was a member of the board of directors of the Center for Mediation and Conflict Resolution, was a member of the American Society for Public Administration, a member of the Public Relations Society of America and a member of the American Academy of Political and Social Science.

In the early years of his career, Hank began a life of public service that was characterized by a fierce devotion to human rights, including fair treatment and equitable opportunity. He held a variety of news reporting and editing positions and later served as an organizer for the International Ladies Garment Workers Union in Wilkes-Barre, PA, and for the San Francisco-Oakland Newspaper Guild.

Prior to his appointment as president of CICU, Hank began his career in education as deputy to the chancellor and director of university relations at the City University of New York from 1968 to 1975. In that position, he was responsible for overall university relations, including legislative activities at the State and Federal levels.

I will personally remember Hank for his active work during the 1980 Higher Education Act amendments where we forged our interests on behalf of New York students and the independent schools they attend. We were effective, in joining forces with then Senator Jacob Javits, in revising the distribution formula under the supplemental education opportunity grant program to assure more equitable treatment to nonpublic schools which rely heavily upon the SEOG program. While no one could even accuse Hank of not being aggressive—for the record, I admired him for his ability to argue his position effectively. While he aggressively pursued his interests and those of independent schools in our State—he was a fair man and a man who was willing to compromise. He sought to bring balance to our higher education policy and recognized the need to temper his own interests with those who held differing agendas.

The fact that the 1980 education amendments were a bipartisan product that shared the support of the entire higher education community was, in part, a result of his leadership. We are always fond of saying "As New York goes, so goes the Nation." In this case it was true for his leadership qualities were not only evident in New York—but he was recognized by his colleagues all across the Nation—as a man who stood head and shoulders above many—but equal to all.

Hank Paley recognized the role of government in providing educational opportunity to all citizens—regardless of their income, race, creed or color. His life was dedicated to breaking barriers—barriers that cause the human spirit to falter, and often die. He recognized that government can and should protect those who cannot afford to help themselves and he learned to utilize the tools of government for the benefit of many, many people.

There are probably hundreds of thousands of students who have graduated from schools in New York that never heard of the name of Hank Paley. Hank would have never cared about that. What he cared most about was that those students who were given an opportunity as a result of the policies he helped shape—would work to bring back to society but a small piece of what he himself put into it. That is what he should remember about Hank—that the achievements of his lifetime—his very short lifetime—will be multiplied many times over by others who have been given a window of opportunity in life.

My special condolences go out to Hank's wife Cabot, his five children and his sister. My thoughts and prayers are with them now. I would hope that they might receive some small comfort in the fact that the contributions which Hank has made to all our lives will live on through us and others.●

OUTDOOR AMERICA ASSESSES WINTER NAVIGATION

HON. DAVID E. BONIOR

OF MICHIGAN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, May 2, 1984

● Mr. BONIOR of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, H.R. 3678 was ordered reported by the Committee on Public Works and Transportation on August 3, 1983, to provide for the conservation and development of water and related resources. Section 1123 authorizes the Corps of Engineers to implement a full-year extension of the navigation season on the Upper Great Lakes and a 10-month extension on the St. Lawrence Seaway.

Traditionally, the navigation season in the Upper Great Lakes has ended on December 15, plus or minus 2 weeks. The corps proposal extends the navigation season through the construction of bubblers, icebooms, underwater dams, harbor and channel dredging and widening, and the use of a fleet of new icebreakers. The corps presently estimates the project's initial investment cost to the United States at over $600 million.

The corps' 1979 draft "Survey Study for Great Lakes and St. Lawrence Seaway Navigation Season Extension" prompted extensive criticism. A series of major studies raised substantial questions about the corps' analysis of the project's economic benefits, its real costs, and its potential environmental impact.

I am pleased to have this opportunity to share with my colleagues an analysis of the current proposal, prepared by Geraldine Strozier for Outdoor America, the publication of the Izaak Walton League of America. Ms. Strozier correctly analyzes the discrepancies between the various corps and private reports devoted to a Great Lakes season extension. She does a fine job, as well, addressing the numerous problems and lack of support for the current proposal.

[From Outdoor America]

WINTER NAVIGATION—A BILLION-DOLLAR BOONDOGGLE?

(By Geraldine Strozier)

At this moment there is a struggle going on in Congress over one of the most ambitious—and potentially environmentally damaging—public works projects ever undertaken by this nation. In a unanimous vote last summer, the House Public Works Committee authorized the U.S. Army Corps of Engineers to undertake the task of keeping the Great Lakes open to commercial shipping year round.

Because of severe winter conditions, the lakes are typically closed from mid-December to early April. The shipping extension has the backing of some influential Great Lakes congressmen, in particular, Rep. Arlan Stangeland (R-Minn.). Supporters claim that year-round lake shipping would provide a cheaper way of transporting Midwestern grain, steel, coal and other commodities to Eastern markets. And, they say it would revive a sagging Great Lakes shipping industry while aiding recession-wracked port cities.

The proposal, however, has brought a storm of protest from a wide array of opponents, including environmentalists, some other Great Lakes congressmen, Canadian officials, the governors of Michigan, Ohio, New York, Wisconsin and Minnesota, homeowners, fishermen and taxpayers. Incredibly, the list of opponents even includes most of the groups supposed to benefit from winter shipping.

The proposal's critics believe that its extraordinary cost, estimated by some experts to be as high as $50 billion, makes no sense at a time when the country has severe economic problems. The steel industry, which is in a recession, doesn't have the shipping volume to warrant an extension of the navigation season. The Lake Carriers' Association, which represents shippers, and the National Grange, which represents agricultural interests, have both gone on record opposing the proposal because of its extraordinary cost to the public.

But cost isn't the only controversial aspect of the proposal. If approved, it will involve massive environmental destruction. According to Michigan United Conservation Clubs (MUCC), which is spearheading the opposition, "Winter navigation would be disastrous for the Great Lakes. It would usher in a new era in manipulation and degradation of the Great Lakes and St. Lawrence River ecosystem."

The winter navigation proposal has been around for years. It was initially introduced by influential members of Congress from Minnesota in the booming days of the steel industry to promote their state's iron ore business and to make U.S. Steel Corp.'s new giant ore boats economical by allowing them to operate year round. In 1970, Congress asked the Detroit District of the Corps to undertake a demonstration project to see whether the idea was feasible. In a 1979 report, the Corps concluded that winter shipping on the Great Lakes was economically viable.

The Corps determined that winter navigation would require the use 22 new icebreakers to smash up the ice; a massive rebuilding of locks and erection of huge underwater dams and dikes to control the breakup and movement of the ice; and the dredging and widening of the St. Mary's River and the virtual redigging of the St. Lawrence River in order to accommodate both ships and the displaced ice. Even with these expensive modifications, the Corps estimated that profits from the increased shipment of commodities and the creation of new jobs aboard the vessels and in Great Lakes ports would produce a return of $4 for every $1 invested in the project.

Virtually every other study of the project, however, has contradicted the Corps' conclusions. A series of reports—including one commissioned by the state of New York, one by the Canadian Seaway Authority, another by the U.S. General Accounting Office and even one commissioned by the Corps itself and then ignored—found that the Corps had overstated the benefits, understated the costs, simply ignored the environmental damage involved in tearing up the ice cover and assumed that roughly half the cost would be borne by Canada although that government has expressed its opposition to the project. Most damaging of all, the Corps' own oversight board recognized many of these problems and refused to recommend the project to Congress. The Corps claims the project will cost $1 billion, but other studies put the figure anywhere from $9 billion to $50 billion, the wide variation due to the Corps' own contradictory statements of exactly what is involved.

From every independent analysis, it is clear that winter navigation would become far and away the nation's most expensive public works water project, representing an enormous subsidy to the shippers using the Great Lakes and an enormous loss to those who hunt and fish there, as well as to the general taxpayer footing the bill—all for a handful of benefits that virtually every study, even including one sponsored by the Corps, has cast doubt upon.

The economic benefits the Corps attributes to the project are arrived at partially by ignoring environmental costs. To make the deal look less costly, for example, the Corps has not made clear the details of its massive construction plans, according to Bob Haas, a biologist with the Michigan Department of Natural Resources and an expert on the effects of winter navigation on the Great Lakes. The hidden agenda, he said, includes huge dikes on the Detroit and St. Clair Rivers and the dredging of the Middle Neebish Channel in the St. Mary's River, all prime fishing areas. The Corps is hiding the specifics, he said, to prove that winter navigation is economically beneficial, a position that is "ridiculous," he said. "They haven't even begun to estimate potential losses in aquatic habitat and productivity due to the project."

Moreover, even though recreation is a primary industry in Michigan, the Corps has failed to assign it an economic value, he pointed out. The Corps has, therefore, totally failed to estimate "losses in recreational benefits, whether they be economic, esthetic or whatever. I submit to you that these could be very substantial losses."

The Corps' argument against including the cost of environmental damage rests on its promise to study potential environmental problems as the project progresses and correct them as they are identified. Hence, the Corps argues, there will be no environmental damage. If a problem arises that cannot be resolved, the Corps promises it will halt construction. However, many conservationists believe that once substantial money and time have been invested in the project, the Corps will not easily abandon it.

The U.S. Environmental Protection Agency is among those that have challenged the Corps' reasoning. In 1979, the agency's Midwest regional administrator officially told the Corps, "We have serious reservations about potential environmental impacts that could result" from the "inherent uncertainty of this type of approach."

While no one can prove with absolute certainty the harm winter navigation will do to the environment, conservationists point to a number of different ways in which the project could do serious damage.

SHORELINE IMPACTS

In order for vessels to make their way through the frozen lakes and connecting passageways, channels would have to be broken through the ice. According to the MUCC, "the most serious environmental impacts will be in connecting channels (St. Mary's, St. Clair, Detroit and St. Lawrence Rivers and Lake St. Clair), harbors and shallow bays (e.g. Saginaw Bay)." When navigation channels are cut through narrow areas such as these, the displaced ice piles up against the shoreline in huge chunks that can gouge out the shoreline while scouring out vegetation that provide food and habitat for fish and wildlife.

OIL SPILLS

Conservationists are also concerned about the threat posed by oil spills, asking how an oil spill that occurs under the ice during a winter storm could be contained or cleaned up. Even the Corps has admitted that a "spill could be locally devastating to fisheries and wildlife." In a 1982 report, it calculated that the chances of a tanker accident in the Whitefish Bay/St. Mary's River area during the winter would be one in five in any given year, and of an actual spill, one in 100 in any given year. In 1979, the U.S. EPA told the Corps that a spill during winter navigation is "very probable" and would be extremely difficult to clean up. "In the St. Mary's River, for example, a spill of molten #6 fuel oil, being less dense than water, will float until it cools. At zero degrees Celsius, after collecting solids and silt, its density will increase and it will likely sink to the river bottom where it will remain until the spring warmup," when it will be too late to save the fish and vegetation contaminated for so long.

EFFECTS OF WINTER BOAT TRAFFIC

The vessels themselves can do still further damage. a report by Northern Michigan University for the U.S. Fish and Wildlife Service on the Corps' demonstration project described the effects of the waves generated by the ships and the shattering of the ice cover. According to the report, the powerful icebreakers and transport vessels operating in the narrow ice-free channels churned up the lake bottom and clouded the normally still water. As a result, fish were forced to travel far greater distances for food than they could easily tolerate in winter when their metabolism is lower. In addition, by stirring up bottom sediments, winter navigation would allow the release of toxic chemicals and heavy metals that have settled down into the silt of lake bottoms—substances that pose risks both to fish and to human health.

Testifying before the House Merchant Marine and Fisheries Committee last October, Dr. Gale Gleason, a scientist at Lake Superior State College in Sault Ste. Marie, Mich., said that the Corps has admitted that it could take 10 or more years before the effects of winter navigation on fish populations could be quantified. In that time, he said, "four generations of spawning whitefish, 10 generations of mayflies and 20 generations of caddisflies could be destroyed or seriously decimated, changing the genetic composition to the point that it could no longer be compared with the system as it exists today."

Winter shipping may also hurt the St. Lawrence River's cherished bald eagle population that was brought back by the devotion of conservationists. According to a report by the State University College of Environmental Science in Syracuse, N.Y., eagles feed in winter on the waterfowl that swim in the open channels between ice floes. With increased traffic in the channels, waterfowl may find the river a less attractive stopping place; along with reducing the eagles' food source, the increased traffic will disrupt the river's tranquility—a factor that is important to the birds' continued nesting in the area. Together, these changes might bring about the destruction of the handful of eagles there, the report concludes.

Breaking open channels through the ice may also have a serious impact on animal populations that currently travel across the ice to wintering areas or among lake islands looking for winter food. Migration routes for timber wolves and moose may be affected. The Northern Michigan University study found that deer attempting to swim across open channels routinely drown. Removal of the ice cover can also disturb the habitat and feeding patterns of other animals such as foxes, coyotes and hare.

The winter navigation proposal is contained in an omnibus water projects bill that is expected to come up for debate later this year in the House. This huge public works bill includes "pork barrel" projects for improvements in harbors, rivers or lakes in nearly every Congressional district. Congressmen are typically reluctant to rock the boat in such a case, and historically, the chances of getting a major provision removed from such a bill have been slim. However, observers say that because of the strength of the opposition and the extravagant cost of the proposal, perhaps the winter navigation proposal will prove to be the exception.

The economic value of the Great Lakes lies not only in their ability to transport goods economically. They also have immense value as a resource for the recreation of their millions of citizens and as a place where their wild inhabitants can renew themselves. Rep. David Bonior (D-Mich.), who plans to lead the fight against the project when it comes up for debate later this year in the House, said it most clearly. His constituents "don't want their environment ruined, their beaches destroyed, their wildlife harmed, their tourist economy damaged and their tax dollars used in the name of a project that will add nothing to our economy."●

CALL TO CONSCIENCE: ALEXANDER PEVZNER

HON. MICHAEL D. BARNES

OF MARYLAND

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, May 2, 1984

● Mr. BARNES. Mr. Speaker, the Call to Conscience Vigil for Soviet Jewry continues again this year with the dedicated support of many Members of Congress who will persist in the battle for freedom for Soviet Jews. As we are all aware, the number of Jewish people allowed to emigrate from the Soviet Union has declined sharply in recent years. In light of this, our combined efforts here in the Congress have become even more meaningful for those who still cannot escape Soviet oppression.

Alexander Pevzner is a Soviet refusenik, and for over 5 years has suffered the humiliating and harsh consequences of requesting permission to emigrate. Although Alexander's parents and sister were granted permission to leave the Soviet Union, Alexander and his family have been repeatedly denied. They are still waiting, and they are still hoping.

From the beginning of my service in Congress I have corresponded personally with Alexander's father, Lev Pevzner, who is residing in the United States. As a friend, I have pressed his son's case with Soviet officials and I continue to hope for the day when we can bring Lev's son home for him. I thank all of my colleagues who join in the conscience vigil. The work that each of you are doing is also helping Alexander.

As I have done so often in recent years, I have again written to Soviet officials urging them to reconsider their restrictive emigration policies and permit Alexander Pevzner and his family to leave the Soviet Union. I have appealed to them to make a humanitarian effort on behalf of Alexander Pevzner and allow him and his family to fulfill their dream of being together once again with their entire family.

I am sure that Alexander will never give up his struggle to leave the Soviet Union, and we here in Congress who have taken on a personal responsibility to see our way through to success for at least one individual, among many, must also never abandon our most sincere efforts to reunite this loving family. We must continue to call on the Soviet Union to relax their burdensome and unnecessarily restrictive emigration policies that have so tragically prevented families like the Pevzners from being together.

As Members of Congress, our strong protests to the Soviet Government on behalf of those who are powerless to change their unfortunate situation must continue. For Alexander, and the many like him who wish to leave the Soviet Union, we are perhaps their greatest advocates and our efforts must continue.

Today, more than ever, my most sincere hopes are for Alexander Pevzner and his quest for freedom.●

CWO JAMES P. MEADE, JR., SURVIVES INJURIES, RECEIVES DEGREES

HON. TONY COELHO

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, May 2, 1984

● Mr. COELHO. Mr. Speaker, in these times of budgetary constraint, we sometimes tend to forget the human element behind the programs we are funding—or attempting not to fund. I recently received a letter from a constituent of mine, CWO James P. Meade, Jr., retired, which seems to me to be quite pertinent. Mr. Meade will be receiving his doctor of philosophy degree in clinical psychology at end of May. This in itself may not be noteworthy, but it is the story that culminates in the awarding of this degree that is.

In 1967 Mr. Meade felt a strong obligation to go to South Vietnam to fight for his country, and became a helicopter pilot. After 4 months of heroic service his helicopter crashed, and the still spinning rotor smashed through the cockpit and severely injured him in the head. Doctors saw his condition as hopeless, but somehow he survived. Over the course of 30 months of intense pain and determination, Mr. Meade was able to learn to read, write, talk, and walk again.

In 1969 he enrolled in a community college, while he and his family were supported by social security disability insurance. He had to work much harder than an average student, but persevered. With the Federal Government's financial assistance, Mr. Meade earned his bachelor of science degree in psychology "with honors." He continued on to achieve a master of arts degree in counseling, and will soon receive a doctor of philosophy degree in clinical psychology.

In Mr. Meade's own words, "I could never have done what I have without the financial help the Federal Government has given me." Mr. Meade wrote to me to express his gratitude for the Federal assitance which enabled him to become a productive member of society again. His story should be an inspiration to all of us: He is living proof of the success of programs such as social security disability insurance. I hope that all of us will give serious consideration to the comments and suggestions Mr. Meade makes in his letter:

DEAR REPRESENTATIVE COELHO: Almost seventeen years ago on May 8, 1967, I was critically wounded in the then Republic of Vietnam when my helicopter was shot down. Over the next six years I spent almost three years in military, Veterans Administration, and civilian hospitals for reasons directly related to the wounds suffered in Vietnam. Almost half of this time was spent at Madigan General Hospital in Ft. Lewis, Washington, where I was (unconscious) medivaced from Vietnam.

As I mentioned starting this letter, that was the situation beginning almost seventeen years ago. Over most of the years, except for a three year period I did work, I have been a recipient of Social Security Disability Insurance benefits for my children and myself.

I have been very thankful for these monies because if it was not for this generous assistance from the federal government, I would not have been able to take advantage of opportunities to attempt to improve myself and hopefully someday not need S.S.D.I. assistance any longer.

A great deal of the past seventeen years has been more physically and emotionally painful and frustrating than is probably imaginable by most people. Indeed, many tears have been shed during these years as I struggled to regain a semblance of humanism that was almost irrevocably (and violently) taken away from me.

There have been moments when I no longer wanted to continue. It was so very important to me to be accepted again, and my early failures were so very many that there were times when suicide seemed the only possible road away from the frustration of trying and failing. Still, I would not give up. Becoming a tax payer again continually propelled me against odds that many people (including my physicians) have said were insurmountable. My family was once told I would never be more than a helpless vegetable.

On May 31, 1984, however, I will earn a Doctor of Philosophy (Ph.D.) in Clinical Psychology. Because of federal disability benefits, I was able to spend almost five years earning a Bachelor of Science degree in Psychology from Portland State University, Portland, Oregon. The Veterans Administration allowed me to return to college despite the fact that I could barely read or write, and, subtract, multiply or divide, etc. The faith the V.A., my family and many professors had and showed me supplied the strength that caused me to earn my baccalaureate degree "With Honors." It was not until eight years later that I was able to earn a Master of Arts degree in Counseling from California State University, Fresno.

I will earn the Doctor of Philosophy in Clinical Psychology from International College/University Without Walls, an "Approved" institution of Higher Education in the State of California. Since this is an "Approved" institution, I will be able to legally serve as a Psychology Intern or Assistant and, after earning 3,000 internship hours, sit for the California Psychology Licensing Examination.

I have worked hard, Sir, very hard. And, I think my pains and efforts have nearly prepared me to become a tax payer again.

The true purpose of this letter, however, is to thank you, as a Representative of the federal government, for helping this moment to occur. I could never have done what I have without the financial help the federal government has given me.

It seems that President Reagan has serious doubts concerning the worth of spending federal moneys on people who cannot seem to make it on their own. Still, I wish you would thank him for me. Please tell the President that I have worked very hard to better myself, and I think I have succeeded. As a matter of fact, although the doctors at Madigan General Hospital were going to amputate BOTH of my legs in 1967, I have learned to walk without necessitating any support at all.

Because I spend most of my time counseling or simply talking to people who are disabled, I have become aware that most disabled individuals seem to feel that President Reagan is trying to make us the "second-class citizens" most disabled persons try desperately not to become. Indeed, the present Administration's policies have done more to frighten disabled people than any other Administration ever has. Telling people that your new rules and regulations will always help the "truely needy" does not seem to mean very much when you change the rules to decide who is truely needy and who is not.

Two years ago, I was "truely needing," I will admit that. After earning a Ph.D. I am going to do my very best to find a job, to show other disabled people that they can be "successful" and productive human beings again. That they can be useful and productive.

One important (to me) step I have made in reclaiming my rights as a "first class citizen" occurred in February when I swore an oath as an officer in the California State Military Reserve. The CSMR is state and is not the federal military and does not pay a salary, but being able to qualify meant more to me than I could express. (Napoleon suffered epileptic seizures).

Again, Rep. Coelho, I thank you (as a Representative of the federal government) for making it possible for me to continue "The Long Return of Warrant Officer Meade." Possibly, I will never be able to pay back in taxes the amount equal to the S.S.D.I. I have received. Because of this federal aid, however, I am ready to try. I may "fall-flat-on-my-face," but finally having the chance to succeed on my own means more to me than I could ever express.

Sincerely yours,

JAMES P. MEADE, Jr.,
Chief Warrant Officer (Retired).

Mr. Meade, I would like to take this opportunity to congratulate you on your efforts and to wish you continued success. You are a model for all of us to follow.●

IN THIS NEW AGE OF ENTREPRENEURS, WE'RE NO. 1 AGAIN

HON. LES AuCOIN
OF OREGON
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, May 2, 1984

● Mr. AuCOIN. Mr. Speaker, I want to bring to your attention, and the attention of our colleagues, a very interesting and timely article which appeared in the Sunday edition of the Washington Post. Entitled, "In This New Age of Entrepreneurs, We're Number One Again," the article focuses on the fact that Japanese industralists and economists are viewing the Silicon Valley phenomenon as a model they want to employ in their industries.

When someone mentions Silicon Valley, CA, comes to mind. My home State of Oregon, however, has its own silicon valley, located primarily in my congressional district. The largest single private employer in the state, Tektronix, is based in my home county. And new high technology ventures are springing up on what seems like a daily basis. One of them, Floating Points Systems, has shown an increase in net sales from just under $30 million in 1979 to over $100 million in 1983 and its chairman of the board, Norm Winningstad, was Small Businessman of the Year in 1981.

Oregon's economy, for so long so dependent on the forest products industry, must be diversified and expanded to meet the needs of its people. The timber industry in Oregon will always be crucial to Oregon. But if Oregon is to grow, it must diversify its economic base and intensify its efforts to attract new industries. The high technology industry in Oregon is already a solid portion of Oregon's economic foundation. It should, and will, become an even more important factor in Oregon's economic resurgence.

The article I have presented for the RECORD presents a new way of viewing this industry—but more so, I commend it to our colleagues.

IN THIS NEW AGE OF ENTREPRENEURS, WE'RE NO. 1 AGAIN

JAPAN AND EUROPE PREFER OUR 'SILICON VALLEY WAY' TO 'INDUSTRIAL POLICY'

(By Joel Kotkin)

At the very time that "industrial policy" has become the rage among many of our professors and policy makers searching for ways to salvage America's place in the world economy, their role models abroad are looking enviously at what the Japanese call "the Silicon Valley way."

On this side of the ocean, the chorus of industrial-policy advocates argue that America should take its cue from Japan, where government plays an active role in deciding which industries to nurture and promote with financing, subsidies, retraining and protection from foreign competition.

Yet European and Asian business and government leaders, increasingly impressed by the vitality of a U.S. economy that has enjoyed higher growth rates over the past 18 months than any other major industrial nation, are looking towards America's dynamic, if somewhat chaotic, entrepreneurial economy as their role model for the future.

"Coordination is all right if you're building a steel and car industry on the model of other people. But now we're in an era of rapid change, of integrated circuits and microprocessors," observes Jiro Tokuyama, dean of Tokyo's Nomura School of Advanced Management and a longtime confidant of Prime Minister Yasuhiro Nakasone. "I don't think our large organizations can move quickly enough to make the changes. We must find our model among the entrepreneurs like [those] in your Silicon Valley."

Of course, innovating in the field of high technology and managing the decline of old, smokestack industries are not the same. But where the growth industries of the future are concerned, U.S entrepreneurism is the world's model.

Enthusiasm for "the Silicon Valley way" is based largely on the remarkable performance of the young, entrepreneurial U.S. companies, particularly in such burgeoning industries as microelectronics, telecommunications and biotechnology. Due in part to the innovative and competitive spark provided by these upstart firms, America between 1977 and 1981 doubled its trade surplus in these technology-based industries.

To meet the challenge posed by America's entrepreneurs, Tokuyama and other influential foreigners are urging their governments to move away from the industrial policy which served them well in the past. Even the elite bureaucrats at Japan's Ministry of International Trade and Industry (MITI)—often cited by American enthusiasts of industrial policy as the ultimate model for a planning agency—now advocate wide-scale deregulation of the economy and devote considerable resources to promoting small start-up companies known in Japan as "venture businesses."

In addition, the Ministry of Finance, long a bastion of bureaucratic controls, recently fostered the opening up of Japan's traditionally conservative equity markets, including the development of a special, small-issues market consciously modeled on the U.S. "over-the-counter" stock exchange which has played such a key role in the financing of such American entrepreneurial companies as Apple Computers, Federal Express and Tandem.

"Nothing happens in Japan unless there's a crisis and we feel there's a crisis now in our industries," remarks Hiroshi Kato, a 29-year veteran of MITI who is now an adviser to Yamaichi Securities, one of Japan's leading investment banks. "Our talent is queued up in the big bureaucracies of the giant companies.

"Their talents are being wasted. They must be forced to become more independent. Being an entrepreneur in Japan must become more respected, like it is in America, if we wish to compete in the future."

Computer chips—"the crude oil of the '80s," as one 'American industrialist describes them—aptly reflect the Japanese dilemma. Beginning in the late 1970s, Japan became a formidable competitor in this area, reducing the American share of the world market to 53 percent last year.

There was talk that the small, entrepreneurial U.S. companies which had provided many of early breakthroughs in silicon computer chip technology (and which gave the Silicon Valley its name) were in serious jeopardy.

But now U.S. firms have staked out commanding leads in new chip technologies which promise to constitute the key growth sectors of the future.

For instance, they hold an almost complete monopoly on the future generation of large, complex memory devices known as EPROMs and EEPROMs, which are used to store the programs for microcomputers. The advantages of these devices is that they are erasable, and therefore allow the programs recorded on them to be modified. This feature, for example, allows a user to easily change the function of a robot on an assembly line. The market for these chips is expected to nearly double annually in coming years—a growth rate five times the industry average.

Another U.S.-dominated growth area is in customized or semicustomized computer chips, the specialized devices that serve as the brains, or controls, in thousands of pieces of equipment, from the most advanced scientific instruments to systems that control the energy consumption and fire detection for an entire building complex. In this market, American firms now hold a commanding 2-to-1 lead over the Japanese. As little as 5 percent of the world computer chip market in 1981, these chips could account for most of the projected $100 billion chip market (up from $25 billion today) by decade's end.

Although the Japanese can be expected to challenge the American hegemony in custom chips, as they did earlier in RAMs (random-access memories), their prospects for success seem sharply less promising.

In producing RAMs, Japan could exploit its advantages: its skills at mass producing a single, high-volume product while holding down price and achieving high quality.

But custom or semicustomized chips allow U.S. companies to exploit their advantages: marketing and management flexibility and superior technology. These highly complex devices, which have to be specially tailored to the job they perform, are frequently sold in small batches to makers of expensive and complex products. Success in custom chips has far less to do with price and much more with technology and design—traditional American strengths.

Bolstered by a series of alliances with larger (and less technologically dynamic) European and American companies, and backed by the now $3 billion American venture-capital industry, over 30 new computer chip firms have started operation since the late 1970s. In the new and fast-paced chip markets of the 1980s, these "start-ups" enjoy clear advantages over their larger competitors both at home and in Japan.

Concentrating only on particular market niches, usually in new and rapidly expanding fields, these firms are not slowed down by the bureaucratic inertia of giant, diversified corporations. Also, facing big risks but also the hope of huge profits, they are driven by a sense of "existential challenge" rarely found in the corridors of giant companies.

Thus, the changes sweeping the chip world have lured back some who once conceded the industry to the Japanese. In the late 1970s, L. J. Sevin looked on with horror as his Dallas-based Mostek computer chip firm was almost annihilated by the Japanese RAM blitzkrieg. But today, "the game has changed suddenly," claims Sevin, who now chairs Cypress Semiconductor, a Silicon Valley-based chip firm. "The technologies are exploding and driving the markets here. When it was a question of selling chips by the bagful, it was playing to their [Japan's] strength. Now that there are so many new niches, it's becoming a marketing game and that gives the smaller U.S. firms the advantage."

These changes are also likely to work against the targeting strategies which played a major role in Japan's previous industrial triumphs, observes Michael Borrus of the University of California's highly regarded Berkeley Roundtable on the International Economy. Borrus states it succinctly: "You can't target a moving target."

Under current circumstances, it is unlikely that Japan will produce anything like the explosion of start-ups now revitalizing the American computer-chip industry. Takeshi Ogata, manager of the industrial electronics division of the giant C. Itoh trading company, and Dr. Atsuyoshi Ouchi, senior executive vice president of NEC Corp, believe the big-business bias of Japan's large financial institutions will prevent start-ups from garnering the $20 to $50 million needed to start a new chip firm.

Equally important, the much ballyhooed Japanese "corporate culture," with its ethos of lifetime loyalty to the company and its worship of bigness, makes it virtually impossible for a start-up to attract the necessary talented technicians and managers.

"It would be very difficult even for me to start a [semiconductor] firm here," Ouchi, one of Japan's preeminent electronics industry figures, admits. "Now, if I were young and spoke better English, maybe I would go to California and try it."

As long as Japan's computer chip industry remains the exclusive province of the giants, observers such as Ogata fear Japan will continue to lag behind more competition-minded American companies in the development of new technologies. Despite all the hysteria associated with such projects as the "fifth-generation" computer, many Japanese fear that the technological gap between the two nations has been widening in recent years. Indeed, a 1980 survey of 200 top Japanese managers involved in technical innovation at major companies found 73 percent convinced that their nation lagged behind the U.S. in revolutionary new technologies.

"I am sorry to say that in the leading-edge technologies, there is a continuing advantage for the States," says Ogata. "Our social environment, the personality and character of our people and institutions is to constantly improve on a process, say from the 16K RAM to 64K RAM to 256K RAM. But to develop a whole new technology, to get on the leading edge, you have to look to the American firms. It's a cultural thing."

Eager to break down these "cultural" constraints, many younger Japanese are adopting "the Silicon Valley way" as their own business creed. To them, the idea of young Americans in their 20s, such as Apple Computer's Steve Jobs and Microsoft's Bill Gates, building giant companies based on their technological vision contrasts favorably with the situation in Japan, where a seniority-oriented system relegates most executives to relatively minor positions well into their 40s.

During the 1970s, for instance, the number of male college graduates wanting to change companies during their careers—almost unthinkable in traditional Japan—doubled to nearly 20 percent. Those interested in going out on their own jumped to nearly one-third.

To many of this generation, "the Silicon Valley way" expresses more than a path to success: it reflects a new, free-wheeling, democratic approach to capitalism, expressed by such things as the widespread ownership of equity by workers and a relative dearth of hierarchical corporate structure.

"When I first came to America, I was shocked to see a company president wearing jeans and having his feet on the desk," recalls Shigenobu Nagamori, the 39-year old founder of Nippon Densan, a fast-growing Kyoto-based firm which last year sold $35 million worth of small motors used in such products as high-speed cassette recorders and computer disc drives. "To have workers call you by your first name would be unthinkable in Kyoto. But I liked it very much."

Today, companies like Nagamori's, one-third of which is owned by its employes, are injecting this new democratic spirit into a hierarchical business culture where owners are frequently viewed as quasi-deities with unchallenged rights to the sweat and intelligence of their workers. The American model is also captivating the new enterepreneurs in other Asian nations such as Korea, Taiwan and Singapore.

"Asian societies are at a turning point," observes Yasunobu Nagura, an Osaka-based small-business consultant to over 500 companies both in Japan and Taiwan. "There is a new spirit, a willingness to try new things. We are becoming Americanized."

Like their Asian counterparts, Europeans are also undergoing Americanization. Aware that their economies have actually lost jobs over the past decade—while the United States created a remarkable 20 million new jobs, mostly in small- and mid-sized companies—European leaders are beginning to question the efficacy of "industrial policy" over the free-wheeling U.S. system.

Nowhere is this more evident than in the United Kingdom, birthplace of the first industrial revolution. Under the government of Margaret Thatcher, tax incentives for investment in small, entrepreneurial companies have lured such American-based venture capitalists as Jean Deleage, Peter Brooke and Brian Haslett into what has long been considered the stodgiest of industrial cultures.

"I learned the trade in the United States—a way of doing business that was quite different than traditional in Britain," observes Haslett, who now shuttles between London and Boston serving as a consultant to venture capitalists on both sides of the Atlantic. "There's not been very close contact between the City of London [the financial district] and the dirty-fingernail guys. They didn't talk to each other. What I learned in America was that a venture capitalist can have a positive professional relationship with the entrepreneurs where the class thing—the void—doesn't get in the way."

Due in part to the efforts of Haslett and other venture capitalists, Britain is slowly emerging from its established role as the proverbial sick man of the European Community. Indeed, with the emergence of such entrepreneurial firms as Sinclair Research, a leading maker of computers as cheap as $30, and Kleentech International, an engineering services firm, Britain astoundingly is now even regarded by other Europeans as "something of a role model," according to Bank of Paris analyst Phillipe Sahut D'Izarn.

Fundamentally, D'Izarn's comment represents something more of an indictment of the continent's sloth than a reflection of the grandeur of Britain's still-modest resurgence. Although American "industrial policy" advocate Robert Reich praises the "sophisticated tools for industrial policy-making" used in France and West Germany, all the elite planning institutions and "targeted" investment to promising new industries have succeeded in doing so far is to turn those nations into technological backwaters.

Indeed, with the exception of Nixdorf Computers, Germany seems to have slept through the entire microelectronics revolution, despite millions spent on government aid to research. Nor has France, despite its well-deserved reputation for superb engineering, done much better. IBM continues to dominate Europe's computer industry, dwarfing its nearest European competitor by nearly 4 to 1. Untroubled by local Apple-style upstarts, Big Blue faces no sizeable European competition in such growth fields as personal computers.

Searching for the reasons behind their disappointing performance and prospects, a growing number of Europeans point to the very sort of corporate-government partnership which so excites the imaginations of American advocates of "industrial policy." "Even before [French President Francois] Mitterrand, our government was 'helping' private industry far too much," says D'Izarn, who served in the powerful Ministry of Industry during the conservative regime of Valery Giscard d'Estaing. "We missed the mini, then the micro, in part because our government wanted to have mainframes like IBM. Our policies directed huge amounts of money to our large electronics firms which didn't have the innovative spark we needed."

So pervasive has this analysis become that even France's socialist government has placed greater emphasis on entrepreneurism—as evidenced by Mitterrand's recent pilgrimage to Silicon Valley—than its more conservative predecessors. At first determined to turn France into "the Japan of the West," the Mitterrand regime now seems to be following a play book composed in San Jose rather than Tokyo.

Over the past year, the socialist regime has developed major encouragements for young entrepreneurial firms, including an over-the-counter stock market and a three-year tax holiday for start-up firms. Prodded by the government, venture capital investments have doubled to $37.5 million during the last three years.

"We know perfectly well that the growth we want depends on the entrepreneurial spirit," concedes Bernard Attali, a leading socialist intellectual, government official and adviser to President Mitterrand. "Only entreprenuers create jobs and new opportunities. The world is changing and we are all entering an era of profound decentralization and the entrepreneur. We are now interested in helping people go out there and help themselves."

"We are seeing a new mentality among the people 30 to 35," observes Jean Fonteneau of Soffinova, the French government's venture-capital fund. "They realize that the job situation is no good, that the bureaucracy at companies like Thomson [an electronics giant nationalized in 1981] or the government isn't the safe haven it used to be. People are getting more into building their own companies and making profits like in the States."

Yet despite these changes, the French and Japanese, as well as other foreigners, will no doubt face a tough time in tring to emulate "the Silicon Valley way." Despite the rhetoric, America's recent entrepreneurial explosion was not detonated by Ronald Reagan's speeches or supply-side policies. The path leading from the robber barons and Andrew Carnegie to Steve Jobs and Steve Wozniak founding Apple Computers in a California garage represents the continuity of a unique history, people and culture.

Constantly replenished by both foreign immigrants and the development of new regions, America's entrepreneurial spirit remains the one irreducible competitive edge that this nation possesses over all others. It should not be squandered at the altar of an ill-considered "industrial policy."

"It's incredible that some Americans are going to heavy state planning when I'm being asked to go to Europe to help them disband theirs," remarks Boston venture capitalist Peter Brooke, who has also been summoned to Japan to spark entrepreneurial growth. "We shouldn't follow their mistakes. Hell, we're the ones with the answers."●

GRIEF

HON. HAROLD E. FORD

OF TENNESSEE

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, May 2, 1984

● Mr. FORD of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, something special happens when a child faces illness or injury, whether life-threatening or minor. The impact is intense to the body and emotions of the child and the family. Caring for, curing and saving these young lives is the very special responsibility and mission of the renowned children's hospital in Memphis, Le Bonheur Children's Medical Center.

Le Bonheur started as a small, 89-bed children's hospital in 1952. Since that time it has become a comprehensive center for the diagnosis and treatment of pediatric diseases, disorders and injuries. Through the years Le Bonheur's commitment to education, research and specialized health care for children has attracted outstanding medical personnel. Le Bonheur currently has a medical staff of 350, boasting a modern 225-bed facility, with 50 pediatric specialists having offices in the hospital.

Le Bonheur is also the principal pediatric teaching hospital of the University of Tennessee Center for the Health Sciences and part of one of the world's largest medical complexes. Students in medicine, nursing and numerous other allied health fields receive training here.

Almost every pediatric medical and surgical subspecialty is represented at Le Bonheur. From the tonsillectomy to open heart surgery and liver transplant surgery, the latest in specialized techniques is offered to the more than 30,000 children treated each year in one of the 30 specialty clinics and ambulatory center. Le Bonheur Children's Medical Center is a nontax supported, nonprofit hospital offering the finest in medical care to children. From the beginning Le Bonheur, which means "happy feelings", opened its doors to all sick children.

It is a pleasure for me to bring the outstanding work of this facility, dedicated to saving the lives of children, to the attention of my colleagues. As a father of three children, I found the following article which appeared in the Memphis Commercial Appeal quite moving and would like to take this time to share it with you.

(By Anna Byrd Davis)

"Death is not an accepted part of medical practice anymore," says Dr. Greg Stidham, who spends his days and nights taking care of very, very sick children.

He is director of critical care services at Le Bonheur Children's Medical Center. And he knows about saving children, and he knows about losing them. Ten to 15 children die each month at Le Bonheur.

What doctors do today, he likes to point out, is make children well.

Example:

"The death rate of kids with Reyes Syndrome (a mysterious illness that can strike children who are recovering from a viral illness) in the late 1950s was near 90 percent. Then in the mid-'70s it had dropped to 50 percent, and now it's about 25 percent."

And, he points out, most doctors and nurses who work with children do so because they like to make them well.

"So we would prefer not to think about kids who die."

But if you work with very sick children, you soon learn that you have to deal with death, and that means dealing with bereaved parents.

"It's a logical extension of taking care of families who are in stress," said Dr. Stidham, explaining that at Le Bonheur the staff attends not only the child but also the child's family.

After awhile, he said, you begin to see that a lot of the problems that parents go through when a child dies are predictable and follow certain patterns.

"Some physicians who don't work with them regularly don't realize this, and certainly the family who has never lost a child before doesn't. They think they are going through something bizarre and terrible."

Working with grieving parents "became an unanticipated part of my job, that even during my fellowship I took pretty seriously," Dr. Stidham said.

At Le Bonheur, where committees keep the hospital running smoothly, Dr. Stidham and others who work with dying children and their parents formed a committee on death. The doctors, nurses and social workers wanted to come up with ways to help families, especially during that first six months of bereavement.

One of the first things they decided to do was develop a routine for getting the autopsy results to families as quickly as possible, said Abigail Sperry, a social worker.

These autopsies, she explained, provide information that helps the family in many ways. For one thing, they may not know the exact cause of death until the autopsy is done. And, an autopsy will sometimes provide the kind of information parents need before deciding to have another child.

"And sometimes parents get some satisfaction knowing an autopsy might help another child," Ms. Sperry said.

Glenn Ann Martin, a mental health clinical nurse specialist, said they decided to develop a better record-keeping system on children who die at Le Bonheur.

"The parents are contacted at three weeks after the child's death, at three months and six months, and longer, if needed," said Ms. Martin. "Mostly it's to assess the family's level of functioning and to identify any needs. We make referrals when appropriate, offering the option of return visits. We keep the door open for the families."

And, Dr. Stidham said, helping the families helps the staffers who have built a caring relationship with the parents.

"This is a process that doesn't begin at the death of the child," he said. "It's a continuation of a relationship that began when you first started taking care of the kid in the intensive care unit.

"You can form an intensive relationship that is different from any other relationship. It's a professional relationship; at the same time it has the intensity and intimacy about it that is almost the same kind of intensity as a husband-wife or mother-son relationship, because you are sharing something so important, (and) awesome as the impending death or survival of their child.

"If the physician is responsible in dealing with these parents, there is a closeness that can develop quickly that is not unprofessional but that makes his job easier and can make things easier for the parents, too.

"Follow-up with these families gives you, Glenn Ann uses this word, 'closure.' It somehow gives you a sense of completeness of caring for that child and his family. There is something about that, some resolution to that relationship that is coming to a close."

The more the committee members talked, the more they realized they wanted to do something to help parents through those really bad days—anniversary dates, birthdays, holidays.

"Usually time does help" Ms. Martin said, "but there's something of a buildup before a special date and that buildup can be worse than getting through the hours in the day itself."

Three years ago, Le Bonheur sponsored its first Day of Sharing early in December, aiming at Christmas, probably the hardest day of the year for grieving parents after the child's birthday. It is a four- to five-hour experience on grief directed at parents, grandparents, surviving siblings and what Ms. Martin calls "significant others."

The Day of Sharing offers separate morning sessions—one for children, one for mothers and one just for fathers.

"It's a totally different experience," said Ms. Martin. "By separating the parents, it breaks up the pattern of the mother openly expressing the grief and the fathers having to be the rock. The fathers feel more comfortable showing feelings if they are not in a coed group.

"It works. Its incredible," she said.

Parents whose children have died have been especially helpful with the Day of Sharing, she said.

"Some whose children died five and six years ago are still coming back to help others. They are a living testimony to survival."●

● Mr. LELAND. Mr. Speaker, on May 2, 1984, I was unable to be here in Washington because I was traveling on official business. I am sincerely sorry that I was not able to record my votes on H.R. 5172 and the two conference reports, S. 1129 and S. 64, that the House was considering on the floor.●

PROVIDING BASIC SERVICES FOR SENIOR CITIZENS OF ST. HELENS, OR

HON. LES AuCOIN

OF OREGON

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, May 2, 1984

● Mr. AuCOIN. Mr. Speaker, I would like to take this opportunity to commend the efforts undertaken by some of my constituents in St. Helens, OR, in providing senior citizens with the basic services they need and deserve.

St. Helens is in a part of the Nation where the unemployment rate has consistently hovered around the 10-percent level for the past 4 years. With the loss of tax revenue, the closing of many small businesses, and now, finally, the migration of several thousand residents from the surrounding county, St. Helens has been hard-pressed to make any kind of social service available to the community's residents.

Through the efforts of people like Dorothy Churchill, a longtime activist for senior social services, and Mike Sykes, one of the directors of St. Helens Senior Citizens Center, the town has been able to provide some of the functions necessary for senior citizens to carry out their daily activities. When they came to me for help, I was able to use my seat on the Appropriations Committee to obtain funds allowing the center to buy vans for a senior citizens' door-to-door ride service.

I recently rode one of the routes with Elizabeth Karst, who began driving the route when the center bought the vans. Seniors in need of a ride to buy groceries are picked up and returned to their homes. Seniors in need of their medical prescriptions are able to have them delivered. Seniors just needing some human contact are able to get to social centers or to places at which they volunteer their time. Seniors in certain emergency situations have a service they can count on as a lifeline.

While current fiscal realities require Congress to restrain growth in Federal spending, we must not blindly cut programs because they are social in nature. The door-to-door ride service for senior citizens is cost effective, vitally important, and deserves Congress support.

As a Member of the House, I will continue to fight for funding for programs such as the one I have just described, and I want to commend my friends in St. Helens, OR—Dorothy Churchill, Mike Sykes, Elizabeth Karst, and all their colleagues—for their unwavering commitment and assistance to so many senior citizens over the years.●

REMARKS BY THE HONORABLE JOHN O. MARSH, JR., SECRETARY OF THE ARMY, DEDICATION OF THE ERNIE PYLE MEDIA CENTER, FORT JACKSON, SC

HON. FLOYD SPENCE

OF SOUTH CAROLINA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, May 2, 1984

● Mr. SPENCE. Mr. Speaker, last month, on Wednesday, April 18, the Secretary of the Army, the Honorable John O. Marsh, Jr., delivered a memorial address at the dedication of the Ernie Pyle Media Center at Fort Jackson, SC. Ernie Pyle, this "buddy of the 77th Infantry Division," was respected, loved and remembered because he, himself, so closely identified with the very men about whom he wrote. The Secretary's remarks, I feel, captured the spirit of one of the world's truly great wartime correspondents, and I am pleased to include at this point the full text of his remarks on the anniversary of the death of Ernie Pyle 39 years ago.

Shortly we will mark the 40th Anniversary of the Invasion of Normandy.

The day after D-Day, Ernie Pyle walked along the beach which was still receiving sporadic artillery and mortar fire. And writing to Americans back home he said:

"I took a walk along the historic coast of Normandy in the country of France. It was a lovely day for strolling along the seashore. Men were sleeping on the sand, some of them sleeping forever.

"Here is a jumbled row for mile on mile are soldiers' packs. Here are socks and shoe polish, sewing kits, diaries, Bibles, and hand grenades. Here are the latest letters from home . . . and snapshots of families back home staring up at you from the sand."

It is fitting the Ernie Pyle Media Center is located here at Fort Jackson—a great military post and infantry training center. The 77th Division—the Statue of Liberty Division—was trained here. The exploits of these soldiers were the last Ernie Pyle was to cover.

This Center honors an outstanding American news man. A great journalist and war correspondent for Scripps-Howard.

Ernie Pyle was born in Indiana. Like Booth Tarkington, he never lost his Hoosier background, and the stories he wrote reflected the down-to-earth soundness of mid-Western America.

He was 44 years of age when he was ambushed by a Japanese machine gunner and died instantly on a small island near Okinawa. He was buried in a combat zone in a hasty row of soldier graves, an American infantryman on his right and a combat engineer on his left.

In the main Ernie Pyle did not write of the war in terms of the great moral issues of freedom and democracy, of totalitarianism, and world domination. Rather, he wrote in terms of the American soldiers, sailors, airmen and marines—the individuals who collectively embodied the causes for which America fought.

Like the foot-soldier, he learned what it was to be terrorized by being caught in an artillery barrage. He expected the ordeal of a rain of bombs on a unit's position, and wrote of clawing the ground in fear, knowing at any moment he might be blown into eternity.

If he did not dwell on the greater causes of human freedom, including those of speech and press, it was because the stuff of most of his stories related to the cause of human survival in combat—not because he didn't know what the real stakes were.

His being able to write of such experiences, experiences published and read, and re-read, across war-time America, was eloquent testimony to the greater cause those cold, dirty, bone tired, and hungry GI's were fighting for. He respected them, and they respected him. Ernie Pyle wrote the GI's story of a GI's war.

He was a friend of generals and flag officers, but he lived the soldier's life, accepted the soldier's risks, and died the soldier's death.

In a war that was a journalists war with thousands of correspondents, he was the war correspondent the fighting men knew best because he became a one man press corps for the combat solider.

His beat was the battlefield and he told it like it was—the story of men at war, the tough, foot slogging, slug it out infantry—their hopes, their fears, their tears, and their anger, and their courage.

In America where the electronic media was the radio, his word pictures and vivid portrayals brought the foxhole and the invasion beach into the living rooms and kitchens for parents and families back home.

His columns were read in the country stores and in the bars. They were read during the breaks on the assembly lines. They were so accurate, so direct, and so human they won a Pulitzer Prize.

Ernie Pyle had a mission and a message. He set it out in a reply to a letter from General Eisenhower. In explaining to the General how hard it was for people to understand war who were not in it, he said:

"Some of them tried hard to understand. But the world of the infantryman is a world so far removed from anything normal that it can be no more than academic to the average person.

"As you know, I've spent two and a half years carrying the torch for the foot-soldier, and I think I have helped make America conscious of, and sympathetic toward him, but I haven't made them feel what he goes through. I believe it's impossible. But I'll keep on trying."

He was still trying, with the soldiers of the 77th Division, that night on the 18th of April, 39 years ago today when he was cut down by a machine gunner's bullet.

And at the place where he fell, his GI friends erected a crude marker with these words upon it: At This Spot, The 77th Infantry Division Lost a Buddy, Ernie Pyle, April 18, 1945.●

IT IS TIME FOR THE REUNIFICATION OF CYPRUS

HON. GERALDINE A. FERRARO

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, April 25, 1984

● Ms. FERRARO. Mr. Speaker, it has been 10 years since the Turkish invasion force shattered the peace on Cyprus and split that island nation in two. For 10 years, we have been hoping the intercommunal talks would yield positive results. But the Turkish-Cypriots, and their sponsors in Ankara, have done nothing to help bring peace.

Instead of progress toward peaceful reunification of the island, the Turkish minority, with the open support of the Turkish Government, has moved provocatively to deepen the divisions. Last November, the Turkish-Cypriots issued a declaration of independence. With all the disappointments and setbacks to the cause of peace, this was a particularly grievous blow. The UDI was a clear statement of Turkish intent to prolong the crisis.

The world community, including the United States and the United Nations, was quick to condemn the UDI and to call for its rescission. Ignoring the weight of world opinion, the Turkish Government betrayed its true intentions with respect to the future of Cyprus by immediately extending diplomatic recognition to the secessionist state.

Despite the entreaties of world leaders, including U.N. Secretary General Javier Perez de Cuellar, there has been no effort by the Turkish officials to resume negotiations to resolve the crisis. Instead, the situation has worsened in recent weeks with the decision of the Ankara government to exchange ambassadors with the Turkish Cypriots.

The division of Cyprus is a tragedy. The principal victims of the tragedy are the people who have been forced from their homes, made refugees in their own land, by the continuing occupation of Cyprus by Turkish forces. I have twice visited Cyprus, and the longing of the Greek-Cypriots to return to their homes and resume their lives in peace is heart-rending.

But there is another victim of the continuing crisis. The NATO alliance is seriously weakened along its southern flank by the continuance of the dispute. Greece and Turkey are both valuable allies of ours, both important to our security needs in the eastern Mediterranean. The United States has a strong interest in having good relations with both countries.

But we must insist on responsible actions from our allies. We cannot carry on as if the invasion and occupation of Cyprus by the Turkish Government, carried out illegally with American arms, had not happened or was somehow justifiable. It was not.

Later this month, the House will be debating the foreign aid authorization bill. The Foreign Affairs Committee, seeking to send a signal of United States displeasure with Turkish actions, has already cut $50 million from the Reagan administration's request for military aid to Turkey. I believe we should take further action on the House floor, perhaps by making a share of the military aid contingent on some specific act of conciliation by the Turkish-Cypriots. The formulation that has been proposed in the other body, to make aid contingent on the return to Greek-Cypriot control of the tourist area of Varosha, is one approach we should consider.

About all, we must find ways to put events on Cyprus back on the path to peace.●

$300 IN FEES STEMMING FROM A SINGLE DELAYED DEPOSIT

HON. FERNAND J. ST GERMAIN

OF RHODE ISLAND

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, May 2, 1984

● Mr. ST GERMAIN. Mr. Speaker, a story in the Boston Globe, Tuesday, May 1, illustrates—in a dramatic fashion—two key problems which the Banking Committee has been wrestling with for weeks—the heavy impact of service fees and the inordinate delays in giving customers access to their deposits.

Because her bank failed to give her timely credit for a $1,413.45 deposit, Mrs. Lucy Cody of Boston, had a series of checks bounce, ending up being charged $296.30 in fees, and suffering extreme embarrassment. Even a check Mrs. Cody had written for her son's Boy Scout uniform was returned.

"If you've deposited a check, then wrote checks against it before its cleared, you'll know how Lucy Cody feels," the Boston Globe story, written by Jan Wong, states.

The amazing thing about Mrs. Cody's experience is the fact that the great majority—more than $1,000—of the deposit was in cash—only $400 was in the form of checks and, in reality, $300 of that sum was an American Express money order, according to the Boston Globe story. So even a deposit largely in cash combined with a money order on one of the Nation's best known firms—American Express—is subject to delay.

Mr. Speaker, I have introduced H.R. 5301 which would require timely crediting of deposits so that customers will not be forced to face the situation experienced by Mrs. Cody.

Mr. Speaker, I place in the RECORD a copy of the story from the Boston Globe describing how Mrs. Cody was treated by her bank:

HELD UP AT THE BANK? ONE WOMAN'S STORY

(By Jan Wong)

Lucy M. Cody writes a lot of checks. Recently, she switched from a neighborhood bank to the Boston Five Cents Savings Bank because she wanted to bank all around the city.

No longer.

Cody deposited enough to cover the amount of her checks. But within weeks, the bank bounced 11 checks in rapid-fire succession, four of them twice. In all, it hit her with nearly $300 in penalties. Meanwhile, her landlord and the supermarket were clamoring for payment. The gas company threatened to turn off the gas.

"What really hurt me was the Boy Scouts called me where I bought my son's uniform. I nearly died," said Cody, 31, a Hyde Park mother of two boys.

If you've ever deposited a check, then wrote checks against it before it's cleared, you'll know how Lucy Cody feels.

"They just sucked my money out. I'm ready to have a nervous breakdown," said Cody. "Worst of all, the bank treats me like it's all my fault."

The Boston Five says that indeed it is Cody's fault. "You have to play within the rules," said the bank's spokesman, Sally Goodick.

What happened to Lucy Cody at the Boston Five, could have happened at any bank. Banks across the country write their own check clearing rules. Not surprisingly, each bank has its own set.

When a rule is broken, the penalty is usually a bounced check charge. In Boston, that averages $12 a check, according to a survey by Bank Rate Monitor, a weekly trade publication.

Legislators and regulators are taking an increasingly dim view of the arbitrary delay banks impose on clearing checks. At the moment, with check clearing left to the discretion of banks, customers have access to their money anywhere from immediately to 30 days.

"Banks move slower than the old Pony Express in processing checks, and I may be libeling Pony Express by suggesting it moved as slowly," says Rep. Fernand St Germain (D-R.I.)

St Germain, chairman of the House banking committee, has sponsored legislation to set ceilings on check-clearing times. A bill is also pending before the Massachusetts Legislature. Regulators, however, prefer a law that would require simply disclosure of check-clearing policies.

"Banks haven't done a good job of disclosure," says Paul E. Bulman, Massachusetts bank commissioner. "That's tough for a consumer who's been hit with a charge. They want you to handcuff them and put them in jail."

Lucy Cody might have something more violent in mind. Last November, Cody, the wife of a truckdriver, opened a checking account at the Boston Five. Over the next five weeks, she deposited $1,413.45. Most of it was in cash. But more than $400, including a $300 American Express money order, was in checks.

She proceeded to write checks against her deposits. But because some of her deposited checks hadn't cleared, Boston Five ruled that her funds were "uncollected" and bounced her checks.

Cody began to be bombarded with slips from the bank, notifying her that her checks were bouncing. Each time she was charged the $12 fee. She assumed it was a computer error.

"I knew I had enough money in the account," she said.

In mid-December, she bought the $300 American Express money order from her old bank, Hyde Park Savings Bank, and deposited it in her checking account at Boston Five. That made a bad problem worse.

Cody considered it "as good as cash." The bank didn't. It put a two-week hold on her money.

"That was the beginning of the nightmare," she said. "I kept making deposits. And my checks kept coming back. It was almost as if my money was no good."

One $10 check bounced twice, costing her $24 in penalties. In all, Boston Five slapped her with $296.30 in penalties. Ultimately, it refunded her $228.

"She just never understood she had to wait until her checks cleared," said Jacqueline Reed, vice president of branch administration.

Reed called Cody's case a "real exception." The average bank customer writes 15 checks a month. Cody wrote 42 in five weeks.

Cody said she wasn't told she would have to wait for access to her money. Boston Five says that it tells all new customers about its check clearing policy "in general terms." Its deposit slips, for instance, state in small print at the bottom that "Deposits other than cash are credited subject to final payment in cash."

But customers never see the bank's two-page check clearing policy statement. "That's for internal use," said the bank's lawyer.

Although as a result its customers may never know it, the Boston Five's check-clearing policy isn't all that bad. In fact, it's about average for Massachusetts banks.

"We're just like any other bank," said spokesman Goodick. "I think most customers understand check cashing policy and live by it."

Lucy Cody didn't understand.

Banks say they need the delay because they don't receive the money right away. They say they have to wait until the check makes its way through the system.

Since Cody's American Express money order was sold by a local bank but issued by a Colorado bank, the money order went first to Boston Five's correspondent bank, which is Bank of Boston. At that point, within a day or two, Boston Five got $300 in provisional credit, according to Ray McCabe, a vice president and the bank's operations officer.

Bank of Boston then sent the check to the Federal Reserve Bank of Boston, which sent it by plane to the closest Reserve Bank to the Colorado bank. Finally, it reached the Colorado bank, which paid the $300. At that point, two to four days later, Boston Five collected the funds.

If Boston Five collected the funds within three to six days, why did it hold Cody's funds for 10?

The reason is that if the check is fraudulent, the schedule "goes out the window," according to McCabe. "Everyone has to put their hands on it. It has to be returned manually, through every bank it went through on its way in."

If Boston Five allows a bad check to be drawn on, it would be left holding the bag. About 1 percent of checks are bounced. Even fewer are fraudulent. But to be safe, banks assume all checks are bad.

"We just know that if we allow ourselves 10 days, 99 percent of the time that check will come back," said McCabe. A more efficient way, he concedes, is for the Colorado bank to Telex or call the Boston Five if a check is bad.

"It's a lot cheaper [for banks] not to," McCabe said.

For Cody, the final indignity, hundreds of dollars in penalties later, was the monthly checking charge. The service cost her $1 a month. Incidentally, the bank now charges $2.

Asked where she's banking now, she said, "I'm not. I'm afraid to even get near a bank."

HOW LUCY CODY WAS CHARGED $296.30 IN FEES

(By Jan Wang)

What happened to Lucy M. Cody could happen to any customer with a checking account.

Last November, the Hyde Park housewife opened a checking account at the Boston Five Cents Savings Bank in Roslindale. She deposited enough to cover her checks. But within five weeks, because some of the checks she deposited hadn't cleared, the bank has bounced 11 checks and charged her nearly $300 in fees. It also closed her account four times.

"They have been putting me through hell," said Cody.

After several meetings with Cody, the bank agreed to refund her $228 in fees. Cody, who no longer banks with Boston Five, thinks she's still owed an apology and nearly $600. The bank disagrees.

"The bank has not made an error." Boston Five told Cody in a four-page letter. Indeed, it hasn't according to a check clearing rules it sets for itself. This is how it happened:

Cody deposited $1,413.45 in cash and checks over a period of five weeks. More than $900 was in cash. An American Express money order accounted for $300, government checks for about $150 and personal checks for $26.50.

She then wrote $1402.36 worth of checks. But the bank bounced nearly $300 worth of checks. In four cases, checks were bounced twice after Cody insisted to Star Market, for instance, that her account had sufficient funds.

The check bouncing—and the subsequent fees—sparked a chain reaction. As her balance was eroded from the fees, more checks bounced. And more fees were levied.

When the dust settled, she had been charged a toal of $296.30 in fees.

The real trouble started when Cody deposited the $300 American Express money order she bought from Hyde Park Savings Bank.

"I considered it as good as cash," she said.

The bank saw it differently. Unknown to Cody, that money order is ultimately cleared through a Colorado bank. As an out-of-state check, that automatically meant Boston Five slapped a 10-business day hold on her money.●

THOUGHTFUL CRITICISM OF $208 BILLION DEPARTMENT OF DEFENSE AUTHORIZATION BILL BY OUR COLLEAGUE, RON DELLUMS

HON. FORTNEY H. (PETE) STARK

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, May 2, 1984

● Mr. STARK. Mr. Speaker, the House Armed Services Committee's 399 page report on the Department of Defense authorization bill for fiscal year 1985 is now available.

I want to commend the committee for making a number of cuts—$16 billion worth—in the President's unprecedented and mindless requests for weapons increases.

But I must say that the most thoughtful and useful pages in the entire committee report were the dissent of our colleague, a member and subcommittee chairman of the committee, RON DELLUMS.

For the benefit of the many readers of the RECORD, I would like to include Congressman DELLUMS' dissent in the RECORD at this point:

DISSENTING VIEWS OF HON. RONALD V. DELLUMS

I voted against the fiscal year 1985 defense authorization bill reported by the Armed Services Committee because I do not believe it addresses our real national security needs. If increased spending is necessary to ensure national security, then sufficient money should be provided; but we must analyze what are our true objectives. I strongly disagree with the committee view as to what is necessary for national security.

The national security role of the United States should be to exert international leadership to bring the world closer to peace. Military tensions must be eased, detente must be revived, and the threat of nuclear war must be reduced.

I would restructure our defense budget along these major themes: (1) to lessen the threat of nuclear war through support for a nuclear freeze and for arms control initiatives leading to major weapons reductions; (2) a non-interventionist conventional (nonnuclear) national security policy; (3) a reduced U.S. military role in Europe and East Asia, (4) a redirection of procurement policies to reduce waste, fraud, abuse, and massive cost overruns; and (5) a stronger national security through a policy of conversion to an economy which is less dependent on military spending.

Implementation of these themes would result in substantial savings sufficient both to reduce significantly the unprecedented budget deficits and to make resources available for selective increases in social spending.

THE ADMINISTRATION PROPOSAL AND REAL GROWTH

National defense is not some abstract number to be auctioned up or down. Unfortunately, last year's debate was such an auction: 10 percent real growth (the President); 6 percent real growth (the House Armed Services Committee); 4 percent (the House); and 5 percent (the compromise). This year the auction continues: the President requesting a 12.5 percent real increase (19 percent in current dollars), the House Armed Services Committee using a 6 percent figure, and the House Budget Committee proposing 3.5 percent real growth. What is the meaning of this real growth?

A zero percent real increase means complete acceptance of the extraordinary military budget approved last year. A zero percent real increase means that the policy embodied in the fiscal year 1985 budget should be essentially identical to that of fiscal year 1984.

To give these numbers some life: the difference between zero real growth (that is, last year's complete budget in this year's prices) and the President's request, is about $35 billion. With that amount of money, the country could find a 50 percent increase in all food programs (eg., food stamps, women, infants and children (WIC), a 50 percent increase in aid-to-families-with-dependent-children (AFDC), a 50 percent increase in Medicaid, a 50 percent increase in supplemental security income payments, fully fund the International Development Bank/World Bank program for the poorest countries, create a quarter of a million new jobs, and still have $1 billion left over for petty cash.

DESCRIPTION OF MAJOR PROPOSALS

My proposal includes the following principal changes from that of the bill as reported by the committee.

(1) To lessen the threat of nuclear war

We must insist on aggressive arms control initiatives and negotiations. The proposal contemplates a nuclear freeze, followed by major arms reductions.

The alternative proposal would eliminate procurement and research and development for destabilizing weapons systems (the M-X, the Trident II, Pershing II and Cruise missiles). These are weapons which are a threat to, rather than an enhancement of, our national security. While we may have to reluctantly accept some existing nuclear weaponry as necessary to deter nuclear war, we must reject the current nuclear buildup whose purpose is to arm the U.S. to fight, win and survive a nuclear war. The present U.S. nuclear arsenal (10,000 strategic 15,000 tactical warheads) is more than sufficient for any "deterrent" objective. Funding for the expensive and unnecessary B-1 bomber program is also eliminated.

In addition, funding is eliminated for the Department of Defense's misguided Star Wars proposals. The defensive capability of this strategic defense system is illusory; it will only lead to a false sense of security; and it will seriously distort the allocation of both human and financial resources. By funding the initial research and development for this program we will be committing the American taxpayer to pay for a program without having any estimate of the ultimate cost.

(2) To bring about a noninterventionist convention (nonnuclear) policy

We must insist that the proper U.S. defense policy is to defend U.S. security interests; not to intervene militarily in and against Third World countries around the world.

The committee seeks to increase the number of aircraft carrier battle groups from the present 13 to 15. The principal purpose of such battle groups, however, is to intervene against Third World countries. These battle groups would serve little purpose in any confrontation with the Soviet Union; devoting such an extensive part of our Naval budget to these expensive and useless forces is inappropriate. I would initially maintain the current level of 13 battle groups with phased reductions to 10 groups over the next five years. Significant cuts are made in the procurement of battle group escort and support ships (where the bulk of the task force spending occurs) and in the reduced carrier air wings.

I also reject the build-up of the Rapid Deployment Force and eliminate all funds for this program. The only role of the Rapid Deployment Force, now called the U.S. Central Command, is to promote an interventionist U.S. policy against small countries and to "protect" the oil fields of the Middle East and Southwest Asia. We have the Marines; the role of the Marines is to be a RDF, but even this role should be limited, and not increased.

(3) To reduce the number of troops stationed in and for Europe and Asia

Many of those proposing nuclear constraint advocate an expansion of our ground forces in Europe. This idea should be rejected on two grounds: it would vastly increase military spending, thereby escalating the deficit and reducing social spending; moreover, it makes no sense in terms of our national defense.

Approximately, some 35-45 percent of the military budget currently is predicated on the United States fighting a prolonged land war in Europe. The possibility of the United States again fighting a major land war there is unlikely. Given that there is no such thing as a truly "conventional" force, and that all United States and Soviet forces are now nuclear-equipped, most analysts believe that there would be a virtually automatic escalation to nuclear exchanges; first "tactical" (Hiroshima scale) levels, then world-threatening "strategic" levels. Even making the incredible assumption that a war involving the Soviet Union, Europe, and the United States might avoid a nuclear confrontation, an extended European land war would still require a general mobilization. There is no need to maintain such a large standing Army to protect our national security interests. I propose reducing the number of Army divisions from 16 to 13 by fiscal year 1988.

(4) To seriously redirect procurement policies to reduce waste, abuse, and massive cost overruns

Cuts are made in various weapon systems which are redundant, ordered in larger than necessary quantities, having serious cost overruns, or simply too expensive for their military purpose. The recent publicity surrounding the Department of Defense's purchase of various dime-store hardware items for thousands of dollars per item are only recent examples of this outrageous practice.

(5) To move toward funding a major "conversion" employment program ($45 billion over the next five years)

The burden of a decision to eliminate or reduce certain weapon systems should be a national one and not concentrated in those cities and towns where those particular systems are produced. Thus, monies are included for approximately 300,000 jobs for fiscal year 1985 in areas where workers on military programs are displaced as a result of weapon systems cuts.

Even these proposed cuts are constrained by the nature of the present Defense debate. The bulk of monies authorized in the last few budget years for military weapons and hardware is only now being disbursed. For example, it is interesting to note that even if all new procurement were cut this year, the fiscal year 1985 spending for procurement would only be reduced by $13 billion.

This is because the focus of concern in the Congress with regard to the massive military spending program is its impact on the deficit. Since outlays, not budget authority, affect the current year budget deficit, the reduction of current year outlays takes congressional precedence. Since procurement outlays take place over 5-7 years, cutting procurement provides few outlay reductions and the pressure to cut procurement lessens. Given this, the Congress then makes its reductions in precisely those accounts where spending should be the highest: readiness, personnel and military construction. Yet, in subsequent years, procurement comes back to haunt the budget process and the operational readiness of our forces is lessened, despite the massive increases in spending.

In sum, what is needed is a policy based on the defense of United States interests, not an arming for nuclear war or for intervention around the world. Such a policy would allow greatly reduced levels of military spending, would create fewer distortions in the economy at large, and would significantly enhance the prospects for peace and real arms reductions.●

HOLOCAUST

HON. HAROLD E. FORD

OF TENNESSEE

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, April 30, 1984

● Mr. FORD of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, the attempted extermination of the Jewish people by Nazi Germany some 40 years ago still raises certain questions about the essence of human nature. How could any member of the human race inflict the sort of pain and torture as was experienced by the Jews in the 1940's? How could others, not directly involved in the murders, stand by and condone such activity? Last, during this commemoration of the Days of Remembrance for the Victims of the Holocaust, we must ask ourselves whether such a barbaric act could reoccur in today's modern and sophisticated world? Even after years of discussion and documentation, the answer is still unfortunately yes.

It is not my intent to send shock or fear through the minds of those reading this statement. However, atrocities against mankind have occurred throughout history, the Jews not being the only target. Such acts continually transpire over time because the world community cannot remember its mistakes. Prof. Elie Wiesel has often said that a world unable to remember its mistakes is destined to repeat those same errors. Thus, an extremely dangerous seed is planted by those who advocate that the Holocaust was an exaggeration of the Jewish mind.

The work of Professor Wiesel and the Holocaust Council is especially important because they make us pause from our everyday routine to remember. The slaughter of 6 million identities is a thought many of us have difficulty comprehending. Yet if we do not take the time to understand, to fathom what actually took place, each one of us is at fault. Collectively, we must work to insure that those who have forgotten the agony suffered by so many Jewish families remember what took place in the concentration camps of Germany. It is only in this sense that such an unthinkable act against humanity can be prevented from occurring in the future.●

GET SERIOUS ABOUT POPULATION

HON. JAMES H. SCHEUER

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, May 2, 1984

● Mr. SCHEUER. Mr. Speaker, the New York Times recently ran an editorial on the importance of international population assistance and family planning. I believe that this article is particularly important, and I would like to commend it to the attention of my colleagues.

GET SERIOUS ABOUT POPULATION

Family planning isn't murder. But that's not obvious to American right-to-lifers who contend that efforts to defuse the population bomb in poor countries support forced abortions in China. On this tangential ground, they would wreck a promising aid program that actually strengthens families. That is morality going haywire.

Over 20 years the United States has spent about $2 billion to help poorer countries lower the fertility rate that threatens in 16 years to increase the world's population of 4.5 billion by a third. Such birth rates destroy economic growth and threaten social stability.

In these circumstances, less is more. The crucial corollary of birth control is improved infant care; smaller families tend to be healthier and stronger. American aid has contributed significantly to this sensible end, in places like Mexico, Thailand, South Korea, Jamaica, Sri Lanka and Indonesia, and through the United Nations Fund for Population Activities. By law, not a penny can be spent on forced sterilizations or abortions.

When first begun, the effort was attacked by Moscow as an imperialist plot to sap the strength of poor societies. Now that argument has been adopted by the Moral Majority and its allies, led in Congress by Senator Helms. They detect an "anti-growth philosophy" and urge delays and conditions before Congress votes the next $265 million.

The campaign's emotional kicker is the charge that a contribution of $38 million to the U.N. fund pays for forced abortions in China, a practice deplored in a recent book by Steven Mosher. China denies his assertions and the facts are in dispute, but there's no dispute about the U.N. fund's policy. Rafael Salas, its executive director, insists it has never funded abortions anywhere.

But that is waved away on the ground that money for China's population program indirectly supports abortion. And so it may. By the same token, aid to any U.N. agency indirectly serves some alien purpose. By this absurd measure, there's no program that does not threaten some American's sensibility.●

A CONGRESSIONAL SALUTE TO ALBERT J. EYRAUD, JR.

HON. GLENN M. ANDERSON

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, May 2, 1984

● Mr. ANDERSON. Mr. Speaker, on May 11 the many friends of Albert J. Eyraud, Jr., will gather in Los Angeles at the Jonathan Club to honor him in conjunction with the California Trucking Association's First Golden Eagle Award Dinner.

Al Eyraud, a third generation Californian, is a graduate of the University of California at Los Angeles (UCLA). In 1934, he joined Asbury Transportation Co. and later was to serve in virtually all its departments. Today, Al is president and principal stockholder of Asbury System; Asbury Transportation Co.; Asbury Contractors, Inc.; and Asbury Freight Lines. Under Al's leadership and keen business sense, the Asbury name is well-known and respected throughout the Western half of the United States.

Over the years, Al has furthered the advancement of the transportation industry through his affiliation in numerous civic and business organizations. These include: Los Angeles Metropolitan Transit Authority; Southern California Rapid Transit District; Motor Truck Association of Southern California; Western Highway Institute; American Trucking Association; Western Motor Tariff Bureau; Drivers' Safety Center; and Transport Clearings of Los Angeles.

I personally believe that Al's proudest accomplishment was the merger of the Motor Truck Association of Southern California with the Truck Owners' Association of California, which had represented carriers in norther California, into the present California Trucking Association (CTA). Al served as president of the CTA in 1977 and chairman of the board in 1978. Today, it is the largest and most prestigious trucking association in the country.

It is also important to note that Al has generously devoted much of his time to charitable activities and civic organizations. These include: Boys' Club of Hollywood; Boys' Club of Wilmington; American Cancer Society; Los Angeles County Heart Association; Arthritis and Rheumatism Association; and the Los Angeles Chamber of Commerce. He has also been extensively involved with the University of Southern California; Pepperdine University; Los Angeles County Museum of Art; and the Los Angeles County Museum.

Mr. Speaker, Al Eyraud is an exceptional American. He has always worked in making the community a better place to live and work. We are all grateful for all he has done and confident that he will continue these efforts in the years ahead.

My wife, Lee, joins me in congratulating Al on this special occasion and we wish him and his lovely wife, Sherry, and their four sons, Frank, Stephen, A. J. Eyraud III, and Barron the best in all their future endeavors.●

IN SUPPORT OF THE RULE ON THE FEDERAL RECLAMATION HYDROELECTRIC POWERPLANTS AUTHORIZATION ACT

HON. BARBARA F. VUCANOVICH

OF NEVADA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, May 2, 1984

● Mrs. VUCANOVICH. Mr. Speaker, I rise in support of the rule on the Federal Reclamation Hydroelectric Powerplants Authorization Act. It is extremely important that this bill be brought to the floor, and passed.

The bill would authorize construction of powerplants at seven existing dams. I beleive that constructing powerplants at existing facilities is a cost effective and environmentally sound approach to energy development.

The bill would also legislate a solution to a long standing controversy over the allocation of power from Hoover Dam. The parties were in court over this issue but have decided that negotiation is preferable to litigation. I, for one, do not want to see this controversy back in the courts for two reasons.

First, litigation is extremely expensive to all involved including the Federal Government. This means that the taxpayer will bear the ultimate burden if we fail to pass this rule, and eventually the bill itself. Second, the Hoover contracts expire in 1987. We have an opportunity now to insure a firm energy supply to the people in Arizona, California, and Nevada. If we fail to act, and the controversy is not resolved, these States would experience extreme economic hardship.

There has been talk of amendments to the bill. Though I think the issues should be debated, and supported this rule that provides for debate, I do not support any amendment to the bill that has not been accepted by my chairman on the Interior Committee. These amendments would cripple the bill and would have much more wide-ranging effect than just the projects in this bill. I hope that all Members will keep this in mind when we begin consideration of the bill.

I urge my colleagues to join me in supporting this rule so that we can move on to consideration of a very important piece of legislation.●

PERSONAL EXPLANATION

HON. GERALDINE A. FERRARO

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, May 2, 1984

● Ms. FERRARO. Mr. Speaker, long-held commitments outside of Washington, D.C. prevented me from being able to vote on rollcalls 91 through 106 during the week of April 23. Had I been present, I would have voted as follows:

Rollcall No. 91, passage of S. 373, to provide comprehensive national policy dealing with national needs and objectives in the Arctic, "yea."

Rollcall No. 92, quorum call.

Rollcall No. 93, an amendment to reduce certain authorizations for university advanced scientific computers, "no."

Rollcall No. 94, an amendment to reduce the authorizations by 3.9 percent across the board in National Science Foundation programs, "no."

Rollcall No. 95, passage of H.R. 4974, to authorize appropriations for the National Science Foundation for fiscal years 1985 and 1986, "aye."

Rollcall No. 96, approval of the journal of the last day's proceedings, "yea."

Rollcall No. 97, agreeing to House Resolution 490, the rulemaking in order S. 2570, to continue the transition provisions of the Bankruptcy Act until May 26, 1984, "yea."

Rollcall No. 98, motion to recommit the bill S. 2570 to the Committee on the Judiciary with instructions to extend its provisions until May 24, 1984 instead of until May 26, 1984, "no."

Rollcall No. 99, passage of S. 2570, a bill to continue the transition provisions of the Bankruptcy Act until May 26, 1984, "aye."

Rollcall No. 100, agreeing to House Resolution 481, the rulemaking in order H.R. 5172, the National Bureau of Standards authorization, "yea."

Rollcall No. 101, quorum call.

Rollcall No. 102, a substitute amendment to reduce funding for National Bureau of Standards programs by $2.4 million, "yea."

Rollcall No. 103, an amendment to reduce funding for National Bureau of Standards programs by $7.25 million, "no."

Rollcall No. 104, an amendment to reduce funding for National Bureau of Standards programs by $2.4 million, "yea."

Rollcall No. 105, an amendment to strike the metric evaluation provisions, "no."

Rollcall No. 106, motion that the Committee of the Whole rise, "aye."●

THE SOVIET VIEW OF CENTRAL AMERICA

HON. J. KENNETH ROBINSON

OF VIRGINIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, May 2, 1984

● Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. Speaker, I believe it to be most important, as we move toward further authorizations and appropriations relative to the military and economic support of friendly nations in Latin America, and, in particular, Central America, that we give thought to just what our objectives are in the Western Hemisphere—what are we trying to accomplish, in the interest of true self-determination in the countries of the hemisphere, and in our own national interest.

It has been contended by some, including commentators in the news media, that we have no coherent policy in Central America. I submit that we do have such a policy, and that it is both logical and defensible.

The President has set forth the four basic goals of the United States in Central America:

We will support democracy, reform, and human freedom.

We will support economic development.

We will support the security of the region's threatened nations.

We will support dialog and negotiations.

I think we should look also at the goals of the Soviet Union in Central America as evidenced by their actions:

First, the Soviets seek to exploit the social, economic, political, and military situation in Central America and to expand the Cuban and Nicaraguan totalitarian footholds in the Americas.

Second, the Soviets seek an offensive strategic capability in the Caribbean aimed at United States use of the seas in times of crisis.

Third, the Soviets seek to promote turmoil in Central America to tie up American resources, permitting the Soviets a freer hand in other areas central to their global strategy.

The United States stands for a just peace in Central America, insuring self-determination for all the peoples of that region through fully democratic processes. The Soviet Union stands for totalitarian exploitation of the peoples of that region to advance its global hegemonic designs.

The first Soviet objective, expansion of its Cuban-Nicaraguan totalitarian footholds is well underway, as the Soviets pursue the objective through their Cuban and Nicaraguan proxies. The judgments of the House Intelligence Committee in May 1983 make this clear:

A major portion of the arms and other material sent by Cuba and other Communist countries to the Salvadoran insurgents transits Nicaragua with the permission and assistance of the Sandinistas.

The Salvadoran insurgents rely on the use of sites in Nicaragua, some of which are located in Managua itself, for communications, command-and-control, and for the logistics to conduct their financial, material, and propaganda activities.

The Sandinista leadership sanctions and directly facilitates all of the above functions.

Nicaragua provides a range of other support activities, including secure transit of insurgents to and from Cuba, and assistance to the insurgents in planning their activities in El Salvador.

These, remember, are the judgments of the House Intelligence Committee, where the majority party has numerical control. It is clear to all that the Soviet-Cuban-Nicaraguan axis is exporting totalitarian revolution by military force in Central America. Thus, the Soviets are well on their way toward achieving their first strategic objective.

The Soviets are also achieving their second objective, an offensive strategic interdiction capability in the Caribbean aimed at United States use of the seas in a crisis. The importance of the Caribbean to the security of the United States and its allies can hardly be overstated. As the President has said, two-thirds of U.S. foreign trade, including oil, passes through the Caribbean. In the event of a crisis in Europe, half of our supplies for NATO must pass through these waters. In the event of actual war in Europe or the Middle East, areas vital to U.S. interests, elements of the Pacific Fleet may need to transit the Panama Canal and the Caribbean to join the Atlantic and Mediterranean Fleets. The Panama Canal and the Caribbean combine as a throat of U.S. commerce and naval logistics which the Soviets would dearly love to choke.

The Soviets are off to a dangerously effective start in developing the capability to choke us in the Caribbean. Soviet military aircraft regularly visit bases in Cuba. A submarine base exists in Cuba capable of servicing Soviet submarines. The Soviets also have a combat brigade in Cuba. The Soviets have stepped up the scale of their naval exercises in the Caribbean, including one recent major exercise 75 miles off the coast of Louisiana in the Gulf of Mexico.

In addition, the Soviets have provided Cuba with substantial air and naval forces, which have engaged in integrated large scale exercises with Soviet ships in the Caribbean. The Soviets are thus on the way to achieving their second objective in the Caribbean region, a strategic offensive interdiction capability directed at the United States.

The Soviets are not doing quite as well with their third objective of tying up American resources in Central America, permitting the Soviets a freer hand elsewhere. The administration has been quite careful to avoid playing into Soviet hands by committing the U.S. Armed Forces to combat in Central America. The President has instead given more limited, measured repsonses to the Soviet-Cuban-Nicaraguan efforts.

Instead of intervening with its Armed Forces, the United States is providing economic and military assistance to El Salvador, Guatemala, and Honduras, the countries the Cubans and Sandinistas seek to subvert. The United States is also assisting the Nicaraguan resistance in efforts to hinder the ability of the Sandinistas to export totalitarian revolution by force in neighboring countries. In this measured manner, the United States is helping the embattled free peoples of Central America to help themselves.

Those in the Congress who seek to undermine these limited measures for assistance to El Salvador, other Central American nations, and the Nicaraguan resistance must understand that the alternatives to these limited measures may ultimately mean the use of the U.S. Armed Forces, at some future date, or acceptance of inevitable domination of Central America by the Soviet-Cuban-Nicaraguan axis. Such domination is, I am confident, not acceptable to the American people, since it would represent a grave threat to the security of the United States. Commitment of the U.S. Armed Forces to combat in Central America, however, is also unwise, as it contributes to achievement of the Soviet objective of tying down the United States in Central America so the Soviet Union can advance its interests in other regions, such as the Middle East and Central Europe. It is thus clear that the best response in the current situation is the measured one of continuing economic and military assistance to El Salvador, other embattled nations in the region, and the Nicaraguan resistance.

The administration's response to Soviet-Cuban-Nicaraguan activities in Central America will advance U.S. objectives and counter Soviet objectives with the least cost and risk of war. The administration deserves our bipartisan support for its Central American program.●

COMMEMORATING THE 14TH RECOGNITION OF ARMENIAN MARTYRS' DAY

HON. JAMES M. JEFFORDS

OF VERMONT

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, April 24, 1984

● Mr. JEFFORDS. Mr. Speaker, Armenian Martyrs' Day has been observed by this body for 14 years. This day is a time for reflection on the great suffering that was inflicted on the Armenian people during the genocide of 1915 to 1923, which drove most of the survivors into exile. The many contributions that Armenian-Americans have made to this country is further testimony to the strength of the Armenian people.

I would like to add my voice to the numerous voices of my colleagues who have spoken out in indignation, both at the grevious genocide of Armenians and the consistent denial of the Turkish Government that this incident ever occurred. Even as recently as last month, our own administration, not wanting to "muck up relations with the Turkish Government," expressed doubt that there is sufficient evidence to prove that the massacre happened.

In my mind, this is inexcusable. This refusal to face the facts of history not only prevents atonement for such terrible actions, but also stands in the way of learning from history. In order to prevent the recurrence of such genocide, including that of the Jews in World War II, we must recognize and study these incidents. Only by facing head-on the consequences of man's inhumanity to man can we attempt to move beyond such gross atrocities.

Recent events have proven that we cannot afford to forget either the victims or the causes of this genocide. Not only must we continually reaffirm historical fact to prevent denial of the past, but we must also force attention to the results of human excess and hatred. We cannot afford to lull ourselves into believing that we are now not capable of such genocide. But rather we must hold up before all nations historical proof of what one nation has done to another. Only through this constant reminder can we hope to prevent a recurrence of the Armenian tragedy somewhere else in the world.●

THE 60TH ANNIVERSARY OF AZA OF B'NAI B'RITH

HON. LAWRENCE J. SMITH

OF FLORIDA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, May 2, 1984

● Mr. SMITH of Florida. Mr. Speaker, today I rise to pay tribute to a widely known and esteemed American Jewish institution, B'nai B'rith. This year, B'nai B'rith, the first international service organization, is celebrating its 140th anniversary. This year also marks the 60th anniversary of the Aleph Zadik Aleph (AZA) youth fraternity of B'nai B'rith.

For the past 60 years, AZA has contributed to the lives of over 300,000 men making them richer in mind and body. As the oldest and largest youth organization in the United States. AZA is proud to boast that its alumni are active leaders of their communities: politicians, doctors, and lawyers. AZA was founded in the Midwest and, even today, it is still recognized as a grassroots organization committed to youth in America.

Through AZA's fivefold program—social, athletic, community service, educational and cultural, and religious—high school age Jewish youth learn the true meaning of Aleph Zadik Aleph: brotherly love, benevolence, and harmony. AZA provides young men with an opportunity to participate and develop their own programs. A democratic functioning organization, AZA selects its own officers, plans an agenda, and carries out its own activities.

The youth leadership training program is AZA's major accomplishment. In leadership training camp, AZA trains young men and women how to become prime movers in society. They learn how to motivate and work with others. The training program reinforces AZA's fivefold program, and the students gain an insight into their self-worth as they become well-rounded individuals.

The religious part of the AZA program is important but not dogmatic. Jewish youth are united together by their Judaism, however, they transcend this common bond to become better human beings. These young men choose their Jewish identity through experience and knowledge. AZA provides them with the groundwork for them to understand Judaism, but each individual must come to terms and decide for himself how he will identify and live his life as a Jew.

On May 5, the Florida Association of B'nai B'rith is holding their annual convention on Miami Beach. Local B'nai B'rith chapters nationwide are honoring AZA at their opening ceremonies and will focus on the theme of youth during their respective conventions. On May 3, 1984, a balloon launch is taking place at 3 p.m. in celebration of AZA's anniversary. Over 100 communities throughout the United States and Canada are participating in this symbolic act of unity. Each balloon will have a card attached to it, and B'nai B'rith has asked that if the balloon is found, to please fill out the card and mail it to them.

I strongly feel that programs such as AZA of B'nai B'rith are very important in the character building and molding of our children. My son Grant is an active member of AZA Brandeis Chapter. B'nai B'rith is devoted to youth education, and inspirational programing in pursuit of developing mature young adults to inherit our Earth. I express my gratitude to B'nai B'rith for supporting the strengthening of our youth and for imbuing in them the values that will allow them to function as Americans and as Jews in our society.●

A TRIBUTE TO LT. COMDR. RICHARD SCHNEIDER

HON. THOMAS R. CARPER

OF DELAWARE

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, May 2, 1984

● Mr. CARPER. Mr. Speaker, it is my privilege today to bring to the attention of my colleagues in the Congress the outstanding achievements of Lt. Comdr. Richard Schneider, of Delaware. Lieutenant Commander Schneider was selected by the Board of the Reserve Officers Association as the first annual recipient of the Outstanding Coast Guard Reserve Junior Officer Award of 1983.

Lieutenant Commander Schneider graduated from the Coast Guard Academy in 1968 and then, served on active duty for 7½ years. While on active duty, Lieutenant Commander Schneider earned the Coast Guard Achievement Medal as well as the Naval Commendation Medal. As a reserve officer, Lieutenant Commander Schneider earned the U.S. Coast Guard Unit Commendation Medal and recognition from the Delaware Legislature as the Commanding Officer of the Coast Guard Reserve Unit Station—Indian River, Rehoboth Bay, Del.

Presently, Lieutenant Commander Schneider serves as the executive director of the College of Marine Studies at the University of Delaware, which also includes management of the Marine Studies Complex at Lewes. His civic involvement includes serving as choirmaster at Faith Baptist Church in Wilmington, DE, as well as being a member of the Boy Scout's Eagle Review Board.

I ask you to join with me and the residents of Delaware in commending Lieutenant Commander Schneider for his ongoing public dedication and outstanding performance as a Coast Guard Reserve Officer. As an officer and a citizen, Lieutenant Commander Schneider has set a high standard for dedication and service for Delaware and the country.●

DALTON CHESS TEAM PLACES SECOND IN NATIONAL TOURNAMENT

HON. BILL GREEN

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, May 2, 1984

● Mr. GREEN. Mr. Speaker, I would like to bring to the attention of my colleagues the outstanding achievement of the Dalton School chess team, representing the Dalton School—a private school within the district I represent. In the recent national primary school chess championship tournament, held in Syracuse, NY, the Dalton team missed winning first place by only half a point.

This in itself is an extraordinary victory, and is made especially worthy of our attention by the fact that the Dalton chess team has been playing for only 6 months; this year's participation in the national tournament is the team's first.

Under the direction of Coach Svetozar Jovanovic, 8 of the 10 students who competed placed in the top 40 of all those who played. I think the names and rankings of those who played are worthy of mention: Naomi Spiro (3), Josh Powe (18), Mickey Silvers (20), Spencer Rosscoff (21), David Arnett (24), Morgan Pehme (31), J. P. Lall (32), and Paul Kaplan (40); Giorgio Handman and Gordiana Spiro also participated in these games.

In this Chamber, where our debates are often long and dry, and where our moves rarely appear as elegant and deliberate as those moves made by a chess player, it is a pleasure for me to devote these few minutes to the victories of those on the Dalton chess team.●

A SALUTE TO THE SENIOR COMPANION PROGRAM

HON. PARREN J. MITCHELL

OF MARYLAND

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, May 2, 1984

● Mr. MITCHELL. Mr. Speaker, next month, the senior companion program will celebrate its 10th anniversary nationwide. As we know, this initiative is the newest of ACTION's Older American volunteer programs and its operation has certainly brightened and strengthened many communities. As we also know, the senior companion program provides meaningful opportunities for low-income elderly citizens to interact with their peers who have special needs. Additonally, the program provides a small stipend, which is particularly helpful to our elderly since they must bear the pressure of a fixed income in the face of rising costs of living.

As a Representative from the State of Maryland, I want to offer a special commendation for the Southern Maryland Tri-County Community Action Committee which administers the Senior Companion program. This committee operates in St. Mary's, Calvert, and Charles Counties. It is so reassuring to point to this operation and know that it is being run efficently, and with a genuine dedication to maximum service delivery.

It is important to note that this type of program goes far beyond the provision of routine companionship and services. The emotional security derived from this type of contact is imperative to our elderly; their usefulness is prioritized and their value to our society is clearly demonstrated. All too often, we quickly assume that our elderly cannot help themselves or each other. The Tri-County Community Action Committee rejects this notion and we are all beneficiaries of their continued dedication.

Let me again congratulate the committee on this glorious occassion and stress that their efforts serve as a shining example of what can be accomplished through courage, hard work, caring, good management, and a true dedication to the community.●

LEGISLATION INTRODUCED TO ALLOW STATES TO EXEMPT SEGMENTS OF THEIR HIGHWAYS TO LONGER, WIDER TRUCKS

HON. GERALDINE A. FERRARO

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, May 2, 1984

● Ms. FERRARO. Mr. Speaker, last year I introduced H.R. 2530, a bill to allow States to seek exemptions for segments of the Interstate Highway System that they believe cannot safely accommodate the longer, wider trucks now permitted to operate nationwide.

When the bill was first introduced, there were many people who did not know that a number of Interstate segments, especially in the Northeast, are woefully inadequate by today's design and safety standards. We have made a lot of progress in the past year in making people more aware of the problem, and the approach embodied in my bill has been endorsed by the U.S. Conference of Mayors, the American Automobile Association (AAA), and the American Association of State Highway and Transportation Officials (AASHTO).

The biggest change has been the Reagan administration's recent decision to support this essential safety legislation. Testifying before the Senate Commerce Committee on S. 2217, the Senate version of my bill, DOT Deputy Assistant Secretary

Philip Haseltine said, "* * * legislation such as S. 2217 would make our job easier."

In his testimony, Assistant Secretary Haseltine also made several suggestions that would, in my judgment, improve the legislation. Accordingly, today I am introducing, along with 15 of my colleagues, a revised version of the bill, entitled the Truck Safety Act of 1984, that incorporates a number of suggestions made by the administration.

The principal changes are:

Permitting the DOT Secretary to authorize exemptions on her own initiative, should the need arise. (H.R. 2530 required that a Governor initiate the exemption process.)

Authorizing exemptions of interstate segments from the width requirements in section 416 of the STAA (H.R. 2530 dealt only with safety problems related to truck length).

Mr. Speaker, I think this legislation represents a reasonable and responsible approach. It does not challenge the new Federal truck size and weight standard. It does not return regulatory authority to the States. It does not provide for the granting of blanket exemptions. It does not impede interstate commerce.

What it does is recognize what we all know to be true—that there is tremendous variation among segments on the Interstate System with respect to their age, design features, and traffic volume. When the local transportation officials—the ones who are on the scene and who are responsible for the highway network—when they feel that an interstate segment may be unsafe for larger trucks, I believe we should provide a mechanism for carefully reviewing their concerns. We have done this for the Federal-aid primary system; we should do no less for the Interstate System.●

IN HONOR OF THE MONTEBELLO WOMEN'S CLUB 75TH ANNIVERSARY

HON. MATTHEW G. MARTINEZ

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, May 2, 1984

● Mr. MARTINEZ. Mr. Speaker, on April 6, 1984, the Montebello Women's Club celebrated their 75th anniversary of their first meeting of May 6, 1909. This was the first civic club organized in the city of Montebello.

The Montebello Women's Club has always played an active role in community affairs. They are political, but nonpartisan. Through their local, State, and national affiliation they are kept well informed of the legislation that would affect women, children, and our Nation's well-being. They have taken an active part in child welfare issues such as child pornography and child labor laws.

The first library in Montebello was established by the Montebello Women's Club. They furnished the location and staffed it until the county assumed responsibility.

To celebrate our Nation's Bicentennial, they raised the funds to purchase and install an electronic flagpole in Acuna Park through community projects.

This fine group has many other accomplishments to boast of. They are responsible for the placement of the Memorial gunsite on Bluff and Washington which commemorated the final skirmish between California and Mexico. For 25 years they have run the well-baby clinic in Montebello, which they initially established. We can thank them for many of the lovely trees planted in the city park. Each month they provide food, gifts, and entertainment for the veterans at Sawtelle.

They have been instrumental in furthering the education of Montebello youth by providing scholarships, sponsoring speech contests, music students, and arts and crafts shows.

The Montebello Women's Club is a cultural as well as civic club. They provide speakers to their members on a wide variety of topics. The club's garden section enjoys studying and planting. Members participate in the annual district sewing contest and enter their art work in the district art show.

The Montebello Women's Club has a long, distinguished history of which they can be very proud. I ask my colleagues to join me today in commending past and present members of the Montebello Women's Club for their 75 years of dedicated service to their community.●

OUTSTANDING JOURNALISTS

HON. BEVERLY B. BYRON

OF MARYLAND

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, May 2, 1984

● Mrs. BYRON. Mr. Speaker, I would like to bring my colleagues' attention to the outstanding achievements of the Beall High School yearbook staff in Cumberland, Md., and their adviser, Mrs. Ellen Arnone. The Mountaineer was one of nine high school yearbooks to receive the prestigious Gold Crown Award of the Columbia Scholastic Press Association, while Mrs. Arnone was one of 13 teachers nationwide to receive the "Certificate of Merit" for "continuous and devoted service as an adviser to student publications."

The Gold Crown award is the highest honor given to a student publication by the CSPA, an organization founded in 1924 by Columbia University. It represents the top 1 percent of the 2,776 publications evaluated by the CSPA in 1983.

Mrs. Ellen Arnone has taught in Allegany County for 18 years, and is a member of several journalism organizations. She is a fine example of a dedicated teacher who gives her students the benefit of years of experience.

Our educational system has come in for substantial criticism recently. While seeking to improve, we should also encourage excellence. The Mountaineer staff and Mrs. Ellen Arnone have achieved it, and I hope my colleagues will join me in congratulating them.●

DR. ARMENTA D. THORNTON—45 YEARS OF DEDICATED SERVICE

HON. MERVYN M. DYMALLY

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, May 2, 1984

● Mr. DYMALLY. Mr. Speaker, I wish to call the attention of my colleagues to one of the truly outstanding citizens of my congressional district, Dr. Armenta D. Thornton. Recently, Congressman HAWKINS and I had the privilege of joining a multitude of Dr. Thornton's friends to pay tribute to her for 45 years of service to her church and her community. Now I want to make my colleagues aware of the many contributions this much loved and much respected woman has made.

Born in Topeka, Kans., in 1913, she made the Los Angeles area her home in 1938. In our area she has been a member of the Mount Zion Baptist Church, the Israel Baptist Church, and is presently a member of the Citizens of Zion Baptist Church. Her skillful touch has benefited all levels of activity in the church. She has given Bible instructions through numerous auxiliaries. She has been State president of the Baptist Training Union. She has been an instructor at Reed Christian College and Providence Theological Seminary. And she has lectured widely at the local, district, State, and national levels.

In addition to being a magnificent teacher of Christian theology, she is a musician of considerable merit. She has organized many choirs, served as choir director, pianist, organist and has coordinated statewide choir workshops. At Citizens of Zion Church she has been assistant minister of music. It is one thing to direct or play music. It is quite another to compose. Dr. Thornton is renowned for the operettas she has composed for the B. T. Newman choir.

Her leadership skills have been long recognized, and the trust of her colleagues is reflected in the number of responsible posts she has held. She organized the mission department of her church and has been mission president. She has been chairwoman of deaconesses as well as superintendent of Sunday school. She is now a member of the Ladies of Grace Deaconess Board, assistant minister of music, and a member of the senior choir.

Her respect for Christian as well as secular education has been an inspiration to others. In addition to her Christian teaching, she has for 20 years been a teacher at 92d Street School. She holds six degrees, including the doctorate and has studied at three colleges. For a woman as active and civic minded as Dr. Armenta Thornton, church work and teaching have not been enough. She has also been deeply involved in local community work through her membership in civic groups and societies. She is a member of Eastern Star, Senior Citizens, and is a Toastmistress. I expect, however, that Dr. Thornton would count as her greatest joy and her greatest accomplishment the fact that she is an outstanding mother. Her regard for the high calling of motherhood is reflected in her membership on the mother's board of citizens of Zion Baptist Church.

In a time when our sense of values and our dedication to others is tried daily, Dr. Thornton has stood as a beacon to all of us. For 45 years she has given of herself to better the station of others. We can only hope to emulate her example.●

THE SESQUICENTENNIAL OF THE TRINITY UNITED METHODIST CHURCH IN PORT CLINTON, OH

HON. DELBERT L. LATTA

OF OHIO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, May 2, 1984

● Mr. LATTA. Mr. Speaker, I rise today to pay tribute to the members of the Trinity United Methodist Church in Port Clinton, OH, on the occasion of the sesquicentennial of the Port Clinton church and to honor the bicentennial of Methodism in the United States.

On December 24, 1784, 60 circuit-riding preachers were called together in Baltimore to consider John Wesley's Methodist plan for ordaining preachers. This historic conference gave birth to the first denomination to be organized in America. As the Methodist movement was in its infancy in America two other churches were being formed—the Church of the United Brethren and the Evangelical Association. These two churches were to be united with each in 1946 and with the Methodist Church in 1968 to form the United Methodist Church of the United States.

In 1833, 50 years after the celebrated conference in Baltimore, the Reverends Austin, Wilcox, and Allen came from Lower Sandusky, now the city of Fremont, and conducted meetings with such success that Port Clinton, which was founded 7 years earlier, became a regular preaching appointment for Methodism in northwestern Ohio.

The story of this Port Clinton church is the classic story of a group of dedicated people brought together by the work of the Lord and determined to create a living memorial in their work. It was a small beginning in Port Clinton as these circuit riders were sent to hold these meetings—they traveled on horseback through the wilderness. The circuit started in Fremont, and came to Port Clinton, Danbury, Marblehead Peninsula, and reached 7 miles up the Portage River embracing 22 different appointments. In 1838 there were 76 members, and the village of Port Clinton, had fewer than 60 homes.

Soon the number grew and it was realized that a new building was needed for the worshippers. In the early history of Ottawa County, OH, no man took a more prominent part or did more to mold and influence the work of his time than Henry T. Miller, the first class leader who helped organize the Methodist Society. As was the custom, the first class was formed in 1834, the year Port Clinton became a regular preaching point.

The first Methodist Church in Port Clinton was built in 1852. It was a wooden structure. Three ministers were initially paid a total salary of $485 in 1854. The new building only fueled this dedicated people's desire to grow.

The purchase price for the lots where the church and parsonage stood was $200 and the cost of the church was $1,500. Much of the labor was donated by the faithful members. The building was a single room without a basement and was heated by two wood stoves and lighted by kerosene.

In the meantime, the earlier years of the 19th century were marked by the spread of the Sunday school movement in America. By 1835 Sunday schools were encouraged in every place where they could be started and maintained. Methodists formed a Sunday School Union to promote the extension of these schools for the religious training of the young and move to guarantee suitable literature for them. Hence, the Sunday school became a principal source of prospective members for the Port Clinton church.

By 1888, the membership of the church had increased considerably and a new structure was needed. A new church, costing $12,000, was officially dedicated on November 19, 1890, which was raised and paid for in 6 years. Former President Rutherford B. Hayes, who lived in Fremont and whose wife, Lucy, was a staunch Methodist sent $1 explaining that he received many such requests and sent the single note only because he was a neighbor.

The ministry of the new church approached their jobs with the same vigor and zeal which has earned today's church its place of leadership. Groundbreaking on the current building was done in June 1964, and, construction continued until its dedication on September 26, 1971.

Mr. Speaker, the story of Trinity United Methodist Church is a story of growth and a story of people dedicated to furthering their beliefs. On May 20, 1984, the congregation of this marvelous church will celebrate its 150th anniversary. Many things have happened in the last 150 years since that first small group of Christians gathered to worship but the quality of the leadership of its members has never ceased being intertwined in the making of Port Clinton a better place in which to live.

In closing, it is my fervent hope that the Port Clinton Trinity Methodist Church and its dedicated servants of God will be blessed with continued success. Their dedication should be a beacon to be followed by all people desiring to carry forward the work of the Lord.●

DOUGLAS FILES' CONSTITUTION COMPOSITION

HON. BOB McEWEN

OF OHIO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, May 2, 1984

● Mr. McEWEN. Mr. Speaker, I commend to the attention of my colleagues a composition written by Douglas Files of Springboro, OH, entitled "My Role In Upholding Our Constitution." Mr. Files advocates Americans need to take a more responsible role regarding the duties of their citizenship. I believe that his essay illustrates the refreshing attitude of our young adults and warrants the consideration of all Americans.

The composition follows:

MY ROLE IN UPHOLDING OUR CONSTITUTION

A long chain of cars was speeding on the interstate. Suddenly, a police car came into view with its siren blaring and its lights flashing. One man saw the policeman signal to him to pull over to the side of the road. He did so and when the officer came to his car window, the man protested. "Everyone else in that line of cars was going just as fast as I was; why did you pull me over?" "Well," replied the officer, "you were the only one who would stop."

This short anecdote illustrates the attitude of all too many Americans today. We, like the people who would not stop for the policeman, do not take enough responsibility toward the duties of citizenship. One of the best ways for us to uphold our Constitution is to take responsibility. This may be done in the school, in the church, or in the community. In my opinion, one of the best ways to fulfill your duties as a citizen is to vote. If you do not bother to vote, apathy is shown and this is a very bad trait for a person to possess. Worse, however, would be for this to occur throughout an entire nation. This is true because if it were to become too great on a national level, many things that might have been accomplished normally would not be with a large proportion of apathetic citizens.

I believe that it is a good idea to involve oneself in many activities and I have participated in school, church, and community organizations. Involvement in these ways shows a commitment to our Constitution through people sharing their individual talents. When I am an adult and parent I am sure I will join many organizations for children such as scouting and sports groups. These activities make me feel as if I have done my part to improve America by sharing my talents.

I very much appreciate the rights I have according to our Constitution although I am afraid many people take these rights for granted. Do you realize you can belong to any religion you wish and worship openly? Do you realize that if you are dissatisfied with something, even within the government, that you can criticize it? Do you realize that you can vote for the candidates for public office that you support, and that you can even campaign for them? Even if you are not old enough to vote, you can write to your Representative or Senator and express your opinion. I have done this on numerous occasions. These and many more rights belong to you and I, and we often take them for granted. This, I believe, is sad when you consider the men who sacrificed their lives so that we might have these freedoms. The very least we can do is acknowledge them.

I see two basic ways that I, as a citizen, can uphold our Constitution. I can fulfill what I feel are my responsibilities toward this nation through (1) keeping its laws and voting, and (2) sharing my individual talents with others, thus demonstrating my concern for the people of this country.

When the policeman stopped the man speeding on the interstate, the man protested, saying "Everyone else in that line of cars was going just as fast as I was; why did you stop me?" The officer replied, "Well, you were the only one who would stop." Instead of being irritated, the man should have felt as if he had done his duty. Obviously, the best answer would have been to not speed at all. However, if something of this nature does turn up I call upon you to be that one to stop, be that one to show responsibility, and be that one to care. Thank you.●

EXTENSION OF THE TARGETED JOBS TAX CREDIT

HON. CARROLL A. CAMPBELL, JR.

OF SOUTH CAROLINA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, May 2, 1984

● Mr. CAMPBELL. Mr. Speaker, as a cosponsor of H.R. 5094, which would extend the targeted jobs tax credit for 5 years, I am hopeful that my colleagues and the prospective conferees will carefully consider the merits of this legislation. While I also support the Senate proposal to extend the TJTC for 3 years, I believe the 5-year period gives employers the needed time and assurance that a tax law will be on the books. This will allow the employers to fully commit personnel to screen applicants for eligibility and commit people to jobs without fear of the program's termination.

The TJTC was enacted in 1978 to encourage employers to hire individuals with special employment needs. These general groups include vocational rehabilitation referrals, economically disadvantaged youth, economically disadvantaged Vietnam-era veterans, economically disadvantaged cooperative education students, SSI recipients, and other targeted groups.

I know that the TJTC has assisted many disadvantaged people in my State. The South Carolina Vocational Rehabilitation Department considers the TJTC crucial as an incentive for employers to consider hiring the handicapped. They have made extensive use of the TJTC, and they believe that a longer extension time period would be beneficial. I believe that maximum efficiency has not been attained in this program, and that a longer extension will enable more disadvantaged people to find gainful employment.

Mr. Speaker, the TJTC will be utilized to employ more than 300,000 workers nationwide in fiscal year 1984. This is a significant number of employees, many who most likely would not be employed without this program. I urge my colleagues to consider the merits of this legislation and support a longer extension period.●

CENTRAL AMERICA

HON. BILL ALEXANDER

OF ARKANSAS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, May 2, 1984

● Mr. ALEXANDER. Mr. Speaker, this morning I, along with my colleagues Mr. REGULA of Ohio and Mr. FOWLER of Georgia, held a news conference to discuss our recent trip to Honduras, Panama, and Colombia. I include their news releases as part of the official RECORD of today's proceedings:

NEWS RELEASE OF RALPH REGULA

After having visited the country of Honduras and the Southern Command Post in Panama with my colleagues, Mr. Alexander and Mr. Fowler, it has become evident that a bipartisan approach to the conflicts in the area is advisable and possible.

The presence of U.S. military personnel in Honduras for training exercises has greatly improved the preparedness of U.S. troops. The humanitarian acts in which they are also involved reinforces the strong relationship being established between the United States and Honduras. In addition, the work of the Peace Corps has been very effective and is a valuable asset to improving conditions for the people of Honduras.

One disturbing fact which became apparent during the trip is the lack of a clearly defined U.S. policy in Central America. What are our goals and what steps are we taking to achieve them? We need to develop a clearly defined bipartisan policy which is complimentary to the Contadora negotiations already in progress. The presence of a diplomatic element equal to its military counterpart is needed if the United States expects a negotiated settlement.

I believe there are certain steps which can be taken in the area. We should continue our pressure on El Salvador in the area of human rights and land reform. The Caribbean Basin Initiative as well as elements of the Kissinger Commission recommendations should be supported. I would also like to see a policy developed which includes the participation of our allies. A stable Central America is also in their best interests. By assisting these countries with economic aid, our allies would be contributing to the effort.

I also strongly believe that U.S. military personnel should not be introduced into the region in a combat capacity. Any fighting that is occurring between countries or particular groups within those countries needs to be discouraged by diplomatic means. Their problems are regional and should be solved in that context. The U.S. can assist this process by developing a stable atmosphere in which to negotiate.

We are requesting a meeting with Secretary Schultz to discuss U.S. policy in the area. In this regard, I would also like to dispel the feeling that the U.S. Congress is the enemy of our administration's foreign policy. We need to work hand in hand in developing a coherent policy. If the initiative is taken between the two branches, I firmly believe cooperation will be forthcoming from this body.

PRESS CONFERENCE REMARKS OF HON. WYCHE FOWLER, JR.

At the outset, I would like to extend condolences to the President of Colombia, Belisario Betacur, and to the Colombian people over the assassination of the Colombian Minister of Justice Rodrigo Lara Bonilla on Monday evening. Our delegation had held talks with President Betacur earlier that very day at which Minister Lara Bonilla's stepped up war against the insidious drug trade had been a major topic. We told President Betacur, and we reaffirm today, that the United States government, on a bipartisan basis, stands strongly behind any and all effective measures for controlling the drug trafficking that poses a severe threat to the well-being of both of our societies.

Aside from the drug issue, our trip to Honduras, Panama and Colombia focused on the U.S. Military presence in Honduras, and the current status of the Contadora peace process. Briefly stated, we found that the United States is committed to an enhanced, if not permanent, military presence in Honduras. We also found that while our friends in Central America disagree over many things with regard to U.S. policy in the area, they agree with virtual unanimity that they are extremely unsure of the U.S. commitment to a negotiated settlement. Furthermore, they agreed that it would be helpful to the peace process if the U.S. had serious bilateral talks with Nicaragua with an eye toward resolving our differences with the two governments which we claim are the primary sources of the region's instability.

As constitutionally-sworn policy-makers our primary concern must be to preserve and protect the interests of the United States. Today we are at a critical juncture in our Central American policy. If we continue our present course, we run substantial risk of regional war—with or without direct U.S. combat participation. An alternative is the advancement of our national interests through the negotiation process. Negotiations may not give us everything we as a nation would prefer, but in my opinion the military options produce fewer benefits at a much higher cost.

As the foreign minister from one of our Central American allies said to us, the military option is not working for anyone. In the short time that we were in Central America we saw 14 year olds being trained in combat tactics. We heard requests for more military aid from countries whose standards of living are among the lowest in the Western Hemisphere. We received reports of military stalemate, arms build-ups, and increasing violence.

We did encounter a number of encouraging signs within the region of a willingness to peacefully resolve internal and external differences. Some of the Contadora foreign ministers expressed guarded optimism about the possibility of their producing a comprehensive and verifiable regional peace treaty. But we have heard such indications before, and they have always evaporated before a new military action.

Though the hour is late, and though in the past we have had serious differences with the Administration, it is not too late to commit our full support to the Contadora process and to re-examine the policy ramifications of our nation's present course in Central America.●

THE DAILY NEWS—A COMMUNITY INSTITUTION

HON. JOSEPH M. GAYDOS

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, May 2, 1984

● Mr. GAYDOS. Mr. Speaker, for the past century the Daily News of McKeesport has been the well of information for residents of at least 22 communities in southwest Pennsylvania.

The logotype at the top of each day's front page proudly proclaims "The News" to be "more than a newspaper—a community institution." And, so it is. Its readers long ago adopted the philosophy: "If it's not in The Daily News, it didn't happen."

Next month, however, the tables are to be turned on "The News." Public attention will be focused on the paper itself. A "Salute to the The Daily News," commemorating 100 years of publication, is being planned by the Mon-Yough Chamber of Commerce for May 16 in the Youghiogheny Country Club.

"The News" began building its reputation back in July 1884, when the first issue of four pages rolled off an old-style cylinder press. Its founders were Harry S. and Wesley B. Dravo. Three years later they sold the paper and, in 1891, the Daily News Publishing Co. was incorporated under J.L. Devenny and J. B. Shale. Ownership changed again in 1905, when the paper came under control of J. Denny O'Neil, E.W. Pitts, and George Altmeyer.

In 1925, the paper was purchased by State Senator William D. Mansfield, Dr. H.S. Arthur, Charles R. Shaw, and Will J. Cox. Senator Mansfield served as president and editor until his death in 1952, when his son, W.D. Mansfield, Jr., became the publisher and served in that capacity until his death in 1966.

Today, the Daily News is led by Thomas D. Mansfield as publisher and editor. It has continued to grow and is considered one of the most widely respected newspapers in Pennsylvania. Under his direction, the paper recently completed a computerized production system that culminated more than 5 years of research and planning. The expenditure of time, effort, and major capital investment is a strong testimonial to the company's devotion to its goal of presenting its readers with a superior publication.

Mr. Speaker, I ask the Congress of the United States to join me today in extending official congratulations to the officers and employees of the Daily News upon reaching this milestone in the company's history. It is, indeed, more than a newspaper. It is, in truth, a community institution.●

ARMENIAN MARTYRS' DAY

HON. GERALDINE A. FERRARO

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, April 24, 1984

● Ms. FERRARO. Mr. Speaker, the annual observance in this body of Armenian Martyr's Day is an important time for reflection on this century's repeated instances of the most vile human rights abuse imaginable—genocide. On April 24, 1915, the Turkish government arrested—and eventually executed—hundreds of leaders of the Armenian community in that country. Those executions marked the start of a campaign of extermination that would last 8 years and would claim the lives of 1½ million Armenians.

The horrible crime of 69 years ago remains important today. In this modern age, so far removed from the Turkey of 1915, the current Turkish Government continues to attempt to expunge the historical record. There was no genocide, we are told. It was just part of a civil war, we are told. There were atrocities committed on both sides, we are told.

We must not be deceived or lulled into accepting these distortions. We must resist the urge to say, in the interests of modern geopolitical considerations, that perhaps the events of 1915 to 1923 in Turkey were not as the historical record shows them in fact to have been.

The record must be kept intact, and must be protected against whitewash. The purpose of remembering is not to castigate any particular nation. We do not remember the Holocaust against the Jews because we wish to impute guilt to the German nation.

The reason we recall these horrors is that we wish to prevent them from reoccurring. The best chance the human race has of preventing future genocides is by facing the truth.

We have already seen the results of the failure to remember the truth. In 1939, as he prepared to begin his "Final Solution" against the Jewish people of Europe, Adolf Hitler said, "Who today speaks of the annihilation of the Armenians?"

The failure to remember the massacre of 1915 made it easier for Hitler to conduct his war against the Jews. The words of the philosopher Santayana state the chilling postscript to these most inhuman chapters in history: "Those who do not remember the mistakes of the past are condemned to repeat them."

We must not permit those mistakes to be repeated.●

A VOTE FOR HUMANITY

HON. RAYMOND J. McGRATH

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, May 2, 1984

● Mr. McGRATH. Mr. Speaker, while the advent of spring reawakens us to the simple joys of life, there is one segment of our society for whom this is especially true. Yet it is a time for mixed emotions—reveling in life, but also somberly reflecting upon that part of human nature which inflicted a cruel and vile death upon victims of the Holocaust.

For survivors of the Holocaust, memories of the death camps never go away. The faces, the voices, the cries—the stench of death, never disappear.

Throughout the Days of Remembrance of the Holocaust it is essential for all of us to recall the sordid deeds of Nazism which has left its evil scar upon all humanity.

In this great democracy we have taken a large step in easing the pain of the victims and the survivors with the passage of H.R. 5100, which makes authorizations for the U.S. Holocaust Memorial Council. We have taken hold of a part of the responsibility which we all must share. We must remember, and therein pledge never again.

As members of the New York City Holocaust Memorial Commission have stated, the urgency for this type of institution is great, greater than ever.

The world has become too technologically advanced for selective annihilation. The victims of the next Holocaust are not likely to be only Jews—but everyone.●

A TRIBUTE TO AMBASSADOR TERENCE TODMAN

HON. RON de LUGO

OF THE VIRGIN ISLANDS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, May 2, 1984

● Mr. DE LUGO. Mr. Speaker, on March 31, the people of the Virgin Islands commemorated the 67th anniversary of Transfer Day, that day in 1917 on which the United States of America formerly took ownership of the Virgin Islands from Denmark. To mark the anniversary this year, Virgin Islanders United paid tribute at a special testimonial dinner to the Honorable Terence A. Todman, the U.S. Ambassador to Denmark. That decision could not have been more appropriate and I highly commend Edward Phillips, the President of this new organization, and its membership for their decision.

For Ambassador Todman is a Virgin Islander, born on St. Thomas 9 years after that historic Transfer Day, 1917. He is the highest ranking Virgin Islander in the diplomatic corps, and indeed, the highest ranking black diplomat in the United States. That this native son of the U.S. Virgin Islands should now be the U.S. Ambassador to Denmark is a historical full circle, and speaks volumes of our achievements as Virgin Islanders and as citizens of the United States.

Ambassador Todman is a career diplomat of the highest caliber. He began his diplomatic career in 1952 in the State Department's Bureau of Near Eastern and South Asian Affairs as Desk Officer for India, Ceylon, and Nepal. He was then assigned to the Trusteeship Branch on the Bureau of International Organization Affairs and served as the U.S. Representative on the Petitions and Rural Economic Development Committees of the U.N. Trusteeship Council. This was followed by assignments as Political Officer in New Delhi, Tunis, and as Deputy Chief of Mission in Togo, and then a return to Washington as Country Director for Kenya, Tanzania, Uganda, and the Seychelles.

He served as Assistant Secretary of State for Inter-American Affairs, and was Ambassador to Chad from 1969 to 1972, to Guinea from 1972 to 1975 and to Costa Rica from 1975 to 1977.

In July of 1978 be became Ambassador to Spain, and performed so admirably and ably in that office, particularly in his negotiations on the defense treaty with Spain, that he was asked to stay in his post in 1981. That his special abilities and professionalism were recognized by President Reagan in retaining Ambassador Todman at his post until the treaty negotiations were completed is a credit to this administration. But that Ambassador Todman received from Spain one of its highest awards, the Grand Cross of the Highest Order of Isabela la Catolica, in 1983 in recognition of his service, and yet received no special recognition from our Government is indeed a disappointment.

I would urge that the President give every consideration to singling out the achievements of Ambassador Todman. For his career is a tribute to what America stands for, to the very best of our democratic way of life. He is a credit to the people of the United States, to the Department of State, and especially to the people of the U.S. Virgin Islands. We in the U.S. Virgin Islands are rightly proud of Terence Todman and we would hope that we could join with our fellow Americans in paying tribute to this outstanding man through a national honor that he so well deserves. I would urge, Mr. Speaker, that my colleagues support me in asking the President to consider this request.●

SENATE COMMITTEE MEETINGS

Title IV of Senate Resolution 4, agreed to by the Senate on February 4, 1977, calls for establishment of a system for a computerized schedule of all meetings and hearings of Senate committees, subcommittees, joint committees, and committees of conference. This title requires all such committees to notify the Office of the Senate Daily Digest—designated by the Rules Committee—of the time, place, and purpose of the meetings, when scheduled, and any cancellations or changes in the meetings as they occur.

As an additional procedure along with the computerization of this information, the Office of the Senate Daily Digest will prepare this information for printing in the Extensions of Remarks section of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD on Monday and Wednesday of each week.

Any changes in committee scheduling will be indicated by placement of an asterisk to the left of the name of the unit conducting such meetings.

Meetings scheduled for Thursday, May 3, 1984, may be found in the Daily Digest of today's RECORD.

(Legislative day of Monday, April 30, 1984)

The Senate met at 10 a.m., on the expiration of the recess, and was called to order by the Honorable DAN QUAYLE, a Senator from the State of Indiana.

Mr. QUAYLE. The prayer this morning will be delivered by Dr. Elton Trueblood, president of the Yokefellow International of Richmond, Ind. He is sponsored by Senator LUGAR and Senator EAST.

PRAYER

Dr. D. Elton Trueblood, president and founder of Yokefellow International, Richmond, Ind., offered the following prayer:

Bow your heads reverently in prayer.

O Thou who hast brought our beloved Nation into existence, and who hast sustained it for so many years, help us to understand Thy purpose in this wondrous experiment. We are grateful that we have been enabled to endure through many dangers; we are glad to be part of a nation that is not ashamed to pray. Teach us to value the pattern of life which combines the secular and the sacred in a fashion that is truly unique. We are confident that Thy guidance will continue through all vicissitudes, so that we can pass on our heritage undiminished.

Give wisdom, we pray, to our President and to the makers of our laws that they may be faithful in this holy calling. Use us, unworthy as we are, as the instruments of Thy purpose, not merely for ourselves, but for all mankind. May this National Day of Prayer confirm our faith, establish our hope, and enlarge our charity. Amen.

APPOINTMENT OF ACTING PRESIDENT PRO TEMPORE

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will please read a communication to the Senate from the President pro tempore (Mr. THURMOND).

The assistant legislative clerk read the following letter:

U.S. SENATE,
PRESIDENT PRO TEMPORE,
Washington, D.C., May 3, 1984.

To the Senate:

Under the provisions of rule I, section 3, of the Standing Rules of the Senate, I hereby appoint the Honorable DAN QUAYLE, a Senator from the State of Indiana, to perform the duties of the Chair.

STROM THURMOND,
President pro tempore.

Mr. QUAYLE thereupon assumed the chair as Acting President pro tempore.

RECOGNITION OF THE MAJORITY LEADER

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. The majority leader is recognized.

Mr. BAKER. I thank the Chair.

WELCOME TO DR. TRUEBLOOD

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, may I first welcome Dr. Trueblood to our midst. He is our guest Chaplain today, another in a distinguished list of guest Chaplains that occasionally grace this Chamber.

I was especially taken with the words in Dr. Trueblood's prayer about the unique combination of the secular and sacred. I believe that and I congratulate him on that observation. I think it is fundamental to the essence of our system. We are happy to have Dr. Trueblood.

I am also told by my staff—I hope this information is correct—that Dr. Trueblood is a professor emeritus at Earlham College in Indiana and that Senator JOHN EAST and his wife both attended that college. So we are doubly in Dr. Trueblood's debt for his prayer this morning and for his good training of our colleague from North Carolina, who does such an extraordinarily good job in the Senate.

SENATE SCHEDULE

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, today after the two leaders, the Senator from Wisconsin (Mr. PROXMIRE) will be recognized for 15 minutes, followed by morning business until 10:30 a.m. Then we shall be back on the pending business which is H.R. 2163. The Chiles amendment will be the pending question.

I hope, Mr. President, that we can finish that amendment today at a fairly early hour. I have no reason to hope that other than hoping it. We still have a lot to do and as Members know and the minority leader knows, for some days now, I have expressed my pining desire to see this bill finished today.

Mr. President, we still have a lot to do. We have this amendment and we have—I speculate that we have a medicare-medicaid sequence of one or more amendments to be offered, which were preserved and protected by unanimous consent when we were considering an earlier amendment to this bill. There will be one or more cap amendments and goodness knows what else.

I should say, Mr. President, that the Senate will be in late today and we shall do our very best to finish. If we do not finish, we shall be in on Monday on this bill, but I hope we can finish.

The Senator from Oklahoma reminds me that there is another package dealing with a minor CPI proposal. There are a number of those and similar amendments that will be offered as well.

THE SECRET

I urge Senators to consider that we should keep the number of amendments down as far as we can. I think we should resist the temptation to talk excessively. We should not say everything we know. I sometimes think I am the only man in town who still has a secret. It is not a very good secret, but it is mine, and I am going to keep it, because it has the unique status of being the only kept secret in Washington. That is another subject for another day.

For those of the press who are wondering about my secret, I have no secret at all; I only say that. That is the only way I can keep the secret.

Mr. President, I expect to ask the Senate to adjourn today until next week. I shall negotiate with the minority leader on the usual boilerplate language with which to accomplish an adjournment. I suppose that the Senate will convene on Monday at 11 a.m., but I shall refrain from making those arrangements until a little later. I do not expect the Senate to be in session tomorrow, as I announced on Monday.

THE PRESIDENT'S TRIP TO CHINA

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, I would like to take this opportunity on the return of President Reagan and Secretary Shultz from China to commend the President for his historic visit from that country. It is apparent to me that the trip was an enormous success and a significant demonstration that the relationship begun by President Nixon 12 years ago with the world's most populous country continues to evolve in ways that serve the interests of both the United States and China.

Obviously, the United States and China continue to have different perspectives on a number of issues. However, it is a measure of the maturity of the relationship that the President can travel to Peking, adhere to his principles, speak candidly and forthrightly on issues of importance to the United States, be treated with equal candor by the leadership of China in return and still depart with the relationship amicably and realistically enhanced.

I would observe as well that the substantive accomplishments of the visit are important and add to the growing number of practical benefits of a bilateral nature. In addition to over 7 hours of formal meetings, the President's visit included agreement on such matters as peaceful nuclear cooperation, taxation, and cultural exchanges. These achievements clearly demonstrate that there is much on which the United States and China can cooperate. Although there are certainly limits to what we should expect and our expectations must be realistic, I am confident that these areas of cooperation will continue to expand.

Finally, Mr. President, having just returned myself from Japan, I am reminded of the incredible potential that exists in the aggregate among the nations in the Pacific Basin. It is becoming almost a cliche to say that the 21st century will be the "century of the Pacific," but it is no less true. For that reason alone, it was important that the President visit China, be exposed to the Chinese people, and have the opportunity to express to them the abiding friendship of the American people. I congratulate both the President and Secretary Shultz on the success of the trip and welcome them both back to Washington.

Mr. President, I believe that is all I have this morning. I thank the minority leader and all Senators. I yield the floor.

RECOGNITION OF THE MINORITY LEADER

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. KASTEN). Under the previous order, the Democratic leader is recognized.

Mr. BYRD. I thank the Chair.

AFGHANISTAN: RECENT DEVELOPMENTS

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, recently I addressed the Senate on the subject of the latest Soviet onslaught in Afghanistan. I noted at the time that the Soviet's massive ground attacks and their resort to heavy bomber assaults indicated a desperation after 4 years of unsuccessful occupation. The use of heavy bombers is particularly noteworthy because it seems to be the first time since World War II that Soviet planes attacked targets from bases within the Soviet Union.

These bombers are concentrating on civilian targets north of Kabul in the hopes of breaking the will of the Afghan people. This is part of the Soviet plan which includes destruction of crops and livestock. Taken together, these moves are calculated to force the Afghans to flee from their country. Since the Soviets cannot subjugate the freedom-loving Afghan people, they are trying to depopulate the countryside by a brutal and repressive policy.

This policy reflects a near total failure for the Soviet military after 4 years of occupation. The most recent drive into the Panjshir Valley north of Kabul marks the seventh attempt by the Soviets to establish themselves in the area of the Panjshir Valley, and there is some indication that they will fail for the seventh time. They have been unable to engage the resistance army headed by Mr. Massoud. That army waits to pick its targets and comes down from the safety of the hills only to plague the Soviets with night attacks and surprise raids. The Afghans continue to fight the massive Soviet military buildup by picking the terms of battle. The Soviet military has achieved a near stalemate after 4 years of this kind of warfare, and they are feeling the strain.

The events in the Panjshir Valley are documented in several recent reports. I ask unanimous consent that the article entitled "Afghan Rebels Said To Elude Soviets," which appeared in the Washington Post, May 2, 1984, and the article entitled "The Bear Descends on the Lion," appearing in the May 7 edition of Time magazine, be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the articles were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the Washington Post, May 2, 1984]

AFGHAN REBELS SAID TO ELUDE SOVIETS

(By William Claiborne)

NEW DELHI, May 1.—Soviet ground forces have pushed more than halfway north through the strategic Panjshir Valley in Afghanistan but, for the most part, have been unable to engage Afghan anticommunist guerrillas in battle despite the most aggressive spring offensive yet, according to western diplomatic reports from Kabul that reached here today.

Reports from two diplomatic missions in Kabul said that the Afghan guerrillas had withdrawn into side valleys and mountain hideouts, leaving a force of up to 15,000 Soviet troops and 2,000 Afghan government troops, supported by 400 to 600 tanks and armored vehicles, largely unopposed, except for hit-and-run attacks.

The Soviet and Afghan forces, according to the diplomatic sources, reached the town of Rokha, about halfway up the winding, 70-mile corridor northeast of Kabul, and were advancing toward the town of Bazarak. The Panjshir is the main supply link between Kabul, the Afghan capital, and the Soviet Union.

The diplomatic missions received unconfirmed reports that the Soviet force had reached Anjuman Pass, at the northern end of the valley, but had not yet attempted to enter any of the side valleys into which the rebels have retreated.

Diplomatic sources described as false the claims by the Soviet-supported government of Babrak Karmal that the Panjshir guerrilla leader, Ahmed Shah Massoud, had been killed or captured. The sources said that Massoud, who had rejected Soviet moves to renew a 15-month truce in the valley, left Panjshir about April 18, three days before the Soviet offensive began, and was hiding in the vicinity.

Massoud's tactical withdrawal, the diplomatic sources said, followed the capture of an agent of Khad, the Afghan secret police, who had infiltrated the ranks of the mujaheddin guerrilla forces. The agent, the sources said, was a local commander and cousin of Massoud, and was believed to have already passed to the Soviet information about the guerrilla leader's movements.

The guerrillas' strategy, the diplomatic sources said, appears to be to remain sheltered in the mountains and peripheral valleys and engage the Soviet and loyalist Afghan troops only on the fringes of the Panjshir, and at night.

The diplomatic reports contrasted sharply with claims in the state-controlled media in Afghanistan that Soviet and Afghan forces were engaged in "mopping-up operations" in the Panjshir, and that the valley had been secured.

Because of the inaccessibility of the region it has been difficult to obtain current and accurate information about the Soviet ground thrust, dilomatic sources conceded, while also questioning the accuracy of claims by the rebels that thousands of Soviet troops have been killed in the latest battles.

One diplomatic source said that casualties of combatants on both sides were probably relatively low because of the guerrillas' tactical withdrawal, although civilian casualties are said to be high as a result of high-altitude bombing by Soviet TU16 Badger bombers and SU24 fighter-bombers for the first time in the Soviets' four-year occupation of Afghanistan.

The Kabul diplomatic missions said they had received reports that the advancing Soviet troops have been destroying crops and livestock as they have done in previous offensives in the Panjshir.

As recently as yesterday, the diplomatic sources said, guerrilla resistance in and around Kabul was intense, with frequent rocket and mortar attacks on Soviet and Afghan government installations south and west of the capital.

Soviet helicopter gunships were said to be staging nightly attacks on Mujahedin strongholds around Kabul, and conducting house-to-house searches for guerrillas.

In the western province of Herat, near the Iranian border, and in Kandahar, in the southern part of Afghanistan, heavy fighting was reported, along with frequent bombing attacks by Soviet warplanes.

[From Time Magazine, May 7, 1984]

THE BEAR DESCENDS ON THE LION

(By Pico Igee)

Ever since Soviet tanks rolled into Afghanistan on a cold day more than four years ago, the treacherous terrain of the Panjshir Valley has served local rebels as both sanctuary and symbol. The determined Mujahedin guerrillas have been nurtured by grain from its verdant hills, water from its mountain streams and shelter within caves in the shadow of its snow-capped peaks. Above all, the 70-mile-long valley has been the hideout and headquarters of Ahmad Shah Massoud, the charismatic 30-year-old Mujahedin leader who has united more than 5,000 squabbling resistance fighters under his shrewd and well-organized leadership.

Known as the Lion of Panjshir, Massoud has established a local political and judicial system, organized his own tax system, instituted classes in the use of rocket launchers and heavy artillery, and even set up schools and bus services throughout the valley. His Mujahedin have also hounded their Soviet invaders. Recently they captured and reportedly killed 23 Soviet agents disguised as Mujahedin. By persistently ambushing military convoys traveling between Kabul and the Soviet border, they have caused a severe fuel problem in the capital, a mere 40 miles to the south. Only two weeks ago they compounded that shortage by blowing up four strategically vital bridges. Small wonder, then, that the Soviets have shattered their 13-month truce with Massoud and mounted their fiercest attack since the invasion of Afghanistan in December 1979.

The Panjshir Valley has already survived six punishing assaults, but never has it faced more men or heavier air strikes. As many as 100 Soviet Tu-16 Badger bombers and Su-24 Fencer fighters saturated the area with high-altitude carpet bombing. In their wake came some 80 Mi-24 Hind assault helicopters, more than 500 tanks and armored personnel carriers and, according to Western diplomats, more than 20,000 troops, almost a fifth of the entire Soviet force in Afghanistan. The target of this unprecedented show of force was not so much the rebels as the civilians, who have apparently been lending them support. "The Soviets," charged Karen McKay, director of the Washington-based Committee for a Free Afghanistan, "have launched a genocidal program that Genghis Khan would have admired."

Government-run Radio Kabul was soon trumpeting victory, and the offical Soviet news agency TASS implies that Massoud's men had been routed and their leader captured or killed. Noted one Western diplomat in Moscow: "They would hardly claim anything that specific unless it were at least partly true." Others were not convinced. Afghan resistance spokesmen in Paris acknowledged that two attempts had been made upon the Lion's life, including one by an undercover agent who took aim from only 30 feet away. But they also insisted that rumors of Massoud's downfall were as overblown as those put about by Kabul two years ago. "There are no casualty figures, no reports of capture of arms and no description of clashes," said a Mujahedin official in New Delhi. "That makes me very doubtful of the claims."

Shortly after Yuri Andropov succeeded Leonid Brezhnev as Soviet leader in November 1982, there was talk in Moscow of a face-saving pullout from the costly war of attrition. But Konstantin Chernenko, who replaced Andropov after that leader's death last February, seems uninterested in the notion. "We detected a hardening once Chernenko came to power," say Abdullah Osman, head of the Mujahedin-run Union of Afghan Doctors. Sure enough, Soviet troops recently stepped up patrols along both the southeastern border with Pakistan and the western border with Iran. "If the enemies of the motherland do not surrender," warned TASS, "the state will crush them, no matter where they are and on what reactionary and imperialist forces they rely."

But all that is easier said than done. What the guerrillas lack in modern equipment and medicine they make up for in fierce patriotism and fiery Islamic zeal. British authorities estimate that the 100,000 rebels have taken as many as 12,000 Soviet lives during the 52-month campaign. Time has also learned that U.S. officials received reports last week that the insurgents managed to shoot down at least one enemy bomber. Meanwhile, they remain in control of nearly all of the countryside. In the Panjshir Valley, Massoud's men had reportedly sustained a healthy economy through a clandestine trade in semiprecious stones, while keeping their strongholds well stocked with munitions and food.

By the time the Soviet troops arrived last week, the Mujahedin had evacuated all civilians and were hunkering down in the relative safety of their mountain redoubts. "If the Soviets really want to dominate Afghanistan," said a Pentagon official, "it will take a million men." In the absence of such forces, foreign observers suspect that this year's annual spring offensive may last through the summer, then peter out in the usual stalemate. Says a defense analyst in Washington: "The Soviet will kill a lot of people and get even more Afghans enraged with them. But in the end, the situation will remain pretty much the way it is."

SENATOR BUMPERS' REMARKS BEFORE THE U.S. CHAMBER OF COMMERCE

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, we know our colleague, the senior Senator from Arkansas, to be among the most eloquent Members of this body. On Monday of this week, Senator BUMPERS delivered a very thoughtful and powerful speech before the U.S. Chamber of Commerce. I ask unanimous consent that his statement be printed in full in the RECORD so that our colleagues and those throughout the country who have the opportunity to peruse the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD might benefit from our colleague's persuasive and eloquent remarks.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

ADDRESS OF SENATOR DALE BUMPERS BEFORE U.S. CHAMBER OF COMMERCE, WASHINGTON, D.C., APRIL 3, 1984

We Americans don't handle subtleties very well. We prefer clear, simple solutions, even when they're wrong, to subtle or complicated solutions which are either misunderstood, distasteful or alien to our experience. So it was that in 1980 every adversity in our personal lives was blamed on Government; every conceivable failure, from drought to floods was blamed on Government. And so when the now-famous question was put: "Are you better off now than you were four years ago?" The answer was a resounding no, and the question galvanized political thought and dealt the Democrats the most resounding defeat ever. We were left in disarray, and we are still not a cohesive party, with an agreed platform, but there are some things we strongly believe.

If I were to repeat the 1980 question now, the answer would probably be a resounding yes. But if I ask the more sobering question, "Do you believe your children and grandchildren's future will be better as a result of this past three and a half years?"—you surely pause before answering.

If someone had told you four years ago that the national debt would be doubled in the next four years, you would have insisted on a saliva test for that person. If I had asked you four years ago would you vote for Ronald Reagan if you knew your share of the national debt, as well as every American's share, would rise from $4300 to $7700 in just four years, the answer would unquestionably have been no. Can this situation have developed under a President the linchpin of whose entire public career has been fiscal responsibility and elimination of deficit spending? Now David Stockman says we can anticipate $200–300 billion deficits as far as the eye can see.

I'm not blaming the American people, because the message was simple, beautiful and reassuring. But the flesh and blood reality is that we are facing an economic apocalypse, and the avoidance of this nightmare will not be by rhetoric, but by bold and drastic action.

The plan was doomed from birth. We were seduced into believing we could somehow cut taxes $750 billion, spend $1.8 trillion on defense in the same five-year period, and balance the budget. It was like the diet that promised a loss of weight by eating five chocolate sundaes a day. But we Democrats can't and shouldn't win by out-promising or offering simpler solutions than theirs.

If you believe the budget deficits can be remedied without a substantial tax increase, then you shouldn't vote Democratic. If you believe that cutting social spending is the only answer, don't vote Democratic because if you eliminate every single dime of social spending, from food stamps to the National Cancer Institute, from school lunches to immunization for children, we will still have a $60 billion deficit.

If you believe we can continue exorbitant and senseless spending on defense, 100 percent increases every four years, don't vote Democratic. The fight over defense spending is not between the patriotic and the unpatriotic, anymore than the school prayer fight was between the Godly and the ungodly. The fight is over whether we are growing stronger or weaker by buying every weapons system in sight—and encouraging waste and fraud by throwing such inordinate sums of money at an institution ill-prepared to spend it wisely.

If you believe it's fair to give people making over $80,000 per year an average tax break of $8,390 and those making $10,000 or less a $20 tax break, don't vote Democratic.

If you believe optimism is a substitute for reality and logic, don't vote Democratic.

The only honest promise to America now is for sacrifice, burdens, sweat and tears. It worked for New York City, it worked for Chrysler and it will work for us if we are bold and courageous enough to do it. But the equally important promise is that all the burdens be evenly shared. We must be tough enough to tell the truth, and we deserve your contempt if we try to seduce you with still more glittering promises than our opponent.

The President's down-payment proposal on the deficit is no down payment at all. If Congress passes his program to the letter, the deficit still goes up $20 billion to well over $200 billion in 1985 and more in '86 and '87. But White House aides wink and nod and hint that more drastic tax proposals are on the drawing boards, and the President can be persuaded in 1985. I don't argue with the politics of this, but economically it is devastating.

If this were a partisan Democrat saying these things—you would not be persuaded—but I speak for Gerald Ford, Marty Feldstein and Paul Volcker, George Will, Henry Kaufman and Milton Friedman.

As to our foreign policy, the President has indicated by suggestion, and the Secretary of State has said outright, that our policy in Lebanon failed because of Congress. How can that be? The President made the decision to deploy marines in Beirut without so much as a "by your leave" to Congress. Then when many of us spoke out and called it wrong-headed, a potential for disaster, and asked the President to invoke the War Powers Act, he said it was not Congress prerogative to meddle in this Presidential decision, and that the War Powers Act was unconstitutional anyway. Stung by this open rebuke, responsible Republican leaders in Congress, notably Howard Baker and Chuck Percy, but others also, warned the President that his position carried considerable risk in ignoring the law. And so he grudgingly agreed to allow Congress to invoke the War Powers Act, conditioned on the resolution giving him 18 months to accomplish the mission. The mission was (1) to bring political stability to the area and (2) to make certain all foreign forces were out of Lebanon.

First, the accomplishment of such a mission would have required not 1500 marines, but 200,000. But it was not Congress who forced our withdrawal within five months after the adoption of the resolution. It was a political decision to limit the political damage and to trust that the people of America have short memories. For whatever reason, I'm glad we're out.

Our involvement in Central America has already become a Hobson's choice between withdrawing and handing El Salvador to the Communists or becoming more deeply involved with money and men and probably losing anyway. We never seem to learn that dealing with oppressive dictators, such as Somoza, the Shah and others, is effortless and easy, but invariably costs us dearly. Now the Philippines are just ripe for a Communist take-over because of the now all-too-familiar conditions—intense poverty and oppression, while Imelda Marcos becomes one of the world's richest people.

I have never understood a foreign policy, the linchpin of which is the belief that every event in the world perceived to be adverse to us was hatched up in the Kremlin dining room; that every civil war, no matter how endemic, must become an East-West battleground with an American-imposed solution, usually military; and we never seem to learn that our weapons, sent so freely, last longer than our friendships. We left Vietnam the third most powerful nation militarily on Earth.

Finally, the threat of a nuclear apocalypse grows daily. While neither side negotiates, positions harden, and the rhetoric intensifies, the world waits for a terrorist, a computer malfunction or a madman to start the war that will end all wars. We Democrats favor a nuclear freeze, if nothing else, as a manifestation and simple affirmation that peace is preferable to war and life preferable to death. It is difficult to believe the President, who has roundly condemned all eight treaties we have ever signed with the Soviets, wants another one. Now he seeks a new Star Wars anti-ballistic missile system that will cost $25 billion just for the research; that will abrogate an existing, ratified ABM Treaty; that the Office of Technology Assessment and the most reputable scientists in the U.S. say won't work. It assumes that the Soviets will sit still and do nothing during the 15-20 year period of development and deployment. It assumes that cutting the decisionmaking time from 20 minutes to three minutes is not destabilizing, and as always, that this is the last hard strategic decision we'll ever have to make.

Congress is not anxious to approve this system, so you can expect a bipartisan commission to be appointed any day to study the pros and cons of the new Star Wars concept, and I'll save you the breathless anticipation now by telling you that the commission will report that there are indeed risks and that the costs will be great, but that we can't afford not to do it because the Soviets are well along with their system, etc., etc.

Bear one thing in mind: That if the system was 99 percent effective, 100 warheads would still get through—enough to begin the "nuclear winter" from which no plant life would survive and very little human life.

One of this Nation's most compelling problems is the indifference and apathy of our people toward our political system. Fed and nurtured by trendy, anti-Government rhetoric plus the always broken promises and lack of accountability, we are now to the place where only little Colombia in South America, of all the nations which allow their people to vote, votes a smaller percentage of its eligible voters than the United States. It is one of the most serious indictments of our society, and surely Jefferson must be weeping.

Why is it we exalt Government when it builds bombs and missiles, and condemn Government when it spends money to vaccinate children, provide health care to the poor and the elderly, fund crippled children's clinics and aid students who are bright and yearn for a college education but who come from families that can't possibly afford it. If this becomes an acceptable code of conduct, acceptable Government policy, if it becomes our national character, we will soon find, and maybe too late, that guns, tanks, planes and ships are only one element of our strength, and that our inner strength, equally important to our survival, has been sapped in order to bloat our military strength.

In 1980 Ronald Reagan said, "Government can't solve your problem, because government is the problem." It was the surest applause line of that campaign. I know how intrusive and inefficient and wasteful Government can be. But I also know how chaotic and unfair life would be without it. I know all the votes to cast and all the applause lines to use if my only goal is to be carried out of the Senate in a pine box. But I have already had more good fortune and more honors than I or anyone else could have hoped for in this life. Frank Church said one only need live with cancer all one's life to know that life is fickle and we will live to regret a value system that permits us to shave and hedge and rationalize.

Born poor, but to devout and loving parents, my father was a small-town merchant whose business was barely surviving when REA came to the rural southland. It enabled him to start selling electrical appliances to a new market.

In a small town where we choked on dust in the summer and bogged down in mud in the winter, where sewage ran down the ditches from overflowing outhouses and a few septic tanks, it was a caring Government in the 30's that gave us loans and grants to pave our streets and build a waste treatment facility.

And when I returned from three years in the Marine Corps following World War II, it was a thankful and magnanimous Government that allowed my brother and me to attend the best universities in this Nation on the G.I. Bill—without which I would not be standing here today.

And when Betty and I returned to our little hometown to begin my law practice and small business, and raise our beautiful children, we raised them free of the fear of polio and other childhood diseases that had been conquered because of vaccines developed with Government grants.

And it was a free and open political process guaranteed by the Constitution that allowed me, totally unknown, to run for Governor of my beloved State.

I believe in our economic system—even though like Government it can at times be abusive, inefficient, wasteful, and yes, repressive of small business. And while we Democrats believe that Government's role in the economy should be limited and selective, we also believe our national character as well as our cherished Judeo-Christian teachings demand that those of us at the top of the ladder must not step on the hands of those reaching for the first rung. This is not because we are tolerant or indolence and laziness, but because we believe we honor ourselves and strengthen our Nation when we honor the traditions that have made us great. If we would admit it, most of us who consider ourselves to have been rather successful have been so because of inordinate luck, a little help from Government, or because we chose our parents so well.

I believe in the politics of hope. This Nation's failures have invariably been caused by our leaders either deceiving us or manipulating us in order to conceal a hidden agenda; substituting rhetorical phrases as justification for broken promises. A constitutional amendment to balance the budget is no substitute for balancing the budget. A constitutional amendment, not to permit voluntary prayer in school, but to mandate "official" prayers, may be a dynamite election year campaign issue, but it polarizes us in an area we have always guarded most jealously, our religious beliefs and practices.

We can talk of peace while we double our defense budget and stonewall arms control.

We can make it an acceptable code of conduct to ignore or be insensitive to the less fortunate, or just dismiss those who care, as bleeding heart liberals. But our children will pay a high price for our indifference.

Democrats must quit being reticent about entitlements. No part of the budget can be sacred, and a tax system which has lost America's confidence must be overhauled—but it must be fair and perceived to be fair.

We can and we must remove the cancer of deficits, which left unattended will surely kill us. They can and must be eliminated by the end of this decade.

The people, as always, not the politicians, are the ones prepared to be realistic. We can argue forever about who has been worst in the past. I feel sure I would lose that argument to this audience. But that argument doesn't resolve anything either. It is the future that we must debate. The challenge we must accept is one that bodes well for both the weakest and the strongest among us; one that will provide the greatest hope for freedom, happiness and peace.

WEIRTON, W. VA. STEEL MILL—LARGEST ESOP

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, the May 7, 1984, issue of U.S. News & World Report carries an article about one of the largest 100 percent employee-owned stock-ownership plans or ESOP in the world, the steel mill in Weirton, W. Va. The success of this heroic and, at the time, risky undertaking by the employees to save the plant and preserve their jobs has, according to the workers, far outweighed any drawbacks that have been encountered. This venture is a tribute not only to American ingenuity, but also to the spirit and determination of the West Virginians who continue to take pride in the mill's reputation for quality steel production. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that this article be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

WHEN EMPLOYEES RUN THEIR OWN STEEL MILL

In this gritty, old steel town along the Ohio River, an experiment in employee ownership is trying to pump new life into one of the nation's most troubled basic industries. It is not easy.

By buying the sprawling 400-acre Weirton Steel plant here 3½ months ago, 9,000 workers hope to save their jobs and make a go of a shaky business. At a time when many big steelmakers are withdrawing from the industry, Weirton is betting it can succeed by making workers into owners.

"With the foreign competition we're facing, it's simply not possible for us to earn enough profit in the steel industry to pay the kind of wages we as American workers expect and also take care of stockholders," says Weirton Executive Vice President Carl Valdiserri. "Here, we're combining the two groups to have enough to go around."

Early result of the venture are encouraging. The company recently reported a profit of 9.7 million dollars in the first quarter of 1984—its first since 1981—and steel shipments are expected to exceed 2 million tons this year, up from 1.7 million tons in 1983.

Another payoff is a change in attitude. In their new role as owners of the mill, workers identify more closely than before with the day-to-day business of making a profit, company officials say. Notes Valdiserri: "We're 10 times more interested in doing the job. Welders who used to throw a welding rod away when it got down to 4 inches now wait until it's 2 inches."

Success is not coming cheap, however. To make a buyout possible, the 7,900 workers now actively employed at the mill and the 1,100 awaiting recall took a 20 percent cut in pay and benefits when they bought the mill from National Steel Corporation in January for 386 million dollars. They also agreed to a freeze on general wage increases for six years.

Not acquiring the plant would have cost them more. National, citing Weirton's deteriorating profitability, planned to convert it into a smaller finishing mill and trim its work force to no more than 1,500 employees. Most of Weirton's 26,000 residents expected National eventually to close the plant entirely—an act that would have wiped out the town's single biggest employer and devastated the community.

"The alternative to employee ownership was nothing at all," says Walter Bish, president of Weirton's Independent Steelworkers Union.

Even with the mill running at 80 percent of capacity, as it is now, the plant payroll is thousands of jobs below peak levels and unemployment in the area tops 12 percent. Many residents worry about the community's ability to provide steady employment in the years to come.

Father Charles Schneider, pastor of St. Joseph the Worker Roman Catholic Church, says young people, unlike their parents, no longer look to the plant for work after graduation from high school. They are fleeing Weirton for other parts of the country, where jobs are more plentiful and of greater variety.

Of 10 couples recently enrolled in premarriage classes at the church, three will be moving to Rhode Island, where the men found work as welders, while three others will make their homes in Louisiana, Texas and Arizona.

Workers see the change inside the mill. "I'm one of the youngest guys there now," says 29-year-old laborer Frank McMahon, an 11-year veteran. "You don't see 18 years olds around the plant any more."

Even those who still have jobs with the firm are not immune to the lure of greener pastures. Management is having trouble keeping valued mid-to-upper-level employees in the face of the wage freeze. Although the company can hold out the prospect of greater earnings potential from future profit-sharing and stock ownership, such incentives to stay often fall short compared with job offers from other companies where pay is not frozen.

"We're losing talent—that's one of our biggest problems," says Valdiserri. "It's a struggle to retain key people, especially in technical fields like electrical engineering and computers, where demand is greatest."

Observes Joe Mayernick, a former labor-relations supervisor at the plant and now executive director of the Weirton Chamber of Commerce: "It's sort of a chicken-and-egg problem. They need the talent to get the profits, but they need the profits to get the talent."

SAVED BY ESOP

Still, current problems pale in comparison with the effort required to pull off the purchase in the first place. Arranging the deal took more than a year and drew labor, management and townspeople together in a grass-roots campaign to save the plant by using a device known as an employee-stock-ownership plan, or ESOP.

Although more than 5,000 of these plans are in effect around the country, most are relatively small-scale profit-sharing programs set up for tax advantages, and none come close to involving as huge an operation as does the one in Weirton.

Besides being the biggest employee-owned company in the country, Weirton ranks among the nation's 10 largest steel producers, with an annual capacity of 2.5 million tons.

Because of the project's scope, high powered consultants such as the New York investment firm of Lazard Frères & Company were retained. Blue-chip lenders, led by Citicorp, lined up credit for the buyout.

Under the plan finally worked out, stock will be allocated to employees as debt is repaid and will ultimately be distributed after five years if Weirton's financial performance meets predetermined criteria. Overseeing the operation will be a 14-member board of directors composed of three representatives from management, three from labor and eight from outside the company.

A major reason the project managed to get off the ground was the mill's credibility as a top-notch steel supplier. For years, the plant has enjoyed a reputation among its beverage and food-container customers for producing high quality tin products, which account for 40 to 45 percent of its shipments. The rest is made up of flat-rolled steel for the automotive, appliance and construction industries.

While demand for tin plate is expected to fall 2 to 3 percent a year over the next five years before leveling off, analysts think Weirton's quality gives the company a good shot at increasing its share of a smaller market.

Another challenge: Competition from alternative forms of packaging, such as aluminum, laminated paperboard and plastic. To help counter this, Weirton is looking for new markets. The company recently completed its first successful trial of tin plate for use in oil-filter casings and is going after film-cartridge business. Since November, the firm has signed up 100 new customers.

RENOVATION A KEY

Still more pressing is the need to make major capital investments to upgrade the plant and its equipment. Feasibility studies on the employee buyout estimated that a billion dollars will have to be spent on the mill over the next decade to maintain its competitiveness.

This year alone, 62 million dollars is budgeted for modernization. "Our biggest hurdle is to generate sufficient profits to make these capital investments and get us as technologically efficient as our competitors," says Valdiserri. "To do that, we need five solid years."

Much depends on holding down labor costs for a work force long acknowledged to be the highest paid in the steel industry. Under the buyout agreement, Weirton's hourly labor costs—wages and benefits—were cut from $24.91 to $16.94 for hourly workers, from $19.80 to $13.46 for unionized salaried workers and from $21.93 to $14.91 for guards, with comparable percentage sacrifices by management. Cost-of-living adjustments were eliminated and holidays trimmed back from 11 to five.

Altogether, across-the-board cuts in total compensation are expected to reduce labor costs by 120 million dollars in 1984. Savings of 30 million dollars in 1984. Savings of 30 million dollars are expected from improved efficiency, with net operating profit of 88 million forecast this year.

Most workers are convinced that preserving their jobs through the buyout is well worth the givebacks. Nearly 90 percent of Weirton's employees voted last year for the plan, and union officials say feelings in favor of the move are even stronger now.

"Giving up something in my paycheck doesn't bother me," says 30-year-old electrician Bill Underwood. "At least I know my money's going back into the company."

Union officials think that overall labor-management relations are noticeably better. "We still have some problems, but there has been a great deal of improvement," says Bish.

With first-quarter results in, business and community leaders say residents are becoming more and more convinced that the plant will survive. At First National Bank of Weirton, car and mortgage lending is on the rise.

Says Harry Scammell, the bank's executive vice president: "There's confidence again in the community."

Still, no one minimizes the task ahead or the risk of failure. "People understand what they have to do," says Underwood, the Weirton electrician who just returned to work. "They know if they don't do it, it's their own fault—they can't blame anyone else. There are no scapegoats any more."

RECOGNITION OF SENATOR PROXMIRE

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Under the previous order, the Senator from Wisconsin is recognized.

SHOULD THE UNITED STATES ANNOUNCE THAT IT WILL NOT BE THE FIRST TO USE NUCLEAR WEAPONS?

Mr. PROXMIRE. Mr. President, some of the country's most thoughtful, senior foreign policy experts including George Kennan and McGeorge Bundy have urged the President of the United States to announce that the country will not be the first to use nuclear weapons. Indeed, George Kennan, who, incidentally, comes from Milwaukee, Wis., pleaded with the Truman administration way back in 1950 to abandon the principle of first use all together. Kennan contended then as he contends now that we cannot knowingly argue against nuclear proliferation as long as we believe and encourage others to believe that we in the Western World could never rely on our defense except by initiating the use of those nuclear weapons or at least basing our defense plans upon such initiation.

On the other hand, President Reagan insists on retaining the first use principle as a central tenet of our military policy. Indeed, first use has been an accepted and rarely challenged American military principle since we, in fact, initiated nuclear warfare against the Japanese in 1945. All eight Presidents of the United States who have served since then have indicated that we will not renounce the first use of nuclear weapons. What prospect is there that this country will renounce this principle? As we face the 1984 Presidential campaign, the Democratic candidates have competed strenuously for the antinuclear arms vote: the peace vote. That Democratic Presidential candidate field has now dwindled down to three candidates: Mondale, HART, and Jackson. These three seem likely to stay in the race all the way to the July Democratic Convention in San Francisco.

The general expectation today is that either HART or Mondale will win the Democratic nomination. So what chance is there that the American people will have a chance next November to elect a President who will favor a no first use of nuclear weapons policy? The answer is absolutely none. Both Senator HART and former Vice President Mondale made it clear in the New York CBS Democratic Presidential debate in March that they would not commit this country to a no first use of nuclear weapons.

Why is it that in every one of the eight administrations since President Truman this country has never waivered from this doctrine of first use? Democratic and Republican Presidents in varying attitudes toward arms control have not been willing to renounce our first use of nuclear weapons.

The Soviet Union has announced its commitment to no first use. Why do we not do the same? Why do we not take this step that could show countries throughout the world that this superpower will not rely on nuclear arms to stop a conventional assault by the Soviet Union in Europe or elsewhere? Why do we not remove the incentive for nuclear proliferation—the message that the cheap way for military defense is to build a nuclear arsenal?

The answer is that since the dawn of the nuclear arms era 39 years ago, this country has never been willing to rely solely on conventional arms for the defense of its vital security interests. A couple of years ago when Bundy, Kennan and others made their proposal to abandon first use, then Secretary of State Haig vigorously opposed it. Secretary Haig, a former general, former top commander of the North Atlantic Treaty forces, contended that the Soviet Union's heavy preponderance in tanks, manpower, and fighter planes could overwhelm conventional NATO forces in Europe. Only by resorting to tactical nuclear weapons could the military assure a successful defense against it.

Both Mondale and HART have tacitly agreed with that Haig argument. Both have acknowledged the key to a U.S. embrace of the no first use doctrine. That key is the same military policy that Secretary Haig called necessary. What is that policy? It is a major build up of U.S. conventional arms. Haig argued that this would require instituting military draft to increase our military manpower substantially. It would take a major commitment of greatly increased military equipment and material—especially to Europe. Haig's argument seems to have won surprisingly broad support. It pins Mondale and HART into a painfully difficult trap. Both have made a major commitment to holding down military spending. Both oppose a draft. Both also recognize that the threat to use tactical nuclear weapons represents a far cheaper answer to a potential Soviet invasion than a decision to go the conventional route. So it appears that this supreme and shocking irony would continue even in a liberal, pro-nuclear freeze administration. The peace loving United States will continue to insist on the right to the first use, that is, the initiation of the use of nuclear weapons. It is a first use that would almost certainly trigger the final war and the extermination of civilization. What an irony that it is a Communist regime, the Soviet Union, that has renounced the first use of nuclear weapons.

Mr. President, in view of the fact that this country sets such a profound, far-reaching example to the rest of the world, and we have to face the fact that we do, and that our military intelligence services tell us that within 16 years, that is, by the year 2000, 31 nations will have nuclear arsenals, it seems to this Senator we have to examine this question much more carefully. It is a terrible dilemma. It may mean that we will have to spend more on our conventional weapons. But it is something that, after all, if we set the example, we will be the first to use nuclear weapons. What example does that set, as I say, for many, many other countries which will have nuclear weapons, if our military intelligence is correct, within the next 16 years, by the 2000.

THE HOLOCAUST: AN EVENING OF COMMEMORATION

Mr. PROXMIRE. Mr. President, on April 29, the U.S. Holocaust Memorial Council commemorated the victims of the Holocaust at the Kenndey Center for the Performing Arts.

The evening drew on the legacy of the Holocaust through readings and music. Guest speakers included actress Helen Hayes; actors Lorne Greene, Michael York, and Joseph Wiseman; and television newsmen Ted Koppel and Tom Brokaw.

This was not solely an evening to entertain, but more importantly to inform and remember. "Tonight we ask that you hold your applause," Sigmund Strochlitz, chairman of the Holocaust Days of Remembrance Committee told the audience, "in respect for those who died whispering * * * or shouting in defiance."

In a letter read by Marshall Breger, the special assistant to the President for public liaison, President Reagan called the Holocaust "the ultimate horror" in which "it is virtually impossible to grasp the enormous amount of suffering felt by victims and survivors."

Striking accounts and performances included actress Meg Tilley's narration of the suicide of the young Jewish girls who preferred death to the nighttime visit of German soldiers. The Giora Fiedman Trio's folk music from the concentration camps and Nazi-controlled ghettos brought tears to the eyes of many in the audience.

Tom Brokaw of NBC News pointed out that "never before in our history had genocide been an all-pervasive government policy. Incredibly, the Jewish population's destruction took precedence over Germany's war efforts."

Mr. President, our sacred task is to insure that the memory of the Holocaust never fades—that its lessons are not forgotten. We must act in every way possible to prevent the recurrence of genocide, the most disgusting crime known to man.

The Senate has the opportunity to act. The Genocide Convention, written in response to the Holocaust, acknowledges that the international crime of genocide is morally wrong and must be punished. In 1948, the General Assembly, at the request of the United States, gave its unanimous approval 55 to 0, to the Genocide Convention.

Mr. President, the ratification of the Genocide Convention would be the most important, concrete commitment to Holocaust victims and survivors. Let us act now to support ratification of the Genocide Convention.

ROUTINE MORNING BUSINESS

The PRESIDING OFFICER. There will now be a period for the transaction of routine morning business.

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The bill clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

EXTENSION OF TIME FOR ROUTINE MORNING BUSINESS

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, it is 10:30 a.m. past, and we are not quite ready yet to go on with the pending business and the pending question.

Therefore, I ask unanimous consent that the time for the transaction of routine morning business be extended until not later than 11 a.m. under the same terms and conditions.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

HONG KONG BLUES

Mr. GOLDWATER. Mr. President, an editorial in the May 1, Wall Street Journal, discusses a major area of disagreement between Communist China and the United States that has been unreported in all the glamour about President Reagan's trip to the China mainland. Apparently the subject of Hong Kong was ignored or glossed over during the President's visit, yet talks between Great Britain and Red China to settle the future of Hong Kong after 1997 are nearing the final stages and Peking has put a deadline on those talks.

The population of Hong Kong, including the main island and the Kowloon Peninsula on the mainland and the adjoining new territories, is over 5 million people. The success of the private enterprise economy is an economic miracle story and ironically Hong Kong is the major source of foreign exchange for Communist China.

Can Hong Kong recover from or survive the latest crisis as it has from past reverses? The Peking regime has promised to allow Hong Kong to continue as a free port and business center as it is today with the status of an autonomous zone in China proper. But these pledges have the ring of earlier assurances given the people of Tibet before Red China cruelly suppressed all independence in that territory. Not many people remember it, or even want to think about it, but Red China was found guilty of committing genocide in Tibet by the International Commission of Jurists. Is that what is in store for Hong Kong, too?

The people of Hong Kong, 98 percent of whom are Chinese, can take no comfort in repeated suggestions that Red China's new Constitution will protect them. Several provisions of the Constitution retain all ultimate power in the Communist Party. According to article 67 of the new Constitution, for example, the standing committee on the so-called National People's Congress, a rubberstamp body for the party, may "annul any local regulations or decisions of autonomous regions which are found to contravene the Constitution, statutes, or the administrative rules and regulations." And article 89 of the Constitution warns similarly that the state council, which is the Cabinet, has the power "to alter or annul inappropriate decisions and orders" issued by any local authorities, including special administrative zones.

Since the four cardinal principles which govern each of Red China's constitutional provisions include a mandate to (1) follow the Socialist road, (2) retain Communist Party leadership, (3) follow through with what is called the "People's Democratic Dictatorship," and (4) follow "Marxism-Leninism and Mao Tse-tung thought," I do not see how Hong Kong has the slightest chance of keeping its present economic system. Red China is not known for its consistency of policy. At some time in the future, the administrative leaders of Hong Kong are bound to be accused by Peking of not following Socialist principles and be branded as counterrevolutionaries.

And this is not all. Article 17 of the Constitution provides that "all organizations and individuals are prohibited from disrupting by any means whatsoever, the orderly functioning of the Socialist economy or of the economic plans of the state." Article 22 makes it very clear what the plans must be. Article 22 provides that "the state opposes the influence of capitalist ideas."

So if I were a citizen of Hong Kong, I would not put too much faith in what Communist promises say I could do in the future. And, if this administration believes what it says about finding a new pragmatism among the dictators on Mainland China, then I think the President's advisers should examine what is happening to the free people of Hong Kong and show some concern about it.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the Wall Street Journal article of May 1 on this subject appear at this point in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

REVIEW AND OUTLOOK: THOSE HONG KONG BLUES

We've been following President Reagan's China tour, and it has been a good show: Mr. Reagan viewing that incredible clay army uncovered at Xian, the first lady hugging the adorable pandas, the president joking with students about the benefits of an acting course in college. The pundits, too, are praising China's "free-market reforms" and "pragmatic" leadership.

But White House spokesman Larry Speakes said yesterday that Mr. Reagan hadn't changed his fundamental views towards communism. And China's leadership cadres, for their part, made sure that May Day pictures of Stalin and Mao were up in Peking even as the president departed for Shanghai. Maybe reality has been preserved, but just barely.

A sense of reality about the U.S.-Chinese relationship is important because there are issues yet to be resolved between China and the West that are far more serious than trade and cultural exchanges. A week before Mr. Reagan arrived in China, British Foreign Minister Howe ended a visit and admitted publicly for the first time that Hong Kong will become a part of China in 1997, when the British lease on most of the colony expires. The five million free citizens of Hong Kong watched the American president's tour from a very different perspective, no doubt wondering if they were being sold out.

The news that Britain had ceded sovereignty had merely confirmed the worst suspicions. It also reinforced the need for China to do something to convince Hong Kong's people that it won't destroy their free-market achievements. Increasingly, Hong Kongers are saying that the answer is self-rule.

That may sound unrealistic. Even the benign British haven't permitted self-rule. And China doesn't put up those Stalin and Mao posters for nothing. But democratic stirrings have been growing in Hong Kong, and for good reason. It seems like the only solution for that very large proportion of the colony's people who can't flee a Chinese takeover, either for lack of money or lack of passports and visas. Some already have fled the communists once. Life in China has recently improved, certainly, but the government remains totalitarian, the Communist Party brooks no dissent and the economy still runs largely by state command. Any illusions ought to have been shattered when the Chinese twice censored President Reagan's comments on the virtues of capitalism and the danger posed by the Soviet Union.

No free nation has ever willingly accepted communist rule, and Hong Kongers are probably the least likely people in the world to willingly succumb. Already, the appointed Legislative Council, which helps the British governor write laws, has voted to debate any agreement signed by Britain and China. Unofficial citizens groups have also formed, arguing for some voting rights. Ironically, China itself once endorsed this idea: Early in its negotiations with Britain, communist commentators spoke of "Hong Kong people governing Hong Kong" in order to discredit British rule. A few Hong Kongers took them at their word. But China has since backtracked, even publicly rebuking talk of democracy.

The time is ripe to challenge Peking's obstinacy. Having conceded sovereignty, Britain now will ask China for specific promises about the way it will rule Hong Kong. A vocal, self-governing Hong Kong population could help explain to Peking what those promises should be—for example, a free press, its own currency and the right to travel freely. China has already made Hong Kong a "special administrative zone" in its new constitution, allowing it to have laws distinct from the mainland's. But by itself this legalism isn't worth much; Tibet has been a similar "autonomous zone" but was trampled on anyway. Offering Hong Kong people the rights of self-rule might be enough substance to make that promise believable.

The only sure way to preserve Hong Kong's prosperity is for China to convince the Hong Kong people it won't meddle with their lives. Hong Kongers already are holding a referendum of sorts, voting with their wallets by reducing private investment and with their feet by scrounging for foreign passports. Without any better guarantees from China, that exodus will continue, a deterioration not unlike Zimbabwe's since Robert Mugabe took power. How China reacts to Hong Kong's demands for self-rule will tell the world much more about the real China and its prospects for liberal reform than the good show put on these last six days.

SUPPORT FOR PRODUCT LIABILITY REFORM CONTINUES TO GROW

Mr. KASTEN. Mr. President, we have a problem that has resulted in billions of dollars in unnecessary costs to consumers and businesses alike. In an attempt to reform our confusing product liability system, I introduced the Product Liability Act—S. 44—on January 26, 1983. The bill was reported favorably on March 27, 1984, by the Committee on Commerce, Science, and Transportation by a strong bipartisan vote of 11 to 5. I am urging all those Senators who have not already done so to join S. 44's 25 cosponsors in supporting the Product Liability Act. Your support is needed for quick passage of a uniform product liability act that will create fair product liability standards for the future. Every day that we delay creates extra costs and confusion for consumers and businesses across the United States.

I ask unanimous consent that two editorials endorsing S. 44—one by the Washington Post, dated April 17, 1984, and another by Business Week, dated April 30, 1984, be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the articles were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the Washington Post, Apr. 17, 1984]

SUING THE MANUFACTURER

In the past 10 years, product liability suits against manufacturers have increased sixfold. Damage awards, both compensatory and punitive, have grown to the point where entire industries have been severely strained and many more are concerned about the uncertainty of their legal liabilities.

The confusion is due in part to the fact that each state has its own rules, usually evolving over time in the courts of the state, for handling negligence cases. This works perfectly well to establish whether Mr. Doe was negligent when he sideswiped Mr. Roe's car, or whether Dr. Jones exercised due care in operating on Mrs. Smith.

It is a lot more difficult, though, when Mr. Doe sues General Motors for producing the car involved in the accident or Mrs. Smith sues a drug manufacturer for her reaction to the medicine she received in the recovery room. In both cases, the product is made in a standard way and sold nationally, but each state has its own standard of liability.

Can an injured party collect, for example, if the product was safe at the time of manufacture but years later was found to have caused some harm the manufacturer could not have predicted? Suppose the user had not followed specific warnings—"Do not dive in this 3½-foot pool"—or had altered the product by removing protective shields or safety devices. What if the product was used for a purpose other than that intended by the manufacturer—spraying perfume on a lighted candle? Can an injured party collect under any of these circumstances? Yes and no, depending on what state you're in.

A bill reported by the Senate Commerce Committee seeks to bring some order to this situation by establishing federal standards in product liability cases. The bill contains a number of controversial provisions, some designed to aid a particular industry. Not surprisingly, it is opposed by the legal establishment: far more money has been spent litigating these cases in multiple, diverse forums, than has been paid to victims.

It is a good idea, nonetheless, to establish some uniformity and set reasonable standards of liability. Some of the more outlandish product liability suits would fail under these standards. State juries could no longer find a crane manufacturer liable for injuries caused when the equipment was driven into a power line. A single-control shower faucet manufacturer wouldn't be blamed if the user turned it all the way in one direction and was burned. But the uncertain and enormous liabilities facing manufacturers who can be sued in 51 diverse jurisdictions is a real problem. Congress can and should bring some order to the situation.

[From Business Week, Apr. 30, 1984]

MAKE PRODUCT LIABILITY FAIRER

It is nothing unusual these days to read that a jury has just awarded a plaintiff several million dollars because of injuries caused by some company's defective product. An estimated 110,000 product-liability suits are filed every year. Lawyers who represent the plaintiffs go into court knowing that they stand a far better chance of winning a substantial payment for their client—and, not incidentally, a large fee for themselves—than does the product manufacturer of defending itself. The main reason: Product liability rules are heavily stacked against business. To correct the balance, Senator Bob Kasten (R-Wis.) has introduced a bill to establish a uniform federal statute on product liability that would replace the often differing rules of the 50 states. The bill is a careful compromise that provides protection to consumers while removing some of the most punishing inequities against business. It should become law.

The bill's most significant reforms for business concern company negligence and punitive damages. A few states now permit people injured by a defectively designed product to collect awards, even though the manufacturer was in no way negligent. By contrast, in suits against individuals, a plaintiff must prove negligence. The Kasten bill would apply the same standard to businesses. To collect compensation, an injured consumer would have to show that the company was at fault, that it had failed to act reasonably in designing the product that caused the injury or to warn about potential hazards.

As for punitive damages, under the present rules, a company may have to pay them repeatedly in suit after suit. The Kasten bill limits such damages to the first suit. After that, the company may have to pay compensation in other suits, but it is immune to additional punitive damages.

Predictably, consumer groups and liability lawyers are fighting the new bill. But it leaves business at substantial risk in liability suits and in no way shields a company against having to compensate people injured through its own negligence. The bill strikes a better balance of fairness to consumers and business than the present plethora of state laws.

"MAY DAY BREAKFASTS" MARK RHODE ISLAND INDEPENDENCE

Mr. PELL. Mr. President, this Friday, the Fourth of May, nineteen hundred and eighty-four, the residents of my State will celebrate Rhode Island Independence Day—the date on which Rhode Island beat the other colonies to the punch by 2 months and declared independence from the British.

Throughout Rhode Island residents will mark the event with traditional May breakfasts during what we call Heritage Month. These breakfasts begin at the end of April and continue through most of May.

Thanks to the hard work of the Rhode Island Department of Economic Development, and particularly to the work of Kay Tucker of that department, word of Rhode Island's annual month-long celebration has been spreading rapidly.

I commend a recent article from the New York Times of April 15, 1984, to my colleagues. It captures some of the flavor of our May Day Breakfasts and even includes a list of the scheduled events for those who may wish to join us in our celebration.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the articles "Rhode Island's May Breakfasts Keep Sizzling" and "When and Where To Sample Some Typical New England Fare"—both from the New York Times—be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the articles were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

RHODE ISLAND'S MAY BREAKFASTS KEEP SIZZLING

(By Betsy Wade)

Although quiche and croissants seem poised to overwhelm regional breakfast habits the way that motel chains have crushed tourist homes, citizens of Rhode Island are sending their annual message that the New England Breakfast is alive and hot, bursting with protein and tradition.

A plate of clamcakes—a Yankee version of hush puppies—ham and scrambled eggs and a dome-roofed wedge of apple pie would probably make an exercise teacher's eyes roll back. But at the season that Rhode Island marks as May Breakfast time, a trip to tuck in such a meal, if not exactly slimming, is certainly a spring tonic. The nurseries' offerings in the way of begonias are visible; a walk along an inlet of Narragansett Bay or in a wildlife refuge lets a sense of history, in the form of a home-cooked breakfast, remind the walker of what stoked the stomachs of the New Englanders who pulled stumps, moved rocks, hauled nets and built a nation.

May is to Rhode Island what July is to the rest of the country. On May 4, 1776, Rhode Island beat the other colonies to the punch by two months and declared itself independent of the British crown. To mark the event, and possibly to help everyone ignore its record as the last of the 13 original states to ratify the Constitution, the smallest state is host to celebrations all through what it calls Heritage Month.

At the parish house of the Oak Lawn Community Baptist Church in Cranston last year, sun poured through clear glass windows on long white tables where guests at the May Breakfast sat family style and consumed all within arm's reach. Church members in Quaker costume, a memorial to the meeting-house that preceded the church on the site, had started working when the buyer for ticket No. 1 arrived at 5 A.M., and they kept egg platters filled from 6 until 11.

Customers holding tickets numbered as high as 1,000 listened to organ music while awaiting their turn at the trencher, and little kids wandered under still other tables laden with homemade crafts for sale, baked goods, plants and May baskets.

At a moment near 10, Ann Jervis, co-chairman of the breakfast, discovered with joy and sorrow that she had to send out for another case of 24 dozen eggs to fulfill a pledge to provide "all you can eat," but no doggie bags, please, at $3.75 for adults and $1.75 for children.

The state's annual May Breakfasts, which begin at the end of April and continue into mid-May, are usually fund-raising events. Sometimes talks or nature walks are added. The purpose has become more diverse in other ways, too. On May 1 the Governor always invites every Rhode Islander over 100 years of age to breakfast with him at the Capitol. Those who are over 60 are invited to senior nutrition centers in their communities for what is called a Governor's May Breakfast, but without the Governor. These events, at 11 o'clock, have a standard menu and accept contributions, however modest.

Beyond the Governor's breakfasts, the state estimates that 60 private organizations, schools, clubs, churches and philanthropies hold fund-raising breakfasts, some with simple menus, some more elaborate, all with hot food that sticks to the ribs and that no one, not even in a moment of carbohydrate overload, would dare call brunch.

Menus for this year mention baked beans, pie, clamcakes, scrambled eggs, pancakes, doughnuts, muffins, Frenchtoast, sausage, ham, coffee and all the rest. Jonnycakes or johnnycakes (griddle-baked cornbread), a Rhode Island tradition, are served at many breakfasts.

Adult prices range from $2.50 to $12, the higher price being for what organizers call a "really rather classy" if untypical event at Belcourt Castle in Newport on May 6. This offers champagne, blintzes and crepes, but no meat because the sponsor is the Defenders of Animals.

Many breakfasts are scheduled for weekends, but unless May 1 falls on Sunday, conflicting with religious services, the Oak Lawn Church, generally acknowledged to have begun the custom in 1868, hews to May Day.

By one account, the first breakfast was part of a two-day Oak Lawn May Fest that included the crowning of a May queen and several spasms of eating. Clamcakes were served at the first breakfast, the historian recorded, "because Aunt Hannah Babcock made them so well." In World War II, when deep fat was precious as gasoline, hash-brown potatoes were offered, but the clamcake has since resumed its place at Oak Lawn.

In time, other organizations seized upon the idea. In East Greenwich, the United Methodist Church has been holding breakfasts for more than 50 years and will do it again on May 1; the Park Place Congregational Church in Pawtucket will hold its 102d annual breakfast on April 28. The North Tiverton Volunteer Fire Department is scheduling its 53d breakfast on May 6. The Rhode Island Yacht Club in Cranston has revived its custom and will hold one on May 6, as will the East Greenwich Yacht Club, on the same day. Both clubs, not surprisingly, have settings on the water.

In the history of the Oak Lawn breakfast, the author wrote of the first event: "Oak Law was a farming community and many dozens of fresh eggs, butter, hams, homemade jellies and pies poured into the meetinghouse. In the very early hours of the morning, the back lot filled up with horses and carriages. There were some buggies from livery stables in Providence, too."

More recently, the visitors' conveyances were again from far afield: Connecticut, New York, Massachusetts, New Hampshire, Vermont.

For those who want to make a day of it in Rhode Island, no distance is very far, so things to work off a New England breakfast are not hard to find.

Birders may want to walk it off right on the site. They can select the breakfast on May 20 at the Norman Bird Sanctuary in Middletown, just north of Newport. Guided bird walks begin at 6:30, and there are bird exhibitions and slides as well as a Maypole.

Three other popular places for spring visits are in Washington County, known to all except the road signs as South County. This county forms the 18 miles of southern coast of the state west of Narragansett Bay, from Point Judith, a jumping-off spot for Block Island, to Watch Hill, on the Connecticut line. U.S. 1 and periodically scenic U.S. 1A serve the county's coast.

On the Old Post Road, which drifts away from U.S. 1, nearly next door to Ninigret Park, is the Fantastic Umbrella Factory, a 19th-century farm that still operates, although in a limited way, and shelters a variety of things to buy and look at. The house nearest the parking lot contains stoneware, leather and loomed, quilted and basketry products of a crafts commune called Small Axe Productions. Small stoneware crocks in the old dark-in-sides style are $6 to $12; a nest of stoneware mixing bowls is $55.

A bit farther back is a barn, which children generally prefer, packed nearly to the rafters with everything from birthday cards to soap and leaded glass, plus real eggs from the farm with intensely yellow yolks, definitely laid by chickens that have freedom to roam.

The Umbrella Factory (401-364-6616), which a sign says was named "because," increases the number of days a week it is open as the weather improves. By the end of this month, it is likely to be open all week. Hours are 10 a.m. to 5 p.m.

A walk in Ninigret Park and the adjoining Federal Wildlife Preserve offers isolation, water and salt air. A parcel of 172 acres of the deactivated Charlestown Naval Auxiliary Air Station on the South County coast, complete with a freshwater pond, it was opened as a park by the town of Charlestown last year and forms a gateway to the older wildlife refuge and the barrier beach beyond.

To keep motorists from going in hopeless circles on vast runways, routes of sorts were denoted by sweeping furrows plowed into the tarmac, an almost perfect enactment of the biblical notion of beating swords into plowshares. At a certain point on the runway, most people park their cars and go walking in the company of wildlife, wind off Block Island Sound and the whisper of tall grasses.

The park is open, free, from 8 a.m. to sunset. Nature programs are arranged for groups. Information is available by calling George Bliven, Charlestown parks commissioner, at 401-364-6244 or the Federal refuge manager's office at 401-364-3106.

To play tag with the spring surf, a good place is Napatree Point in Watch Hill. Before the Watch Hill summer season opens, it's possible to park on the street or the public parking area at the edge of the harbor. At the far western corner is a narrow pedestrians-only entrance to the mile-long point, which was dense with summer houses until the 1938 hurricane. Since then it has been a preserve. Although pilings of old porches stick out of the sand and the bones of old shipwrecks poke up after storms.

Walkers can take either the ocean beach or the less windy bay side, or walk one out and the other back. There are occasional boardwalks over the dune for those who want to get to the other side.

Beachcombers will want to take along a sack for shells, beach glass and driftwood; Napatree has plenty of each. It also has ospreys, oyster-catchers and migrating shorebirds.

WHEN AND WHERE TO SAMPLE SOME TYPICAL NEW ENGLAND FARE

RHODE ISLAND INDEPENDENCE DAY, MAY 4

Mr. PELL. Mr. President, the Colony of Rhode Island and Providence Plantations was the first of the Thirteen Original Colonies to declare its independence from Great Britain.

On May 4, 1776, the general assembly officially broke its ties with King George, and declared itself free and independent from any allegiance to him.

To commemorate and celebrate this occasion, the Rhode Island Heritage Commission will conduct a ceremony at 12:30 p.m. on Friday, May 4, 1984, in the State house rotunda.

On this occasion, the Heritage Commission, also is asking all churches and other buildings in Rhode Island that may have bells or chimes to ring them in unison for 2 minutes at 1 p.m.

As a part of that celebration, I would like to remind my colleagues of Rhode Island's leading role in the struggle for independence.

I ask unanimous consent that the text of Rhode Island's original Renunciation of the Crown be reprinted in full in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

There being no objection, the renunciation was ordered to printed in the RECORD, as follows:

RENUNCIATION OF THE CROWN

An act repealing an Act entitled, "An Act for the more effectually securing to his Majesty the Allegiance of his Subjects, in this his Colony and Dominion of Rhode-Island and Providence Plantations;" and altering the Forms of Commissions, of all Writs and Processes in the Courts, and of the Oaths prescribed by Law.

Whereas in all States existing by Compact, Protection and Allegiance are reciprocal, the latter being only due in Consequence of the former: And whereas George the Third, King of Great-Britain, forgetting his Dignity, regardless of the Compact most solemnly entered into, ratified and confirmed, to the Inhabitants of this Colony, by His Illustrious Ancestors, and till of late fully recognized by Him—and entirely departing from the Duties and Character of a good King, instead of protecting, is endeavouring to destroy the good People of this Colony, and of all the United Colonies, by sending Fleets and Armies to America, to confiscate our Property, and spread Fire, Sword and Desolation, throughout our Country, in order to compel us to submit to the most debasing and detestable Tyranny; whereby we are obliged by Necessity, and it becomes our highest Duty, to use every Means, with which God and Nature have furnished us, in Support of our invaluable Rights and Privileges; to oppose that Power which is exerted only for our Destruction.

Be it therefore Enacted by this General Assembly, and by the Authority thereof it is Enacted, That an Act entitled, "An Act for the more effectual securing to His Majesty the Allegiance of his Subjects in this his Colony and Dominion of Rhode-Island and Providence Plantations," be, and the same is hereby, repealed.

Clerk of the house, Josias Lyndon, wrote: "Resolved that the aforementioned written pass as an act of this assembly."

It was read and approved in the upper house the same day, as attested by Henry Ward, secretary.

For the first time the session closed with the words, "God save the United Colonies."

INTERNATIONAL USE OF ARMED FORCE

Mr. PELL. Mr. President, I call the attention of my colleagues to an article by Richard N. Gardner, former Ambassador to Italy and now professor of law and international organization at Columbia University entitled "Sovereignty and Intervention: A Challenge of Law-Making for the Industrialized Democracies." Ambassador Gardner explores the legal and moral aspects of the international use of armed force by citing examples of military intervention, especially the U.S. action in Grenada this past October. The article points out the need for a broad consensus on the concept of intervention in international law in light of the changing world situation. I commend to my colleagues Ambassador Gardner's perceptive and timely article.

I ask unanimous consent that the article be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[Trialogue, March 1984 (Trilateral Commission quarterly)]

SOVEREIGNTY AND INTERVENTION: A CHALLENGE OF LAW MAKING FOR THE INDUSTRIALIZED DEMOCRACIES

(Richard N. Gardner)

The controversy over the U.S. military action in Grenada is of the deepest significance for the trilateral countries of Western Europe, North America and Japan for two reasons. One is obvious; the other had been almost totally ignored.

The obvious reason is the political cost of the unprecedented isolation of the United States from its allies and friends on a military action deemed in the national interest by the American government and overwhelmingly supported by the American people. When the U.N. General Assembly voted by 108 to 9 with 27 abstentions on November 2, 1983, to "deplore" the occupation of Grenada is a "flagrant violation of international law," the United States could not muster a negative vote from a single trilateral country. Only Israel, El Salvador and six small Caribbean countries joined the United States in opposition. The United Kingdom, Canada, Germany, Belgium and Japan abstained. France, Italy, the Netherlands, Norway, Spain and Portugal all voted to deplore the U.S. action.

The less obvious significance of Grenada is the confusion it revealed among trilateral governments and leaders of public opinion over a question of central importance to the solidarity and survival of the trilateral countries: Just what legal and moral principles governing the use of armed forces are the trilateral countries prepared to live by and ask others to live by at this point in the nuclear age?

It is not a new question, nor an easy one. It is a question that was raised at the time of U.S. military actions in the Cuban missile crisis, in the Dominican Republic, and in Vietnam; by the Soviet military actions in Hungary, Czechoslovakia, and Afghanistan and Soviet interference in Poland; by Soviet and Cuban interventions in Central America; by Israel's raid on Entebbe, its invasion of Lebanon and its attack on Iraq's nuclear reactor; by the Argentine-British conflict in the Falklands; by French military actions in Africa; and by Chinese and Vietnamese attacks upon their neighbors. It arises today in El Salvador and Nicaragua. And it will undoubtedly arise in unforeseen ways in the years ahead.

But let us begin with Grenada. When armed forces of the United States occupied Grenada on October 25, 1983, accompanied by forces from six English-speaking Caribbean countries, the avowed purpose was to protect American citizens, restore order and liberate the country from Soviet-Cuban domination.

The military action of the United States was triggered by the murder on October 19 of Prime Minister Maurice Bishop and other elected leaders by a militant communist faction led by Deputy Prime Minister Bernard Coard, an event accompanied by civil strife and the collapse of government authority. The United States declared that it acted in response to two requests for assistance: a formal request on October 23 from the Organization of Eastern Caribbean States (OECS), a regional grouping of seven Caribbean mini-states, and a confidential appeal from the Governor-General of Grenada as the sole remaining source of lawful government authority.[1]

Speaking in the United Nations Security Council on October 27, U.S. Ambassador Jeane Kirkpatrick emphasized that Cuban and Soviet intervention in the internal affairs of Grenada was a major factor in the American decision. "Grenada's internal affairs," she said, "had fallen under the permanent intervention of one neighboring and one remote tyranny." Ambassador Kirkpatrick added that the U.S. action was justified by a "unique combination of circumstances" that included "danger to innocent United States nationals, the absence of a minimally responsible government in Grenada and the danger posed to the OECS by the relatively awesome military might that those responsible for the murder of the Bishop Government now had at their disposal."

"The United States response," she concluded, "was fully compatible with relevant international law and practice."[2]

If this was the American justification for its action in Grenada, on what basis could the U.N. General Assembly find that the same action was a "flagrant violation of international law?" And why did so many leaders of public opinion in the industrialized democracies—quite a few in the United States itself—rush to the judgment expressed by the Times of London: "There is no getting around the fact that the United States and its Caribbean allies have committed an act of aggression against Grenada. They are in breach of international law and of the Charter of the U.N."

Clearly on explanation for these divergent judgments was lack of agreement on the facts. Were American citizens really in danger? Were the "invitations" by the Governor-General of Grenada and the OECS spontaneous—or made under pressure from the U.S.? Were those who overthrew the Bishop government really acting on behalf of the Soviet Union or Cuba to destroy the independence of the country? Did the Soviet-Cuban military build-up in Grenada constitute an imminent danger to the security of Grenada's tiny and defenseless neighbors? Was the purpose of the U.S.-led occupying forces exclusively to restore order and assure the free exercise of sovereignty by the people of Grenada—or was it to impose a government to the liking of the United States? Finally, would the occupying forces really leave once order was restored and the conditions for free elections assured?

It is not my purpose in this essay to resolve these factual issues. Authoritative judgments on them in any event, are difficult to make now on the basis of publicly available evidence. I will only note in passing that if the trilateral countries failed to support the United States because they disbelieved the U.S. version of events, this in itself is a commentary on the state of trust and confidence between countries that are supposed to be allies and close friends. The trilateral countries were not prepared, to put it mildly, "to give the U.S. the benefit of the doubt."

It would be even more ominous for their future relations, however, if the trilateral countries were in fundamental disagreement over the principles to be applied in judging the legality and morality of the use of armed force by themselves or other nations.

Footnotes at end of article.

If that should be the case, it would place in doubt one of the premises of the trilateral concept—that there is, in fact, a real community of industrialized democracies capable of common action based on shared concepts not only of national interest, but of fundamental human values.[3]

The rules of international law governing the use of force may be found in treaties and in international customary law, that is the rules nations follow in practice out of a sense of legal obligation. The most authoritative statements of the rules are to be found in the following provisions of the United Nations Charter:

All members shall settle their international disputes by peaceful means in such a manner that international peace and security, and justice, are not endangered. (Article 2(3)).

All members shall refrain in their international relations from the threat or use of force against the territorial integrity or political independence of any state, or in any other manner inconsistent with the Purposes of the United Nations. (Article 2(4)).

Nothing in the present Charter shall impair the inherent right of individual or collective self-defense if an armed attack occurs against a member of the United Nations . . . (Article 51).

Another source of applicable law is the Charter of the Organization of American States, which declares in Article 15: No state or group of states has the right to intervene, directly or indirectly, for any reason whatever, in the internal or external affairs of any other state.

Although the OAS formulation set forth above does not appear in the U.N. Charter, the General Assembly has adopted the identical language in a resolution in 1970 purporting to be an authoritative interpretation of the U.N. Charter, the Declaration of Principles of International Law Concerning Friendly Relations and Cooperation Among States in Accordance with the Charter of the United Nations.

The search for principles to govern the use of armed force does not end, however, with the recitation of these broad propositions. International constitutions are not self-interpreting any more than national constitutions—nor are phrases like "armed attack," "self-defense" or "intervention" any more self-explanatory than "cruel and unusual punishments," "interstate commerce" or "due process of law." The process of interpretation requires sophisticated human judgement, which means at a minimum that interpretation of any single provision must take into account other provisions of the same document, the purposes of the international instrument as a whole, the drafting history, subsequent state practice and the applicability of rules of customary international law, possibly co-existing with the international agreement. Moreover, careful judgement must be used in the application of broad constitutional provisions in a variety of unique instances, many of which could not have been foreseen when the international constitution was drafted. As Justice Oliver Wendell Holmes once put it: "General principles do not decide concrete cases."

The simple truth is that international law on this subject is far from clear, as evidenced by the widespread disagreement between government decision-makers and respected scholars both within and between nations. As everyone knows, international law differs from domestic law in that there is no court of compulsory jurisdiction for its authoritative interpretation, nor is there a legislature to adjust the law to changing circumstances or a police force to secure universal enforcement. This does not necessarily mean that international law does not exist; there are mutual restraints and reciprocal concessions embodied in treaties and customary international law that nations choose to regard as legally binding out of perceived self-interest. Indeed, on a large number of subjects ranging from the Law of the Sea to diplomatic immunity, the rules of international law are observed by almost all nations almost all of the time. But clearly the interpretation of these rules in the decentralized international system is a more difficult matter than in the domestic legal order, particularly when we are dealing with an issue like the use of force which touches vital national interests. What we are really talking about is "word politics"[4] between nations—a struggle to shape norms to govern national behavior in support of certain national interests and values.

The challenge to trilateral countries is one of creative and purposeful international law-making—among themselves as a kind of "law-bloc"—and with other members of the international community. This means, first of all, looking carefully at those various formulations governing the use of armed force that have some basis of support in contemporary international law and deciding which ones should be espoused or rejected in the interest of promoting the values the trilateral countries share—among which are certainly those of peace, justice, national self-determination, and human rights.

A second stage would be a concerted effort—now so notably lacking—to observe these formulations in their own behavior and to press for their wider recognition through bilateral and multilateral diplomacy. What these formulations might be, at least in barest outline, I shall suggest in a moment.

CHALLENGES TO A "RULE OF LAW" APPROACH

There are, however, a number of very fundamental objections to this "rule of law" approach. The starkest objection comes from those who believe, as the Wall Street Journal suggested in the aftermath of Grenada, that international law simply does not exist. A variant of this view would be that although international law exists in the majority of international situations, it does not exist, or does not apply, when armed force is used by nations in what they conceive to be their supreme national interests. No less a figure than Dean Acheson drew that conclusion at the time of the U.S. quarantine of Cuba in 1962:

I must conclude that the propriety of the Cuban quarantine is not a legal issue. The power, position and prestige of the United States had been challenged by another state; and law simply does not deal with such questions of ultimate power—power that comes close to the sources of sovereignty . . . The survival of states is not a matter of law.[5]

This statement has powerful appeal in an age when the Soviet Union and its allies have violated traditional international law principles with impunity—and when nations like Iran, Libya and Syria have raised terrorism to the level of state practice. But do we really want to take the view that there are no legal rules applicable to judge the actions of the Soviet Union and its allies, or the smaller terrorist nations, which threaten the safety of free nations and the achievement of a decent world order? We would do well to remember the wise observation of one of Britain's greatest international lawyers, J.L. Brierly: "The ultimate explanation of the binding force of all law is that man, whether he is a single individual or whether he is associated with other men in a state, is constrained, so far as he is a reasonable being, to believe that order and not chaos is the governing principle of the world in which he has to live."[6]

In the nuclear age, it is precisely in dangerous confrontations of power that some ground rules are needed to preserve "order" and avert "chaos." A conclusion that "no law" is applicable would generally serve the interests of the Soviet Union and other challengers to the peace of free nations; it would create even more uncertainty and instability than we already have. There is no nation that denies the existence of international law, and all feel constrained to find legal justifications for their behavior. It is surely better to have nations arguing over what international law is than to assert that no international law applies at all.

I spoke earlier of "international law and morality." International law often codifies national interest and convenience, as in the Law of the Sea. In the sensitive area of the use of armed force, it seeks to codify morality as well. But it is precisely here that we come to a second fundamental objection to the "rule of law" approach: May there not be exceptional situations where the law may be disregarded if necessary to achieve some greater good? In real life, we all recognize extreme situations where violating the law may be appropriate to achieve some valid purpose—e.g., going through a red light to take an injured person to the hospital for urgent medical treatment.

Moreover, where traditional international law fails to take account of new realities and cannot be changed through negotiation and diplomacy, there may be exceptional situations where "law-making" through new state practice requires some temporary "law-breaking." A successful example of this phenomenon was the Truman Proclamation of 1945 taking jurisdiction over the resources of the continental shelf, a unilateral action that "broke" the old law before the new legal principle was "made" by general acceptance. Nevertheless, if we are to accept violations of traditional rules in exceptional cases, we should carefully consider whether the consequences are beneficial not just for the acting country, but for the majority of mankind as a whole—and whether the value of the objective being served outweighs the damage that the unilateral change in the rules may do to the future conduct of international relations. I do not suggest that this legal-moral calculation is an easy one. But I do reject the notion that in international affairs the end always justifies the means, a proposition that is readily available to totalitarian powers, as well as to free nations.

There is yet another objection to the "rule of law" approach, from those who argue that the rules of international law, particularly those governing the use of armed force, are capable of almost any interpretation, and should simply be manipulated by nations in each case to achieve whatever foreign policy goal seems valid at the moment. But the U.N. Charter and other sources of international law cannot be treated as pieces of India rubber to be stretched one way and then another in light of the short-term political necessities of each situation. There has to be some continuity in our day-to-day interpretation. If we "bend" the principles to fit one case, we must be willing to live with the new configuration in the next. The Soviet Union cannot very well be denied the same freedom to resort to force which the United States claims through "liberal interpretations" of existing norms. As Justice Robert Jackson once put it in a domestic context:

A military order, however unconstitutional, is not apt to last longer than the military emergency . . . But once a judicial opinion rationalizes such an order to show that it conforms to the Constitution, or rather rationalizes the Constitution to show that the Constitution sanctions such an order, the Court for all time has validated the principle . . . The principle then lies about like a loaded weapon ready for the hand of any authority that can bring forward a plausible claim of an urgent need.[7]

Yet another challenge to the "rule of law" approach comes from the believers in "spheres of influence." According to this view, the United States must be conceded the same freedom to defend its interests in Latin America as the Soviet Union claims in Eastern Europe. In other words, accept the Brezhnev doctrine of limited sovereignty for Eastern Europe in return for a "reverse" Brezhnev doctrine of limited sovereignty for Latin America, with perhaps other such doctrines for China, Vietnam, Britain, France, Japan and other countries in areas of historic interest to them.

It scarcely needs emphasis that this approach does violence to the principles of sovereign equality and self-determination embodied in the United Nations Charter and other treaties in force, and that it would never be accepted by the small nations of the world, least of all by those in the "spheres of influence" that are principally at issue. Nor is such a concept likely to appeal to the citizens of the United States and other industrialized democracies, most of whom profess a principled concern for freedom and human rights in all parts of the world, from Poland and Grenada to Tibet and Cambodia.

A similar challenge to the "rule of law" approach might be described as a rough and ready theory of "reciprocity." It is a principle well-recognized in the common law—and perhaps more generally in all legal systems—that when one party violates a material provision in a contract, the other party is relieved of its obligations under the same instrument. It is argued by analogy that as long as the Soviet Union and other totalitarian powers persistently violate the norms laid down in the Charter and other sources of international law, the United States and other free nations must have the right to do so when necessary to defend their interests. To quote Dean Acheson again: "We must never forget that between an opponent who is prepared to use force to gain his end and one who is not prepared to use force to defend his interests—the former is usually the winner."[8]

International law clearly permits the United States to refuse to perform its commitments in a bilateral agreement with the Soviet Union if the Soviet Union has breached a material provision of that same agreement. It may also permit the United States to take broader measures against the Soviet Union—measures that might otherwise be considered illegal—in response to Soviet violations of international law directed against the United States. But it is quite another thing to claim that the United States should be released from its obligations to innocent third countries because the Soviet Union is disobeying the rules.

The concept that we must be free to "fight fire with fire" has undoubted political appeal and certainly would make it easier for the industrialized democracies to defend their security interests in particular situations. But if the trilateral countries accept the Soviet standard of international behavior as their own, do they then forfeit any claim before the rest of the world to stand on a higher plane of morality? Do they abandon all legal restraints on the use of force or only some, and do they cast aside the restraints on forcible intervention everywhere or only in countries where the rules have already been violated by their adversaries? A "tit-for-tat" rejection of legal restraints on the use of force—"you invaded Afghanistan so we can invade anyone we like"—will encounter violent opposition from almost everyone but the superpowers and will quickly bring the standard of international behavior down to the lowest common denominator. As I shall suggest in a moment, most of the benefits of the "reciprocity" approach can be achieved with less cost to the trilateral countries by a judicious use of the concept of "self/defense" consistently with respect for international law.

In this catalogue of challenges to a "rule of law" approach there is one, however, that merits more sympathetic consideration. This is the view that reads as interdependent and correlative the provisions of the U.N. charter restraining the use of force by member states and the provisions of the Charter placing on the United Nations the duty to establish international peace and justice. With the frustration of the Charter system for collective security and the peaceful settlement of disputes, it is argued, the member states must recover their preexisting freedom of action to protect their interests by means of individual or collective self-help. As Professor Arthur Goodhart of Oxford put it during the Suez crisis of 1956: "The renunciation of the use of force in Article 2(4) is not of an absolute character, but is dependent on the proper enforcement of international order by the United Nations." If a different view were accepted, he argued, U.N. members would be obliged to stand idly by in the face of the most extreme violations of their rights and "membership in the United Nations would be a source of danger and of weakness to the law-abiding nations."[9]

This "frustration of Charter purposes" concept, however, still leaves us with some of the same problems that we found with the other challenges to a "rule of law" approach. If Article 2(4) of the Charter is set aside, what norms are then applicable? To abandon all restraints in the Charter because of the U.N.'s weakness would serve neither peace nor justice, nor would it advance the cause of rebuilding the U.N.'s collective processes. At the same time, there is merit in the view that the Charter restraints on the use of force must be interpreted differently in today's world than they would have been in the world envisaged at San Franciso. How this might be done is the question to which we now turn.

ELEMENTS OF A "RULE OF LAW" APPROACH

If it is in the interest of the industrialized democracies, subject to the qualifications noted above, to follow a "rule of law" approach to the use of armed force, what should be the applicable legal principles? Volumes of learned scholarship have been written on this enormously difficult and complex subject. What follows is a brief review of five concepts of varying degrees of persuasiveness from which the trilateral countries will need to fashion a common approach.

Self-defense

The United Nations Charter codifies "the inherent right of individual or collective self-defense if an armed attack occurs against a member of the United Nations." There is general agreement in the international community that this gives a nation the right to use force when its territory or its armed forces are attacked or when an attack is made on the territory or armed forces of another nation to which it is bound in a collective self-defense arrangement like NATO.

There are some specific questions about the self-defense concept, however, that are more difficult to resolve. For example: Can the concept of self-defense be stretched to legitimize a use of force in anticipation of an "armed attack?" In the Cuban missile crisis, the United States deliberately declined to use "anticipatory self-defense" as a justification for the quarantine of Cuba, and with good reason. If the deployment of Soviet missiles in Cuba could provide a legal basis for a blockade of Cuba in 1962, could not the Soviet Union use "anticipatory self-defense" to justify forcible action to stop the deployment of the Pershing and cruise missiles in Europe in 1984? It would be a dangerous doctrine, particularly in an age of nuclear weapons, to say that the mere deployment and readying of weapons justified the preemptive use of force by others. Yet international law before the U.N. Charter did recognize the right of anticipatory self-defense when the "necessity of that self-defense is instant, overwhelming, and leaving no choice of means, and no moment for deliberation."[10] It is doubtful that the U.N. Charter was intended to deny a nation the right to defend itself against an armed attack that was already underway. Where to draw the line between permissible response to an imminent attack and impermissible response against the readying of weapons will not always be easy, but the principle seems clear enough and finds support in existing practice. Israel, for example, received no support in the United Nations for its preemptive strike against Iraq's nuclear reactor in 1981, but it received widespread support (and no U.N. condemnation) when it began hostilities in 1967 after President Nasser blockaded the Gulf of Aqaba.

Another question concerns self-defense in the face of "indirect aggression." In today's world, an "armed attack" can occur not only through the marching of troops or the launching of weapons across borders, but by the forcible seizure of power within one country by persons acting as agents of another country with the aim of destroying the first country's independence. This would suggest that "collective self-defense" should also embrace military action to defend the freedom and independence of a country that is being subjected to a previous indirect aggression by others. Putting it another way, "counter-intervention" in response to a prior illegal intervention should not be regarded as illegal provided it has as its motive and actual consequence the preservation of the freedom and independence of the people on whose behalf the "counter-intervention" is carried out. John Stuart Mill was an advocate of this principle as far back as 1848 in an eloquent passage that has particular application today:

The doctrine of non-intervention, to be a legitimate principle of morality, must be accepted by all governments. The despots must consent to be bound by it as well as the free states. Unless they do, the profession of it by free countries comes but to this miserable issue: that the wrong side may help the wrong but the right must not help the right. Intervention to enforce non-intervention is always rightful, always moral, if not always prudent.

Since the first Hague conference in 1899, the international community has sought to develop rules of warfare to limit the destructiveness of conflicts and particularly the damage to innocent civilians. When armed force is used in self-defense or under any other legal theory, therefore, there is not only the question of when force may be used, but how it is used. One principle of continued vitality is that of "military necessity"—that is, a use of force in self-defense or on some other basis should be limited so far as possible to military objectives. No doubt this is a difficult principle to apply in the nuclear age; yet in its human purpose it is a principle that merits support from the community of nations.

Protection of Nationals

The United States and other trilateral countries have long asserted a right to use force on the territory of another nation to protect their nationals from an imminent threat of injury where the territorial sovereign was unable or unwilling to protect them. The U.S.-Belgium rescue effort in the Congo in 1964, Israel's raid on Entebbe, and the initial phase of the American landings in the Dominican Republic in 1965 and in Grenada all relied on this principle. To avoid abuse of the concept, it is generally conceded that the measures taken must be strickly confined to the purpose of protection—thus there would be no justification in occupying a country after endangered citizens had been removed. Most developing countries still challenge this legal concept, even when so strictly limited. Yet it seems evident that the industrialized democracies should continue to support it in an age where terrorist acts and the collapse of civil authority are all too frequent occurrences.

Military Assistance Upon Request

Traditional international law has recognized the right of one country to give military assistance to another at the latter's request, including the deployment of armed forces on its territory. It is still a widely held view that it is legal to assist the established government in a civil war situation, but not the insurgent group, at least not until the insurgents have become sufficiently established that other countries may appropriately grant them belligerent status. But this whole question of assistance upon request and intervention in civil wars is one of the most controversial areas of international law, with the Soviet Union, Cuba, and many developing countries challenging the traditional customary law rule and insisting on a right to support "wars of national liberation" against established governments. Here is an area where the U.N. Charter is silent and the practice of states offers no clear guide for judgement, for the evident reason that no clear consensus exists within the international community.

It seems clear that the trilateral countries have a common interest in supporting the traditional international law rule prohibiting outside military support on behalf of revolutionary movements seeking to overthrow existing governments. They also have a common interest in affirming the right to provide military support to established governments defending themselves against a foreign-supported revolution. A closer question for the trilateral countries is whether, in the absence of any foreign intervention whatsoever, they should continue to assert a right to assist established governments to put down indigenous revolutionary movements. One problem with this traditional doctrine is that it provides ready justification for the use of armed force by the United States and other trilateral countries in support of any government, no matter how dictatorial or unpopular, to help it suppress popular forces seeking political and social reform. Moreover, it may help the Soviet Union to justify its uses of force to achieve the permanent incorporation into the Soviet orbit of any country which has once been taken over by a Soviet-supported communist coup. Soviet troops went into Hungary and Afghanistan, after all, in response to "requests" by pro-Soviet leaders falsely purporting to speak for the legitimate government of the country. Had they gone into Poland, they could probably have produced a request from General Jaruzelski.

On the other hand, military assistance upon request aimed merely at the restoration of law and order and not at the suppression of an indigenous revolutionary movement would seem to offer less problems as a legal concept for the trilateral countries and others. Here again, it will not always be easy to draw the line.

Regional Action

Article 52 of the United Nations Charter permits regional organizations to deal with "such matters relating to the maintenance of international peace and security as are appropriate for regional action," provided that their activities "are consistent with the Purposes and Principles of the United Nations." Article 53 further provides that no "enforcement action" shall be taken by regional organizations without the authorization of the Security Council.

The United States has sought to justify as a legitimate use of regional peacekeeping the OAS-authorized quarantine of Cuba in 1962 and the OAS-authorized peace force which occupied the Dominican Republic in 1965 after the collapse of order in that country. It has also sought to justify the occupation of Grenada as a valid regional peacekeeping effort by the Organization of Eastern Caribbean States. In the Dominican and Grenada cases, the United States argued that no "enforcement action" requiring Security Council approval was involved, since force was not being exercised against the will of a state, but only to maintain order after the collapse of government authority. In the Cuban quarantine, the U.S. argued that there was no "enforcement action" because the members of the OAS acted pursuant to a recommendation rather than a mandatory decision—a questionable theory to say the least, since certainly there was "enforcement" of the blockade against the ships of the Soviet Union and other countries.

It is not clear that the concept of regional peacekeeping adds to the uses of force that would otherwise be legally available to individual countries. Article 52 requires that actions by regional agencies must be consistent with United Nations principles. One of those principles is the prohibition in Article 2(4) of the use of force against the "territorial integrity or political independence of any state." Uses of force that would be illegal if undertaken by a single nation are not validated therefore simply because they are undertaken by several states pursuant to recommendations by regional agencies. In the Grenada and Dominican Republic cases, reliance on the concept of regional action would require a demonstration that the "territorial integrity" or "political independence" of those nations was not violated. In short, the prohibition in Article 2(4) could be given a limited interpretation. But in that event, action by the United States alone would have been just as lawful (though less politically attractive) as action by the regional group.

"Humanitarian" or "Democratic" Intervention

Some scholars now argue that international law permits one or more countries to use force in the territory of another to put an end to human rights abuses or vindicate the rights of the people to democratic institutions. Indeed, Ambassador Kirkpatrick has used this argument to justify U.S. military support for the "Contras" seeking to overthrow the Sandinista regime in Nicaragua.[11] The concept of "humanitarian" or "democratic" intervention is undeniably attractive when the world is faced with extreme situations such as Hitler's campaign of genocide against six million Jews or Idi Amin's wanton slaughter of his own countrymen. It is, however, a principle that finds little support in treaty law or the customary rules that derive from consistent state practice. It is also vulnerable to an obvious practical objection. Two thirds of the members of the international community are less than fully functioning democracies and at least one third engage in gross and persistent human rights violations. A legal principle that would authorize unilateral or collective intervention against such a large number of countries would be an invitation to an unrestrained world civil war—too threatening to international peace and stability to command broad support within the international community or by the trilateral countries themselves.

What is the application of the five concepts outlined above to the Grenada situation? If the facts as given by the United States government are accepted, the principle that force may be used to protect endangered citizens clearly justifies the initial Grenada landings. The continued occupation of Grenada once that purpose had been accomplished can be justified on the basis of the invitation by the Governor-General to put an end to foreign intervention and/or maintain domestic order, assuming the constitution of Grenada provides him with the necessary authority to issue such an invitation.

For the reasons given earlier, the concepts of "regional action" and "humanitarian" or "democratic" intervention are not good legal arguments for the Grenada action. But "collective self-defense" is a concept that can apply to Grenada. This is not the "anticipatory self-defense" of Grenada's neighbors, which would stretch the concept too far since no attack upon them was imminent. Rather it would be the murder of Bishop and the seizure of power by persons allegedly acting as agents of the Soviet Union or Cuba for the purpose of subordinating Grenada's sovereignty to one or both of those countries that could be regarded as a "use of force" against the political independence of Grenada, justifying a collective self-defense action by the United States and Grenada's neighbors. To put it another way, and assuming over again that the facts presented by the United States are accepted, the Soviet Union and Cuba "intervened" illegally in Grenada to suppress freedom; the United States lawfully "counter-intervened" with Grenada's neighbors to restore freedom. The use of force observed the requirement of military necessity since a genuine effort was made to avoid harm to innocent civilians.

This brief exposition of applicable legal theories,[12] simplified in the extreme for the purpose of brevity, may well raise more questions than it resolves. Some will challenge the validity of my necessarily abbreviated formulations and subjective judgements. Fair enough. The basic purpose of this essay is not to suggest that the answers to these questions are clear, but rather that the trilateral countries should accord high priority in thinking about them at senior levels of government in an effort to develop a trilateral consensus.

The Soviet Union and its allies in the developing world are actively promoting legal doctrines to serve their interests in international fora like the United Nations, in their bilateral diplomacy and in their unilateral official pronouncements. Their purpose is obvious—to prohibit all "imperialist interventions" by the trilateral countries while legitimizing all Soviet-sponsored uses of armed force in support of "wars of national liberation." If the trilateral countries wish to shape a world order conducive to the promotion of peace and freedom, they will need in their turn to develop a more unified and purposeful approach on these questions than they have thus far.

A trilateral report on the international law of armed force, written by scholars from Western Europe, North America and Japan, on the basis of broad consultation with governmental and private authorities throughout the world could be a useful first step toward achieving some consensus on an issue of central importance to the industrialized democracies and all other free nations.

[3] The issue raised is when the use of force is legal and moral, not when it serves the national interest. The two issues should be clearly distinguished: There may be cases where the use of armed force by one or more of the trilateral countries would find a clear basis in law and morality but would be politically inexpedient. Conversely, a use of force may be politically expedient but neither legal nor moral.

[12] In the interest of brevity, there has been no discussion of a sixth possible justification for the use of armed force—reprisal by one nation against the illegal action of another. As a practical matter, this justification is not usually invoked in the major uses of armed force with which we have been concerned here. There is much disagreement, in any event, on whether and under what conditions armed reprisals are permitted under the U.N. Charter.

A TRIBUTE TO L. M. GREGG

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. President, on Saturday, March 31, 1984, the city of Tuskegee, Ala., lost one of its most outstanding citizens when L. M. Gregg passed away. Mr. Gregg was chairman pro tempore of the city council at the time of his death.

Mr. Gregg was a native of North Carolina. While serving in the U.S. Air Force in World War II, he was assigned to Tuskegee's Molton Field as a flight instructor and went on to settle there after the war.

In 1947, he opened Gregg's Cleaners which he operated until his retirement. His political career began in 1960 when he was elected to the city council for the first of six consecutive terms. He was unopposed for the last three of those terms, during which he served as chairman pro tempore.

An involved civic leader, Mr. Gregg was a member of the American Legion, a Master Mason and a member of Tuskegee's Lodge No. 57. In honor of his dedication to the Tuskegee community, the local young Volunteers in Action has proposed that the new YVA Youth Center be named the L. M. Gregg Memorial Youth Center. This would truly be a fitting tribute to this fine individual.

Mr. President, L. M. Gregg was an unselfish public servant, giving of himself at every opportunity. During his lifetime, he served as a stabilizing force in bringing unity to Tuskegee and its people. He will be sorely missed.

I extend my most sincere sympathies to his wife, Maude Gregg, his mother, Mrs. Charlotte Gregg, and his sons, Jeff and Bill.

I ask unanimous consent that an article from the Tuskegee newspaper be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the Tuskegee News, Apr. 5, 1984]

CITY MOURNS PASSING OF L. M. GREGG

Flags were flown at half-mast Monday as the City of Tuskegee mourned the passing of Chairman Pro-Tem L. M. Gregg.

Gregg passed away Saturday night at Baptist Hospital in Montogomery.

A native of Watauga County, North Carolina, Gregg came to Tuskegee in 1942 as a flight instructor at Moton Field. He was elected to the City Council in 1960 and served six consecutive terms (24 years) the last three of which he ran unopposed and served as Chairman Pro Tempore.

Those who did not know him through his work with the Council knew him as the owner of—Gregg's Cleaners which opened for business in 1947 and is located on South Main St. in Tuskegee.

Mayor Johnny Ford said Monday, "We lost a very dedicated public servant. L. M. Gregg was a stabilizing force here on the Council and he did much to heel the wounds that existed between the races during and following the civil rights struggle here in Tuskegee. L. M. Gregg will long be remembered as a most unselfish public servant who gave his best to this city and all of her people.

Gregg is survived by his wife Maude Godfrey Gregg; his two sons, Jeffrey A. Gregg of Tuskegee; and William M. Gregg of Athens, Ga.; two grandchildren, Jeffrey and Jason; one sister, Jackie Gregg Ward of Ashville, N.C.; and his mother Mrs. Ellen Gregg.

A memorial service was held for Gregg at the Municipal Complex Monday morning. Graveside services were held in Society Hill.

In honor of Chairman Pro-Tem Gregg, the City of Tuskegee Young Volunteers in Action is proposing to name the new YVA Youth Center, presently under renovation, the L. M. Gregg Memorial Youth Center.

"We feel it fitting that a facility dedicted to the youth of this community be so named because of his zestful life and energetic sense of fairness, futuristic visions and noble principles." YVA staff members stated.

A NATIONAL DAY OF PRAYER

Mr. THURMOND. Mr. President, today, May 3, 1984, has been proclaimed by President Reagan as a "National Day of Prayer." All across our land, millions of Americans of various faiths will unite with one voice and one purpose in beseeching God's blessing on this great nation.

Prayer is the channel by which we communicate our thanks to God for the freedoms he has provided Americans, and is the means by which we express our greatest needs to Him. We know that courageous leaders such as Washington, Lincoln, and others faced our Nation's most difficult challenges by looking to God in humble prayer. Today, Americans are no less dependent on God, and should follow the example of their forefathers in recognizing our Creator as the greatest source of strength and sustenance during these equally trying times.

Mr. President, because prayer is important in our lives, I will continue to work diligently toward the passage of my constitutional amendment allowing voluntary prayer in public schools, which the Senate failed to approve only months ago. The denial of prayer for our schoolchildren today could very well be a stumbling block for tomorrow's leaders.

Without question, prayer is an essential element in the spiritual life of our Nation. Let us join together on this "National Day of Prayer," as we should every day, to offer our praise to God and seek His continued guidance for America.

TERMINATION OF INQUIRY CONCERNING FORMER SENATOR HARRISON WILLIAMS

Mr. STEVENS. Mr. President, on behalf of Senator HEFLIN and myself, I ask unanimous consent that the order of the Select Committee on Ethics terminating its inquiry into allegations that former Senator Harrison Williams may have converted campaign contributions to his personal use be placed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the order was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

ORDER

FACTS

In April 1982, Bernard Mondi, Treasurer of the Williams' Project 76 Committee, filed an Advisory Opinion Request with the Federal Election Commission. The Commission's guidance was sought on the closing of the Senator's campaign committee account. Attached to the ruling request, and cited in it, was a March 26 letter to Mr. Mondi from Robert Flynn, Senator Williams' attorney, asserting that the Federal Election Campaign Act at 2 U.S.C. 439a permitted the Senator "to use excess campaign funds for any purpose he wishes . . ." The Commission's Response (AO 1982-33) concluded that the Federal Election Campaign Act made it possible for Members serving prior to January 8, 1980 to convert campaign contributions to their "personal use." The Commission noted, however, that it took no position on the application of Senate rules presented by the request, such rules not being within the Commission's jurisdiction.

The Senate Ethics Committee became aware of the Senator's campaign committee's Advisory Opinion Request and the Commission's action when newspaper articles appeared stating that Senator Williams intended to "pocket" about $70,000 in campaign contributions. Since Senate Rule 38.2 precludes Members and former Members from converting campaign contributions to their personal use, the Committee sought from Senator Williams an explanation of the use to which the campaign funds were to be put.

In December of 1982, Senator Williams and Mr. Flynn, appeared before the Committee. Senator Williams testified that all funds received from his campaign committee had been used to defray legal expenses related to the ABSCAM matter. In subsequent discussions with Ethics Committee attorneys, and in materials submitted to the Committee, Mr. Flynn has provided additional assurances that all funds derived from the campaign committee were used to defray legal expenses. He further stated that an automobile belonging to the campaign committee was either given directly to charity, or raffled off, the proceeds going to charity.

DISCUSSION

While the Committee has not received from Senator Williams and Mr. Flynn an accounting of campaign committee expenditures in complete detail, as we desire, we have seen no evidence indicating that Senator Williams' testimony was incorrect or that he "pocketed" campaign contributions. Since Senator Williams is now incarcerated in a Federal penal facility, we do not believe that Mr. Flynn will be able to secure all the relevant material that would be required to construct a full and complete accounting of expenditures from the Senator's campaign committee and further, we do not believe that this matter should remain unresolved for an indeterminate period of time.

HOLDINGS

1. We reaffirm our Interpretative Ruling No. 206 of December 11, 1978, which held that the donation of excess campaign contributions to a charitable organization is not a conversion to "personal use" prohibited by Rule 38.2. We extend that ruling to include assets held by a Senator's campaign committee.

2. We hold that the use of funds derived from Senator Williams' campaign committee to defray necessary and appropriate expenses incurred in legal proceedings related to the ABSCAM matter is not a conversion to personal use prohibited by Rule 38.2.

Accordingly, it is hereby ordered that the Committee's inquiry into this matter is terminated.

DIANA HOPE HAMILTON

Mr. DIXON. Mr. President, I would like to take this opportunity to salute an outstanding public servant, Diana Hope Hamilton, the executive director of the Northeast-Midwest Senate Coalition.

Diana is leaving the coalition to pursue a master's degree in business.

She has worked effectively with 38 Senators representing diverse political philosophies, which is no small accomplishment. She has also been able to galvanize representatives of our legislative staffs into working toward common goals that benefit the Northeast and Midwestern regions of the Nation.

Diana is an exceptional individual. She has mastered the techniques of the legislative process, while at the same time expanding the influence of the coalition.

I know of very few people who could accomplish what she has in 3 years.

The coalition is now interviewing candidates to replace Diana and we are having a difficult time finding a replacement because of the standards she met.

Along with my colleagues, I wish her well in her future endeavors and want Diana to know that we are going to miss her.

THE FUTURE OF AGRICULTURE IN 1985

Mr. KASTEN. Mr. President, I should like to call to the attention of my colleagues an article written by Mr. Ralph Hofstad, president of Land O' Lakes, Inc. This article entitled, "50-Year-Old Attitude Is No Longer Acceptable," presents a succinct overview of our Nation's agricultural policy and directions for the 1985 farm bill.

Mr. Hofstad states that in some respects agriculture is overlooked or taken for granted by the general public and policymakers alike. Considering that agriculture provides jobs for 23 million people and contributed $35 billion in exports last year to offset our national trade deficit, many U.S. citizens have yet to realize and appreciate the value of our agricultural economy.

An idea endorsed by Mr. Hofstad and others called for the establishment of a Presidential commission to study the intertwining of our agricultural policy with national policies. The result of the commission findings would be a benchmark for policy considerations included in the 1985 farm bill.

The President found favor with this idea and announced in January that the Cabinet Council on Food and Agriculture would conduct a comprehensive review and assessment of current food and agricultural policy. The Secretary of Agriculture, Mr. Block, chairs this Council.

In March, I questioned Secretary Block on the progress being made by the Cabinet Council on Food and Agriculture pertaining to preparation of the 1985 farm bill. He provided me with this information and an agenda, which outlines the objectives of the Council and the principal players involved.

Mr. President, I ask that the article written by Mr. Hofstad of Land O' Lakes, Inc., and Secretary Block's statement before the Cabinet Council on Food and Agriculture be printed in the RECORD.

The material follows:

50-YEAR-OLD ATTITUDE IS NO LONGER ACCEPTABLE

(By Ralph Hofstad)

A half a century ago, with the passage of the Agricultural Adjustment Act of 1933, our nation put into effect a set of farm policies and programs to meet the needs of the times. As a consequence, we have for the past 50 years tended to view ag policy as a self-contained body of ideas and programs with little relationship to our national and international policies and other interests. But times have changed. Significant relationships have developed.

Now, during discussion of the 1985 Farm Bill, is the time to set the situation right by producing a comprehensive, long-term food and agricultural policy that more adequately meets our current and future needs.

This new policy, in my view, must become an integral part of our foreign, trade, monetary and other policies so that various programs do not conflict with one another but, rather, recognize the interdependent relationship of one to the other. Additionally, this policy must be isolated from changes in administration and must help promote full and responsible utilization of our primary capability as a nation: the production of food.

The United States leads the world in food production for two basic reasons:

(1) Entrepreneurship of our family farm system encourages innovation and productivity.

(2) Our natural resources—vast land areas and friendly climate—provide an environment well suited for crop and animal production.

Agriculture and our entire food industry are natural treasures, our crown jewels. They regularly provide jobs for 23 million people and contributed $35 billion in exports last year as the single biggest offset to our mammoth trade deficit.

And yet, in some respects agriculture seems to be overlooked or taken for granted by the general public and policymakers alike. Even President Reagan neglected to mention our food and agricultural industry in his State of the Union address earlier this year.

Agricultural policy must address this lack of appreciation for the contribution our food system makes to the national economy, along with three other equally significant concerns:

Widely fluctuating farm prices.

High interest rates.

Weak export marketing program.

So where do we begin in drafting such a policy? I believe we start with the establishment of a presidential commission made up of cabinet-rank officials who are concerned with domestic and foreign affairs, as well as with leaders from all sectors of the nation's food and agricultural system, including farmers and consumers.

Senator Bob Dole endorsed just such an idea in his address to the Land O'Lakes annual meeting. The senator put it this way: "I have written President Reagan to recommend creation of a presidential task force on agricultural trade and food assistance policy, to report after the November elections and before debate begins on the new farm bill. The group would be asked to set out a long-term agenda and comprehensive policy statement, and also to rationalize the cost and purpose of existing export and assistance programs."

I applaud Senator Dole's stand. One idea I believe the commission should pursue is the formation of a Federal Food and Agriculture Board patterned after the Federal Reserve Board. This board could be given wide-ranging authority and responsibility in the areas of supply, distribution, pricing and other factors. The board, like the Federal Reserve Board, wouldn't be tied to the political fortunes of a particular administration and could operate in the best interest of agriculture. I believe that the consumer, the farmer, and representatives of our food and agricultural system would very much appreciate the opportunity to get involved in such an endeavor.

The President and the Congress must act now, establish the commission, and call for its findings before the final review of the 1985 Farm Bill but after the fall election so it's not a political commission. This select group of individuals chosen to participate in this important study must be able and willing to step back and take a good, hard look at our food and agricultural treasure and all of our national policies which impact on it.

Developing a Comprehensive Dialog and Review of Agriculture and Food Programs

(By John R. Block)

Unprecedented events in the U.S. and world economies over the last three years have brought current farm policy to the forefront of discussion. The growing interdependency of agriculture and the international market over the past two decades has rendered present farm policy tools ineffective in dealing with the resultant volatility and uncertainty. It is time to look at basic policy changes that agriculture must face realistically in the long run, particularly with respect to the new omnibus farm legislation that will be up for renewal in 1985.

While there are no clear answers to what changes should be made, I know everyone feels that the policies adopted during 1985 will affect agriculture through the turn of the century. There is a genuine need for all concerned parties—farmers, consumers, and those who supply the farmer with inputs as well as process and market the product from the farm gate to the retail store—to become involved in order to find the answers to the problems confronting agriculture.

This must be a long-term effort in which everyone listens to and learns from one another about the new realities facing agriculture both domestically and internationally. We must expose misconceptions to factual evidence and consider all viable options, disregarding philosphical differences. Agriculture is the largest and most important industry in our nation we must seek to ensure it a healthy future. The evolution of the current state of agriculture highlights some of these new realities.

Evolution of the Current Crisis in Agriculture and Food Policy

During the decade of the 1970's, the volume of U.S. exports increased 150 percent in response to a growing world demand. This growth in world demand is evidenced by an increase of nearly a third in world grain consumption and a rise in oilseed consumption of over 50 percent. Spurred by improved technology, U.S. agricultural output grew about a third during the decade in order to meet the heightened demand. Farm production assets more than tripled in that time of heavy investment. As a result, principal crop acreage harvested in the U.S. increased by about 55 million acres and livestock production made a substantial gain.

This was generally a time of increasing inflation worldwide. By the end of 1980 the annual rate of inflation in the U.S. was running 12 to 14 percent and interest rates were several percentage points higher. With heavy investment and high interest rates, farm debt soared, growing from $50 billion to over $150 billion in the decade of the 1970's.

In this inflationary period, farm market prices increased substantially and support levels, tied to the costs of production, were ratcheted up to unprecedented levels. At the same time, during the 1970's a relatively weak dollar enhanced our competitive position in world trade and helped lead to major gains in world markets, most notably grain and soybeans.

This was the setting at the time the Agriculture and Food Act of 1981 was being formulated. We had just come through a period of major expansion in the export earnings of the U.S. agricultural sector. It was widely believed that the United States was the only country that could produce enough food to satisfy the world's needs. Events of the 1970's were taken as precursors of things to come. Because of inflation, high and rising world oil prices, and a weak dollar, forecasts of continued strong export demand, rising production costs, and full production seemed reasonable expectations.

We should have reasoned that there would be times when we would move off trend, due in large part to the international influence on the farm economy. International and domestic economies had become increasingly interdependent, and we had little control over some major variables such as exchange rates, growth rates, and the like. While greater volatility was a reasonable expectation in an expanding world agricultural system, we were not prepared for the events that began unfolding in 1981 and have continued through the present.

First of all, the world experienced the worst and most pervasive recession in recent memory. With this came a downturn in world demand that saw our export volume decline for the first time in 13 years. The downturn in world demand had a dramatic impact upon many of our fastest growing markets in middle and lower income countries. The decade of the 1970's had witnessed tremendous increases in debt worldwide as the rapidly growing industrial countries and the dollar-rich OPEC countries provided large volumes of credit to many of these countries. With the downturn in world trade, these countries have had great difficulty earning sufficient hard currency through their own exports to pay the interest on their debt much less maintain import levels. Concurrently, less credit was available as growth rates in major industrial countries weakened and the OPEC trade surplus disappeared. Thus, as the financial condition of many of our prominent foreign customers such as Eastern Europe, Mexico and Brazil steadily worsened, their purchases from us plummeted. Our agricultural export volume for 1983 is estimated at 12 percent below 1980—the third straight year of decline—even though value may go up by close to $3 billion.

Meanwhile, the value of the dollar steadily increased as foreign investors sought the security and high rates of return from American investments. The increase in the value of the dollar meant that our products were becoming more expensive in terms of the local currencies of our foreign customers. Thus, American products became less competitive in world markets and our volume of trade suffered.

To make matters worse, the downturn in world demand was accompanied by increased tariffs and subsidization practices by some of our major foreign competitors—most notably the European Community (EC). For example, the EC just recently increased its subsidy for wheat flour in order to take over a larger portion of the Egyptian wheat flour market. Other countries such as Japan continue their policies of limiting access of certain agricultural products through quotas and non-tariff trade barriers.

Other factors beyond anyone's control, such as the weather, also compounded our problems during this period of stagnant demand. Unusually good weather worldwide during the 1981 and 1982 growing seasons resulted in record crops at home and good crops abroad. While we are appreciative of bountiful harvests, the record harvests of 1981 and 1982 came at a time of slack demand and resulted in the largest surpluses in history. The large surpluses continued to overhang the market as we approached the 1983 crop year, and this led to reduced prices and incomes for many farmers.

By the fall of 1982, it became obvious that the traditional commodity programs were insufficient to deal with the huge surpluses on hand. In fact, certain aspects of these programs were encouraging more to be produced. A special program was needed to specifically address the immediate needs of agriculture. As a stopgap measure, the payment-in-kind program (PIK) was the best alternative avilable to deal with the record surpluses. It did not short the market and was the least costly approach since it used government stocks and secured loans as payment for the acreage taken out of production.

The worst drought in 50 years followed on the heels of the PIK program and sharply reduced 1983 crop production, especially for feed grains and soybeans. For example, the estimates of corn production was 2 billion bushels higher in July than the harvested crop. Because of record carrying, crop supplies for 1983/84 are adequate for domestic and foreign needs. However, in addition to many unprotected crop producers, livestock and poultry producers have been financially squeezed by smaller feed supplies and rising feed prices as a consequence of the drought.

While the cause and effect of the various events that influence agriculture are often a matter of opinion, two fundamental facts are clear. First, the future is unpredictable. After witnessing world recession, record annual world grain, output, the largest acreage reduction even and the worst drought in a half a century—all in just over two years—I think few would disagree. Second, U.S. agriculture and the factors affecting it are changing as the sector becomes increasingly integrated into the domestic and internatioal economy. The agriculture and food sector has become an export sensitive sector that employs over 20 percent of the U.S. labor force and generates one-fifth of our nation's economic activity. It is no longer isolated from the development or policies of other sectors of our economy or the policies and events in other countries.

PRESIDENT REAGAN TAKES ACTION

President Reagan is well aware of the importance of agriculture in the economy. He has made special efforts to reassure the world of our role as a reliable supplier and he has eliminated the policies which have so damaged our image in major foreign markets. But he recognizes that we are in a watershed period for agriculture and food policy and we must act if we are to use this time effectively.

One of the first groups invited to meet with President Reagan at the White House in 1984 was a group of farm leaders. At that meeting on January 5, the President announced that he was charging the Cabinet Council on Food and Agriculture to conduct a comprehensive review and assessment of current food and agriculture programs. The President indicated that the purpose of this endeavor was to better prepare the Administration to participate in the debate on the future of Federal food and farm programs and policies. The President emphasized that his Administration would be seeking information and ideas from people inside and outside of government during this comprehensive review and assessment.

To understand the priority that President Reagan has placed on this review and assessment of future agriculture and food policy, it is necessary to know something about the President's decision-making process. The organizational structure that the Reagan Administration has devised for formulating policy advice builds upon a "Cabinet Government" approach.

Broad issues affecting the entire government and overall budgetary and fiscal matters are reviewed at meetings of the full Cabinet. Other issues that cross agency lines are reviewed, as appropriate, before the National Security Council or the Cabinet Councils on Economic Affairs, Commerce and Trade, Human Resources, Natural Resources and Environment, Food and Agriculture, Legal Policy, and Management and Administration.

The membership of the Cabinet Councils varies with department and agency responsibilities. The Cabinet Council on Food and Agriculture has the following membership: President Reagan, Chairman; Secretary of Agriculture, Chairman Pro Tem; Secretary of State; Secretary of Interior; Secretary of Commerce; Secretary of Transportation; U.S. Trade Representative; Director of the Office of Management and Budget; and Chairman of the Council of Economic Advisers.

The Cabinet Councils have three levels of operation. At the highest level, their meetings are chaired by the President. At working sessions, the lead Cabinet member on each Cabinet Council presides as chairman. The third level of Cabinet Council meetings involves a staff secretariat made up of representatives of each of the Cabinet Council members and headed by an executive secretary who is an employee of the White House Office of Policy Development. Once an issue is assigned to the appropriate Cabinet Council, issues should percolate upward through the system.

THE CABINET COUNCIL WORKING GROUP

In order to carry out the President's directive, we have established a Cabinet Council Working Group on Future Food and Agriculture Policy. The Working Group's mandate is three-fold; to initiate a dialogue on the future course of food and agriculture policy with interested parties inside and outside of government; to review and assess current food and farm programs; and to prepare a list of food and agriculture policy options for 1985 for consideration by the Cabinet Council on Food and Agriculture.

The Working Group is chaired by the Deputy Secretary of Agriculture, Richard E. Lyng, and consists of high-level officials from the Departments of State, Treasury, Interior, Commerce, and Transportation, the Office of the U.S. Trade Representative, the Office of Management and Budget, the Council of Economic Advisers, the White House Office of Legislative Affairs and the White House Office of Policy Development. The Executive Secretary of the Cabinet Council on Food and Agriculture serves as the executive director of the Working Group.

SETTING THE AGENDA

In February and March, the Working Group will begin an intensive internal discussion of the problems facing agriculture from the perspective of the various departments and agencies. The Department of Agriculture will begin the review and assessment with a comprehensive overview of the current conditions of the U.S. food and agriculture sector. The other agencies and departments will present their perspective on events shaping agriculture as viewed from their area of responsibility. For example, some of the issues to be discussed by respective agencies include:

Department of Treasury

What has been the impact of fiscal and monetary policy on developments in agriculture markets? What influence do exchange rates have on agricultural exports?

Department of State

What has been the contribution of aid programs to U.S. agricultural exports? Are aid recipients buying from U.S. competitors with U.S. aid dollars?

Department of Commerce

How important is agriculture to the U.S. economy? How have agricultural developments shaped the related input sectors such as machinery, fertilizer, chemicals, etc.?

Office of U.S. Trade Representative

How have current trends in protectionism shaped agriculture and what are the prospects for the future? What is the proper response to current trade problems? How have the GATT rules on international trade affected U.S. agricultural exports? Are the interests of agriculture, steel, textiles, autos and other industries compatible with a single position on trade issues?

Department of the Interior

Have commodity programs contributed to or detracted from efforts to conserve our natural resources?

Department of Transportation

How do transportation policies affect the domestic and international marketing of farm products? Do our transportation policies adequately serve the needs of rural America?

Office of Management and Budget

What has been the impact of agriculture on the budget?

Council of Economic Advisers

How important is agriculture to the U.S. economy? How much have consumers benefitted from agricultural programs? Do their outlays as taxpayers exceed their benefits as consumers in terms of abundant low cost, high quality food?

This process will give each member of the Working Group a broader perspective on the various agencies' views of agriculture. Most importantly, it will provide an opportunity to inform members of the Working Group on the new realities of the U.S. food and agriculture system. It will permit a clarification of any misconceptions concerning agriculture and its role in the economy and identify the highly controversial areas in which the Working Group may wish the subcommittees to concentrate their efforts in developing background materials. Critical unresolved differences of opinion among departments and agencies on how basic events impact agriculture warrant special attention.

SUBCOMMITTEES OF THE WORKING GROUP

In order to facilitate the development of basic factual information, the Working Group will be supported by the following subcommittees composed of representatives of interested agencies and departments:

Farm Commodity Programs (chaired by the Assistant Secretary for Economics, USDA);

International Trade and Foreign Food Assistance (chaired by the Under Secretary for International Affairs and Commodity Programs, USDA);

Resource Conservation (chaired by the Assistant Secretary for Natural Resources and Environment, USDA);

Research (chaired by the Assistant Secretary for Science and Education, USDA);

Farm Credit and Rural Development (chaired by the Under Secretary for Small Community and Rural Development, USDA); and Feeding and Nutrition Programs (chaired by the Assistant Secretary for Food and Consumer Services, USDA).

The chairpersons of the subcommittees will assure that interested departments and agencies have an opportunity to participate in the subcommittees' work. The chairpersons also will report the results of the subcommittees' deliberations to the Working Group.

The basic responsibility of the subcommittees will be to develop detailed, factual background papers to focus the dialogue on future food and agriculture policies in areas of greatest significance. The papers should create a factual base from which to evaluate the forces shaping U.S. and world agriculture. For example, the subcommittee on farm commodity programs would develop background material on the structure of each basic commodity industry, including production characteristics, supply/use trends, market development trends, history of government programs and the overall importance of the commodity in the U.S. and world economy. The subcommittee on international trade and foreign assistance would provide a profile of U.S. agriculture trade patterns to identify the key factors responsible for the current state of U.S. export markets. Similar factual papers will be prepared on credit programs, rural development programs, feeding programs, conservation programs and research. Subcommittee chairpersons may wish to invite expert subject matter specialists to develop background papers or make presentations to the subcommittees in the more complex and controversial areas identified during the internal Working Group review.

The subcommittees' background papers will be reviewed by the Working Group and released to the public as a basic educational document to facilitate an informed dialogue on farm program and policy options. The papers will contain no recommendations but will serve to present the issues in a factual context. The papers should be completed by the end of June.

THE SUBCOMMITTEES ROUNDTABLE DISCUSSIONS

In July through October, the subcommittees will provide an opportunity for a more detailed exchange of views on identified topics. Members of Congress, leaders of major farm organizations and commodity groups, representatives of key related industries such as fertilizer and machinery, consumer representatives and other subject matter experts will be invited to participate in these roundtable discussion sessions to further delineate the problems and options facing agriculture.

These discussions will be focused on the broad issues which affect all subsectors of the food and agriculture system. For example, in the area of commodity programs, the focus would be the impact of a selected policy tool, such as loan rates, on farm income, grain prices, livestock returns, consumer prices, exports and trade share.

SUBCOMMITTEES PREPARE LIST OF PROPOSED OPTIONS

During November, the subcommittees of the Working Group will develop detailed option papers on the basis of the dialogue at the roundtable discussions. All viable options will be carefully analyzed and the pros and cons of each alternative carefully stated to facilitate consideration by the Working Group.

WORKING GROUP PREPARES RECOMMENDATIONS TO CABINET COUNCIL

In December, the Working Group, utilizing the information provided by the subcommittees, will complete its deliberations and submit a list of recommended food and agriculture policy options to the Cabinet Council on Food and Agriculture for its consideration. After reviewing the Working Group's recommendations, the Cabinet Council will submit its recommendation on future food and agriculture policy to the President in early January 1985.

Our success in this endeavor will depend upon our commitment. We all know that our decisions are only as good as our own judgment and the information and counsel we receive from our trusted advisors. President Reagan recognizes that the strength of this nation lies with its people. Agriculture is a critical part of this nation, and food and farm programs and policies can only be enhanced by the forthright exchange of ideas whether it be in the wheat fields of Kansas, the cornfields of Illinois, the halls of Congress, the Cabinet Room of the White House or the Oval Office. The success of future foods and agriculture policies will reflect the commitment that each of us as individuals makes to ensuring the future health of agriculture.

JUDICIARY COMMITTEE TRIBUTE TO BURT WIDES

Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, with the departure of Burt Wides, the Senate Judiciary Committee is losing one of its most dedicated and talented counsels, and I am losing one of my most respected and valued aides. Burt is leaving the Senate for private law practice after more than a decade of outstanding service to the Senate and to the committee, and he will be greatly missed.

During his years in the Senate, Burt has dedicated himself to a wide range of issues, but most especially to civil rights. His outstanding work has earned him the gratitude of the Senate.

I and the other members of the Judiciary Committee and the Senate are deeply indebted to Burt Wides for his unique ability and his dedicated assistance to all of us. We will miss him, and we wish him well.

Mr. President, the Judiciary Committee honored Burt in a special resolution we approved at our meeting this morning, and I ask unanimous consent that it may be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the resolution was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

SENATE JUDICIARY COMMITTEE RESOLUTION COMMENDING BURT WIDES

Whereas, Burt Wides has been an outstanding and valued counsel to the Senate Judiciary Committee for thirteen years;

Whereas, Burt Wides has dedicated himself unselfishly to the highest ideals of the Constitution and laws of the United States;

Whereas, Burt Wides has rendered service of special excellence to the cause of civil rights and equal justice under law;

Whereas, but for the efforts of Burt Wides, there might not be a Voting Rights Act of the United States;

THOMAS WOJSLAWOWICZ

Mr. BRADLEY. Mr. President, I would like to call my colleagues attention to an unusual individual in my State who was recently selected for a special honor in his community. Mr. Thomas Wojslawowicz will receive tonight the Brotherhood Award of the Bayonne Chapter of the National Conference of Christians and Jews. This award is a fitting recognition of his outstanding service—particularly to the young people of Bayonne.

Mr. Wojslawowicz has served as a teacher in the Bayonne school system and varsity swimming coach for the last 20 years. He has also been the manager of the city's swimming pools for the last 11 years. In those capacities he has given unselfishly of his time and energy to help the young people of Bayonne develop their skills as well as their character.

In addition to his professional activities, Mr. Wojslawowicz has given his time and energy to church and civic activities in particular those that have responded to the needs of older Americans and have supported the rights of the Polish people to live in freedom. He has been cited many times by different groups in Bayonne and throughout the State of New Jersey for his leadership and service.

I join with his many friends and neighbors in recognizing the efforts of Thomas Wojslawowicz.

JULIA AND GEORGE HERMANN

Mr. BRADLEY. Mr. President, on Saturday, April 28, the Beth Tikvah New Milford Jewish Center in New Milford, N.J., honored Julia and George Hermann for many years of extraordinary service to their community. Independently, Mrs. Hermann has served as president of the Sisterhood of the center and held almost every chairmanship on its board. Mr. Hermann has been president of the congregation's men's club, held many positions on the board of directors, and is now a member of the Board of Governors. As formidable as they are individually, they have joined forces to cochair the Israel bond drive. Their successful effort was honored by the State of Israel.

The Hermanns have exhibited unselfish dedication and service to their synagogue and to their community at large. I am pleased that their friends have chosen to recognize their record of accomplishments.

CONGRESSMAN EDWARD P. BOLAND WINS JOHN F. KENNEDY AWARD

Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, on St. Patrick's Day last March, Congressman EDWARD P. BOLAND of Massachusetts delivered an eloquent and inspiring address to the St. Patrick's Day Parade Committee in Holyoke.

The occasion was a special one, because Congressman BOLAND was being honored this year as the recipient of the committee's John F. Kennedy National Award, which is presented each year to that person of Irish descent whose life and career have made an indelible impact on society.

I know that President Kennedy would have been especially proud of the award this year to his friend EDDY BOLAND. Over the years, Congressman BOLAND has secured an outstanding reputation of service to Congress and the country. He is a respected friend and colleague to all of us, and I congratulate him on this richly-earned and well-deserved honor.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the text of Congressman BOLAND's St. Patrick Day address may be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

ADDRESS OF CONGRESSMAN EDWARD P. BOLAND, ST. PATRICK'S DAY PARADE COMMITTEE, HOLYOKE, MASS., MARCH 17, 1984

At the outset, let me say that no greater honor has been accorded me in public life than that which the Holyoke St. Patrick's Day Parade Committee has bestowed on me tonight.

I accept the John F. Kennedy Award with pride and humility—and shall cherish it always in memory of that great patriot whose name it bears—and in remembrance of all of you here, who are so dedicated to the great heritage with which we have been enriched.

Indeed, it's a heartwarming and exhilarating experience to share with you that great intimacy of spirit which—through the ages—has satisfied the proudest insticts of men.

That is the spirit, the faith if you will, that makes the Irish what they are.

It is a faith that down through the centuries of suffering has been the essence of Ireland's greatness.

It embedded in her nature a devotion to God, that could never be extinguished, and a love for learning, that never failed, even when access to the sources of knowledge was denied for hundreds of years.

That faith conserved for the Irish the soul of civilization.

Where nations under lessor oppression have fallen, she stood bloody but unbowed—true to her creed and true to her God.

It was the Irish poet Moore who wrote:

"Other nations have fallen and thou are still young,
Thy Sun is but rising when others have set.
And through slavery's cloud o'er thy morning hath hung,
The full moon of freedom shall beam round thee yet
Erin, O Erin, though long in the shade.
Thy star will shine out when the proudest shall fade."

In 1963, I had the special privilege of traveling to Ireland with President Kennedy.

I remember, as clearly as if it had occurred this morning, the long drive from the airport through Dublin—down O'Connell Street to the United States Embassy in Phoenix Park—and the sheer joy and adulation of the hundereds of thousands who lined the way to greet their yankee boy, was a sight that had never been seen before, and perhaps never will be again.

I stood with him in the square at New Ross where his great grandfather Patrick Kennedy was born—and in a soccer field at Wexford where a choir of boys and girls serenaded him with "We're the Boys From Wexford."

We went to Cork City and met his mother's people, the Fitzgeralds—and it was there he told the crowd:

"Coming in I met four rather angry Fitzgeralds, they said they were tired of hearing about the Kennedys in New Ross—and what about the Fitzgeralds."

"I said, that was because of my grandfather who was mayor of Boston, John F. Fitzgerald, who used to tell everybody he was from Limerick, Donegal, Donnybrook, anywhere."

At the city hall, the president introduced to the mayor and council and crowd, Larry O'Brien and Dave Powers.

He presented, "the pastor of the church I go to, who comes from Cork, Monsignor O'Mahoney.

He is the pastor of a poor humble flock in Palm Beach, Florida.

Also a congressman who represents about 85 members of the House of Representatives who are Irish, Congressman Boland from Massachusetts came with us."

On June 28th we went back to Dublin where he spoke to the Irish Parliament.

In one of his finest speeches he said:

"In an age when history moves with the tramp of earthquake feet—in an age when a handful of men and nations have the power literally to devastate mankind—in such an age, it may be asked,—how can a nation as small as Ireland play much of a role on the world stage?

"I would remind people who ask the question, including those in other small countries, of the words of one of the great orators of the English language:

"All the world owes much to the little 'five feet high' nations. The greatest art of the world was the work of little nations. The most enduring literature of the world was the work of little nations. The heroic deeds that thrill humanity through generations, were the deeds of little nations fighting for their freedom. And, oh yes, the salvation of mankind came through a little nation."

And then it was on to Eyre Square in Galway where he told the thousands gatered there:

"If the day was clear enough and if you went down to the bay and you looked west, and your sight was good enough, you would see Boston, Massachusetts.

"You send us home with the warmest memories of you and your country. So I must say that, though other days may not be so bright as we look toward the future, the brightest days will continue to be those in which we visited you in Ireland."

And finally at Shannon—as he bid his farewell and spoke about a ballad immortalized by the great Irish tenor John McCormack, the 100th anniversary of whose birth we celebrate this year:

"Last night somebody sang a song, the words of which I am sure you know: "Come back to Erin Mavourneen, Mavourneen, come back aroun' to the land of my birth. Come back with the shamrock in the springtime Mavourneen."

"This is not the land of my birth," he said, "but it is the land for which I have the greatest affection and I certainly will come back in the springtime."

There was no springtime for Jack Kennedy.

The promise is gone, but today, and for all days we shall remember the splendor of example and inspiration that, in just 1,000 days, brought reassurance and hope to all people everywhere.

I shall carry with me always the memories of that marvelous journey—with all its joy, its camardarie, and magnificence.

But the emotions that were to touch me most deeply came when I left the Presidential party at Galway.

In the early morning of June 30th, I rented a car and took off for Kerry—down through the rolling hills of Galway—across the farmlands of Clare—through Limerick to Tralee—past Anascoul and Lispole into Dingle—and then on to Glen Faun, to the west of Dingle, where my father was born.

The Sun had been shining brightly all day—but just as I arrived at Faun, the rain clouds began to hang on the horizon over the Atlantic Ocean.

I parked my car and looked out across the broad expanse of ocean—savage and restless, cold and gray—the ocean that had beckoned to my people and yours and offered the promise of a new life in a new world.

As I stood there—in the place my forebearers had inhabited for centuries, I understood that the essence of Ireland is the story of her people, and the great leaders whose lives have been indelibly etched on the pages of Irish history:

The great saints of Ireland who spread the message of the gospel—St. Patrick whose feast day we celebrate today, and who brought Christ to Ireland and changed its eternal destiny.

St. Bridget, the beloved Mary of the Gael; Bridget of Kildare—who walked the hills and dales of Ireland sowing the seeds of Christianity.

St. Colm'cille—the founder of monasteries—whose extraordinary missionary activity took him not only all over the Emerald Isle, but to the other countries of Western Europe as well.

And so many others—Wolf Tone—who, 200 years ago, preached that Ireland would never be prosperous—would never be able to take her rightful place among the nations of the world—unless she was independent—free men and free women living under their own flag.

The immortal Robert Emmett, and the dream of freedom for which he sacrificed his fortune and his life—standing in the dock of Green Street in Dublin before he was publicly beheaded—uttering that magnificent oration—and in dying becoming a symbol of heroic sacrifice on the altar of liberty.

Daniel O'Connell—that great Kerryman whose birthplace in Charicaveen I was to visit the next day—whose voice in the last century was the voice of Ireland.

Long before anyone ever heard the phrase "Human Rights", he invoked the rights of his people against the tyranny and intolerance of the crown and, with the eloquence of eternity, caused trembling in the seats of the mighty and brought dignity to the people of Ireland.

And Eamon Devalera, whose leadership rallied a struggling nation and who unified and strengthened it by the plain force of his character.

I thought of those dreadful days of the 18th century when the hunted schoolmaster, with a price on his head and hidden from house to house, gathered his little class behind a hedge, in some remote mountain glen, and fed his eager pupils the forbidden fruit of knowledge.

I thought of the hunted priest—hiding like a thief among the hills—celebrating mass for his people in some clearing while faithful sentries watched from nearby hilltops for the approach of British soldiers.

And I thought of the days of the great famine when thousands were dying, and tens of thousands of those who survived wandered aimlessly over the land—or gazed hopelessly into infinite darkness and despair.

As I stood there—with the shadows lengthening and the first drops of rain beginning to fall, I marveled at their preserverance; how they kept the flame of freedom glowing through the centuries of struggle.

Ireland bred her scholars, her artists, her statesmen, and her saints—and when they could not wage war for Ireland, they became like wild geese, and fought for freedom elsewhere in the world.

The history of the United States is replete with examples of the contributions made by the Irish to the cause of justice and human freedom.

They came here, many of them—your people and mine—in the hold of a ship; part of the "tired, the poor, the huddled masses who yearned to breathe free." They came to Holyoke and to Hungry Hill—to Boston and New York and Philadelphia—to the North, South, East and West.

They attained little of life's worldly possessions—very few ever became wealthy, powerful or famous.

They worked in the mills—in the foundries—on the railroads—they built the bridges and dug the tunnels—they carried the bricks and they shoveled the coal.

They brought up their families, went to church, and most of them, lived and died without ever acquiring those things, the world has come to associate with success.

Many of them could not read or write and yet, in their unlettered, untutored way, they inspired their sons and daughters with the deep conviction that truth cannot be circumscribed by man-made boundaries, that there are values that transcend material considerations—and that above all, love for their god and respect for each other were essential to an enduring social order.

This was their legacy of love.

This indeed is the spirit that has preserved the soul of Ireland and has brought us to this day.

I must tell you that I made my way at last to the farm of my cousin, John Boland, in Faun.

It was dusk when I knocked on the door.

It was opened by his wife, Kate, whom I had never seen before in my life and who looked at me and said: "You're Eddie Boland." I asked, "how do you know?"

"Sure", she said, "we knew Jack Kennedy was coming, and we knew he wouldn't come without you."

I entered the house and in the front room, in the most prominent place on the far wall there were three pictures—Jesus Christ, on one side—Pope Paul VI, on the other side—and in the middle, a picture of John F. Kennedy.

After visiting the Bolands, I went to Carrig to see the Cavanaughs—my mother's people.

When I parked the car and started up the path to the house, a tall, lean man about 70, stepped out of a barn about 30 yards away—he looked at me and said, "you're a Boland."

I said, "Yes, I'm Eddie Boland."

He said, "we've been waiting for you."

I went into the House with him and sure enough there were three pictures on the wall—the Savior, Pope Paul VI and Kennedy in the middle.

And so it went, For the next two days I was taken to Bally-Ferriter and Bally David, to Ventry and Dunquin, to Dingle and Charicaveen to meet everyone and anyone who wanted to shake the hand of the guy who knew Jack Kennedy.

Yes, it was a great journey, and tonight, as I draw upon those memories, I pray for Ireland, for its people and for the day when they can live in peace in a United Ireland.

That unity must come through the union of hearts and minds, not by bloodshed, conquest, or fear.

It is toward that time of peace and unity, that all of us must work, in the spirit of President Kennedy to bind up Ireland's wounds, and see Ireland one nation, prosperous and strong, nourished in peace by the great traditions that make us all proud to call ourselves Irish.

I pray also for America, this Nation of ours that has long been a beacon of hope in an uncertain and troubled world.

May we never forget that the strength of this country has been the diversity of its people—the way in which men and women of a hundred different nationalities have joined in the pursuit of a common goal while keeping alive the traditions of the homeland of their ancestors.

No group in this country has been more effective in preserving the heritage of Ireland than the Holyoke St. Patrick's Day Parade Committee.

The spirit of Ireland lives for many who will never visit that fair isle because of the magnificent annual celebrations produced by this organization.

The honor you have paid me tonight will never be forgotten. My wife Mary thanks you. My daughters Martha and Kathleen thank you. My sons Edward and Michael thank you. And I thank you from the bottom of my heart. You have touched the Boland family deeply, and we are very grateful.

REPORT OF THE NEW IRELAND FORUM

Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, the report of the New Ireland Forum, released yesterday in Dublin, is the most promising initiative toward peace in more than a decade of violence and conflict in Northern Ireland.

In a sense, the document is a "declaration of interdependence" for a future in which Catholic and Protestant, Nationalist and Unionist can respect each other's aspirations and live and prosper together in a better Ireland. The report may well be the last best chance to break the intensifying cycle of killing and violence in Northern Ireland and achieve true reconciliation between the two great traditions of that land.

I hope that all sides of the conflict—in Dublin and London, in Derry and Belfast—will give this opportunity for peace a chance. And I also hope that President Reagan, in his visit to Ireland next month and in his talks with British and Irish leaders, will offer the full assistance of the United States in achieving this long-sought goal.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the text of the report of the New Ireland Forum may be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the report was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

2 MAY 1984

NEW IRELAND FORUM REPORT

CHAPTER 1

Preface

1.1—The New Ireland Forum was established for consultations on the manner in which lasting peace and stability could be achieved in a new Ireland through the democratic process and to report on possible new structures and processes through which this objective might be achieved.

1.2—Participation in the Forum was open to call to all democratic parties which reject violence and which have members elected or appointed to either House of the Oireachtas or the Northern Ireland Assembly. Four political parties took part in the Forum: the Fianna Fail Party, the Fine Gael Party, the Labour Party and the Social Democratic and Labour Party (SDLP). These four parties together represent over ninety per cent of the nationalist population and over three-quarters of the entire population of Ireland. The parties which participated in the Forum would have greatly preferred that discussions on a new Ireland should have embraced the elected representatives of both the unionist and nationalist population. However, the Forum sought the views of people of all traditions who agreed with its objectives and who reject violence. The establishment and work of the Forum have been of historic importance in bringing together, for the first time since the division of Ireland in 1920, elected nationalist representatives from North and South to deliberate on the shape of a new Ireland in which people of differing identities would live together in peace and harmony and in which all traditions would find an honoured place and have equal validity.

1.3—The leaders of the four participating parties met on 14 and 21 April, 1983 to consider arrangements for the Forum. Those present were the Taoiseach, Dr. Garret FitzGerald, TD, Leader of the Fine Gael Party; Mr. Charles J Haughey, TD, Leader of the Fianna Fail; the Tanaiste, Mr. Dick Spring, TD, Leader of the Labour Party; and Mr. John Hume, MP, MEP, Leader of the Social Democratic and Labour Party. The Party Leaders made the following arrangements: the Chairman to be Dr. Colm o hEocha, President of University College Galway and the Secretary to be Mr. John R. Tobin, Clerk of Seanad Eireann; the Forum would be assisted by an independent secretariat; membership of the Forum would comprise 27 members and 14 alternate members from the four parties.

1.4—The members and alternates nominated were:

Fianne Fail Party Members and Alternates:

Secretary: Veronica Guerin.

Fine Gael Party Members and Alternates:

Garret FitzGerald TD; Taoiseach; Peter Barry TD, Minister for Foreign Affairs; Myra Barry TD; Senator James Dooge; Paddy Harte TD; John Kelly TD; Enda Kenny TD; Maurice Manning TD; David Molony TD; Nora Owen TD; Ivan Yates TD.

Secretary: John Fanagan.

Labour Party Members and Alternates:

Dick Spring TD, Tanaiste and Minister for Energy; Frank Cluskey TD; Senator Stephen McGonagle; Frank Prendergast TD; Mervyn Taylor TD; Eileen Desmond TD; Senator Mary Robinson.

Secretary: Diarmaid McGuinness.

Social Democratic and Labour Party Members and Alternates:

John Hume MP, MEP; Seamus Mallon; Austin Currie; Joe Hendron; E. K. McGrady; Sean Farren; Frank Feely; Hugh Logue; Paddy O'Donoghue; Paschal O'Hare.

Secretary, Denis Haughey.

Proceedings of the Forum

1.5—The first session of the Forum was held in public in Dublin Castle on the 30th May 1983. It was opened by the Chairman, Colm o hEocha and was addressed by the Leaders of the four participating parties. There was a total of 28 private sessions and 13 public sessions and there were 56 meetings of the Steering Group, comprising the Chairman and the Party Leaders. In addition, sub-groups of the Forum examined in detail economic issues and the structures outlined in Chapters 6, 7 and 8.

1.6—Since the Forum was concerned to hear the widest possible range of opinion, in particular from Northern Ireland, written submissions were invited through advertisements in a wide range of newspapers, North and South. A total of 317 submissions was received from both parts of Ireland and from Britain, the United States of America, Belgium, France and Canada. These reflected many views, including those of the nationalist and unionist traditions, and covered a wide constitutional, legal, religious, educational and cultural matters. The Forum invited oral presentations from 31 individuals and groups in order to allow for further elaboration and discussion of their submissions. These sessions took place at 11 public meetings of the Forum from 20 September, 1983 to 9 February, 1984. The proceedings of these sessions have been published by the Forum. Appendix I lists the publications containing these proceedings and Appendix II lists individuals and groups who made written submissions.

1.7—A forum delegation from the four participating parties visited the North on 26/27 September, 1983, and met groups representative of a wide range of opinion. On 23/24 January, 1984, another Forum delegation held discussions in London with groups from the Conservative Party, the Labour Party, the Liberal Party and the Social Democratic Party.

1.8—The following reports, which analyse in detail different aspects of the problem, were prepared by the Forum and have been published separately: "The Cost of Violence arising from the Northern Ireland Crisis since 1969"; "The Economic Consequences of the Division of Ireland since 1920" and "A Comparative Description of the Economic Structure and Situation, North and South". These reports contribute to an understanding of the problems involved and provide an important point of reference. The following studies were commissioned by the Forum and have been published: The Macroeconomic Consequences of Intergrated Economic Policy, Planning and Co-ordination in Ireland by DKM Economic Consultants; and The Legal Systems, North and South by Professor C. K. Boyle and Professor D.S. Greer. Studies on the implications of integration in the agriculture, energy and transport sectors, prepared for the forum, are being published separately.

Acknowledgement of assistance received

1.9—The Forum records its gratitude to all who made submissions, written and oral. It acknowledges with thanks the contributions of those who acted as consultants on many aspects of the Forum's work. The very positive response to requests for assistance by the Forum and the large number of submissions and offers of help received bear striking testimony to the widespread and urgent desire among all traditions in Ireland that the Forum should succeed in contributing to peace and stability.

Introduction

2.1—The Forum has been imbued with an overriding sense of the importance and urgency of its task. It was established against a background of deep division, insecurity and violence that threatens society, primarily in Northern Ireland but also in the Republic and to a certain extent in Britain. The continuing crisis in Northern Ireland has reached critical proportions, involving intense human suffering and misery for many thousands of people. The persistence of division and of conflict on such a scale poses a fundamental challenge to those who support and practise democratic principles as a means to resolve political problems; in particular, since Britain exercises direct responsibility, it is a serious reflection on successive British Governments. More than thirty years after European statesmen successfully resolved to set aside their ancient quarrels and to work together in the European Community, the continuation of the conflict in Northern Ireland represents a dangerous source of instability in Western Europe and a challenge to the democratic values which Europe shares in common with North America and the rest of the Western World.

2.2—The analysis by the Forum of the crisis in Northern Ireland (Chapters 3 and 4) illustrates the inherent instability of the 1920 constitutional arrangements which resulted in the arbitrary division of Ireland. Each generation since has suffered from the discrimination, repression and violence which has stemmed from those constitutional arrangements.

2.3—The study of DKM Economic Consultants shows that the economic outlook for the North is very bleak as long as the present political paralysis and violence continue. This study indicates that on the basis of foreseeable economic trends, and in the absence of a political settlement leading to an end to violence, there would be virtual stagnation in the economy and a further substantial increase in unemployment. Unemployment in the North would increase from an estimated 122,000 in 1984 to as much as 166,000 (about 32 percent of civil employment) by the 1990's. Without political progress the scale of economic and social problems will increase greatly, exacerbating a highly dangerous situation. This will make increasingly intolerable the social and economic burden for both sections of the community in the North. It will also lead to a major increase in the financial burden on Britain because of the mounting cost of security and the increased expenditure necessary to shore up the economy and living standards of the area. For the South, there will be a further diversion of resources to security where expenditure is already disproportionately greater than that of Britain, while the adverse effects on the economy, particularly of the border areas, will be prolonged.

2.4—The immediate outlook for the North is extremely dangerous unless an acceptable political solution is achieved. The long-term damage to society worsens each day that passes without political progress. In political, moral and human terms there is no acceptable level of violence. There are at present no political institutions to which a majority of people of the nationalist and unionist traditions can give their common allegiance or even acquiesce in. The fundamental social bonds which hold people together in a normal community, already tenuous in the abnormal conditions of Northern Ireland, have been very largely sundered by the events and experiences of the past fifteen terrible years. However, despite the drawing apart of the two traditions since 1969, respect for basic human values was for a time maintained within each tradition. But as sensibilities have become dulled and despair has deepened, there has been a progressive erosion of basic values which is in danger of becoming irreversible. The immense challenge facing political leaders in Britain and Ireland is not merely to arrest the cancer but to create the conditions for a new Ireland and a new society acceptable to all its people.

2.5—The need for progress toward this objective is now so urgent that there can be no justification for postponing action. A major reassessement by Britain which at present exercises direct responsibility for Northern Ireland is required. There is an overwhelming need to give urgent and sustained priority to the initiation of a political process leading to a durable solution.

2.6—The conflict inherent in the Northern situation has surfaced dramatically in the last 15 years and the situation is progressively deteriorating within the present structures. The alienation of nationalists in Northern Ireland from political and civil institutions, from the security forces and from the manner of application of the law has increased to major proportions. There is fear, insecurity, confusion and uncertainty about the future in the unionist section of the community. Northern Ireland today is characterised by the fact that neither section of the community is happy with the status quo or has confidence in or a sense of direction about the future. It is essential that any proposals for political progress should remove nationalist alienation and assure the identity and security of both unionists and nationalists. Accordingly, in the search for the basis of a political solution the British and Irish Governments must together initiate a process which will permit the establishment and development of common ground between both sections of the community in Northern Ireland and among all the people of this island.

CHAPTER 3

Origins of the Problem

Failure of 1920 settlement

3.1—The existing political systems in Ireland have evolved from the 1920 constitutional arrangement by Britain which resulted in the arbitrary division of the country. Prior to 1920 and during many centuries of British rule, Ireland was administered as an integral political unit. The establishment of Northern Ireland as a separate political unit was contrary to the desire of the great majority of Irish people for the political unity and sovereignty of Ireland as expressed in the last all-Ireland election of 1918. That election also confirmed that the Protestants of North-East Ulster, fearful for the survival of their heritage, opposed separation of Ireland and Britain. Although the (British) Government of Ireland Act 1920 contemplated the eventual establishment of an all-Ireland Parliament within the United Kingdom, the settlement in fact entailed the partition of Ireland into two separate political units.

3.2—The Government and Parliament set up in the North were broadly acceptable to the unionist majority in the North and to the British Government; while maintaining their desire for Irish unity, when this was not attained, nationalists in the South dedicated themselves to building up the Southern state. Two groups found that their interests were not accommodated—the Northern nationalists and the Southern unionists. However, the constitutional, electoral and parliamentary arrangements in the South specifically sought to cater for the minority status of Southern unionists and did so with considerable, if not total, success. The intention underlying the creation of Northern Ireland was to establish a political unit containing the largest land area that was consistent with maintaining a permanent majority of unionists. Since they were now in a minority, the Northern nationalists were the principal victims of the arrangements and, although some hoped that the Boundary Commission would bring within the jurisdiction of the South areas of predominantly nationalist population, this did not take place.

3.3—Because of the failure of the British government to accept the democratically expressed wishes of the Irish people and because of the denial of the right of nationalists in the North to political expression of their Irish identity and to effective participation in the institutions of Government, the 1920 arrangements did not succeed. The fundamental defects in the resulting political structures and the impact of ensuing policy led to a system in the North of supremacy of the unionist tradition over the nationalist tradition. From the beginning, both sections of the community were locked into a system based on sectarian loyalties.

3.4—The failure of the arrangements was clearly acknowledged by the British Government and Parliament of Northern Ireland, established under the Government of Ireland Act, 1920, with direct rule. The subsequent Northern Ireland Constitution Act, 1973, was intended to provide a framework for agreed government in Northern Ireland but, following the collapse in 1974 of the ensuing Sunningdale arrangements, many of the provisions of the 1973 Act have been effectively in abeyance. Thus, over 60 years after the division of Ireland, workable and acceptable political structures have yet to be established in the North.

Consequence of the division of Ireland up to 1968

3.5—During the Home Rule for Ireland debates in the British Parliament in 1912, many arguments were advanced by British political leaders in favour of maintaining the unity of Ireland. The British Government had introduced a Bill that proposed to give Ireland a separate Parliament with jurisdiction over her internal affairs while reserving power over key issues. However, faced with the unionist threat to resist this Bill by unlawful force, the British Government and Parliament backed down, and when the Government of Ireland Act of 1914 was placed on the statute book in Westminster, there was a provision that it would not come into operation until after Parliament had an opportunity of making provision for Ulster by special amending legislation. The message—which was not lost on unionists—was that a threat by them to use violence would succeed. To the nationalists the conclusion was that the democratic constitutional process was not to be allowed to be effective. This legacy continues to plague British-Irish relations today.

3.6—Although partition was established by the British Parliament in the Government of Ireland Act, 1920, that Act also made provision for the two parts of Ireland coming together again, and it sought to encourage this process through a Council of Ireland. In the period immediately after 1920, many saw partition as transitory. It soon became clear, however, that successive British Governments were in practice willing to allow a system of untrammelled one-party rule in Northern Ireland to be exercised by and on behalf of the majority unionist population. Not only were the wishes of the people of the rest of Ireland as a whole discounted but the identity of nationalists in the north were disregarded.

3.7—Since its establishment, partition has continued to overshadow political activity in both parts of Ireland. The country as a whole has suffered from this division and from the absence of a common purpose. The division has absorbed the energies of many, energies that otherwise would have been directed into constructing an Ireland in which nationalists and unionists could have lived and worked together. Instead of a positive interaction of the unionist and nationalist traditions, the emphasis in both parts of Ireland was on the predominant value system of each area, leading to a drifting apart in laws and practices. The most tragic measure of the Northern Ireland crisis is the endemic violence of the situation. Moreover, the situation has persistently given rise to tensions and misunderstandings in the British-Irish relationship in place of the close and harmonious relationship that should normally exist between neighboring countries that have so much in common.

3.8—In its report, The Economic Consequences of the Division of Ireland since 1920, the Forum noted that division gave rise to considerable economic costs, North and South. For example, in the absence of co-ordinated long-term planning, capital investment in areas such as energy, education and health has entailed considerable duplication of expenditure. The impact on areas contiguous to the border was particularly adverse. Not only were they detached from their trading hinterlands, but the difficulties of their location were worsened by their transformation into peripheral regions at the dividing line of two new administrative units. Had the division not taken place, or had the nationalist and unionist traditions in Ireland been encouraged to bring it to an end by reaching a mutual accommodation, the people of the whole island would be in a much better position to benefit from its resources and to meet the common challenges that face Irish society, North and South, towards the end of the 20th century.

3.9—Since 1922, the identity of the nationalist section of the community in the North has been effectively disregarded. The symbols and procedures of the institutions to which nationalists are required to give allegiance have been a constant reminder of the denial of their identity. Apart from a few local authorities and the power-sharing Executive which was briefly in being following the Sunningdale Agreement in 1973, they have had virtually no involvement in decision-making at the political levels. For over 50 years they lived under a system of exclusively unionist power and privilege and suffered systematic discrimination. They were deprived of the means of social and economic development, experienced high levels of emigration and have always been subject to high rates of unemployment. The consequences of this policy became particularly evident in those areas which have a predominantly nationalist population.

3.10—Unionists had to cope with a situation which was not their first choice. Originally, they opposed change and sought to keep all of Ireland in the United Kingdom. They later opposed Home Rule and then independence for the whole island. In the event, the South became a Dominion, and later a Republic outside the Commonwealth. Provision was made for the two parts of Ireland to come together in a Council of Ireland but the North was also given the option not to be part of the New Irish State and to revert to the United Kingdom. This option was exercised at once and the North found itself with a Home Rule devolved government which it had not sought. From the beginning, unionist insecurity in regard to their minority position in the island as a whole had a profound effect on the manner in which political structures were organised in the North. Political dialogue with the nationalist was avoided for fear of undermining the unionist system of exclusive power and privilege. Fears were stimulated of forcible absorption of unionists into an all-Ireland Republic, dominated as unionists saw it by a Roman Catholic and a Gaelic ethos. Those fears led many unionists to equate Roman Catholicism with nationalism and to regard the nationalist minority in the North as a threat to the survival of their power and privilege.

3.11—As a result, the people in both sections of the community lived under the shadow of sectarian politics and the fear of domination of one tradition by the other.

3.12—Irish nationalism found sovereign and international expression in partial fulfilment of its objectives through the establishment of an independent, democratic state in the South. Since 1922, the primary efforts of successive Governments have been concentrated on consolidation and development of the State which has a record of significant achievement. The process of development of an institutional and legal framework, of international assertion of sovereignty, and of concentration on industrial, economic and social development resulted, however, in insufficient concern for the interests of the people of Northern Ireland. Efforts were made from time to time by all nationalist parties to highlight the effects of the partition of the country, and the injustices which the nationalist population of the North had to suffer, without response from successive British Governments. Moreover, the experience of partition has meant that for two generations there has been no unionist participation in political structures at an all-Ireland level. Rather, the Southern state has evolved without the benefit of unionist influence.

3.13—Since 1969, Northern Ireland has endured a sustained political crisis. This crisis has been different from previous manifestations of the underlying problem, not only because of the scale of the violence, but also because the crisis has shown no signs of early resolution. On the contrary, the political conflict underlying the violence has worsened and will continue to so unless there is urgent action to bring about significant political progress.

3.14—The present crisis in the North arose when non-violent campaigns in the late 1960's for basic civil rights and for an end to systematic discrimination in the areas of electoral rights, housing and employment were met with violence and repression. Even modest steps towards dialogue and reform undertaken by the unionist administration of Northern Prime Minister, Terence O'Neill met with vigorous opposition from certain sections of unionist opinion. Some of that opposition found expression in sectarian attacks against nationalists and bomb attacks on public utilities. The partial attitude of the local institutions of law and order, especially the B-Special Constabulary, resulted in failure to protect the nationalist population against sectarian attacks, which were particularly virulent in West Belfast. The conditions were thus created for revival of a hitherto dormant IRA which sought to pose as the defenders of the nationalist people. The resulting conflict gave rise to the deployment of the British Army on the streets of Northern Ireland in 1969.

3.15—The British Army was initially welcomed by the nationalist population as providing protection from sectarian attacks. However, the relationship between the nationalist population and the British Army deteriorated shortly afterwards. This was due to insensitive implementation of security measures in nationalist areas and a series of incidents in which the British Army was no longer perceived by nationalists to be acting as an impartial force. 1970 was thus a critical turning point and the experience of nationalists then and subsequently has profoundly influenced their attitudes, especially in regard to security. Among the major incidents which contributed to this alienation were the three-day curfew imposed on the Falls Road in June 1970; the internment without trial in August, 1971 and of hundreds of nationalists; the subsequent revelation that some of those taken into custody on that occasion were subjected to treatment later characterized by the Strasbourg Court of Human Rights as "inhuman and degrading"; the shooting dead of 13 people in Derry by British paratroopers in January 1972; and the beatings and ill-treatment of detainees in Castlereagh Barracks and Gough Barracks in 1977/78, subsequently condemned in the official British Bennett report.

3.16—Some hope of an improvement in the plight of nationalists followed the introduction of direct rule by Westminster in 1972. Negotiations in 1973 between the Northern parties and subsequently at Sunningdale between the Irish and British Governments, with Northern nationalist and unionist participation, brought about the short-lived Executive in which nationalists and unionists shared power in Northern Ireland. Provision has also been made as part of the Sunningdale Agreement for a new North-South dimension through a Council of Ireland. Both the Irish and British Governments made declarations on the status of Northern Ireland in which the Irish Government recognized that there could be no change in the status of Northern Ireland until a majority there desired it and the British Government affirmed that if in the future the majority of the people of the North should indicate a wish to become a part of a united Ireland, the British Government would support that wish. However, faced with extremist action by a section of the unionist community, a new British Government in 1975 failed to sustain the Sunningdale Agreement. The collapse of the Sunningdale arrangements dashed the hopes of nationalists and seriously damaged the prospects of achieving peace and stability in Northen Ireland. It recalled the earlier backdown of 1914: to unionists it reaffirmed the lesson that their threat to use force would cause British Governments to back down; to nationalists it reaffirmed their fears that agreements negotiated in a constitutional framework would not be upheld by British Governments in the face of force or threats of force by unionists.

3.17—Until the Downing Street Declaration in 1969, the plight of Northern nationalists was ignored by successive British Governments and Parliaments. However, notwithstanding the attempts to remedy some of the worst aspects of discrimination and the introduction of direct rule from London in 1972, the structures in Northern Ireland are such that nationalists are still discriminated against in social, economic, cultural and political terms. Their representation and influence in the private and public structures of power remain very restricted. There is, in practice, no official recognition of their identity nor acceptance of the legitimacy of their aspirations. In the economic sphere, as the reports of the Fair Employment Agency have shown, discrimination against Catholics in employment persists. Their day-to-day experience reinforces nationalist convictions that justice and effective exercise of their rights can come only from a solution which transcends the context of Northern Ireland and which provides institutions with which they can identify.

3.18—Despite the British Government's stated intensions of obtaining political consensus in Northern Ireland, the only policy that is implemented in practice is one of crisis management, that is, the effort to contain violence through emergency measures by the military forces and the police and through extraordinary judicial measures and a greatly expanded prison system. The framework within which security policies have operated and their often insensitive implementation have, since 1974, deepened the sense of alienation of the nationalist population. Inevitably, as during the 1980/81 hunger strikes when the warnings of constitutional nationalists were ignored by the British Government, security issues have been exploited by the paramilitaries in order to intensify alienation and with a view to increasing their support. Such alienation threatens the civilized life and values of entire communities and undermines the belief that democratic policies alone can offer peace, justice and stability.

3.19—The paramilitary organizations of both extremes feed on one another and on the insensitivity of British policy and its failure to provide peace and stability. Their message is one of hatred and of suppression of the rights of those of the other tradition. Their actions have caused appalling loss of life, injury, damage to property and considerable human and economic loss to the people of both traditions. They succeed only in sowing fear, division and distrust within the whole community.

3.20—The negative effect of IRA violence on British and unionist attitudes cannot be emphasized enough. Their terrorist acts create anger and indignation and a resolve not to give into violence under any circumstances. They have the effect of stimulating additional security measures which further alienate the nationalist section of the community. They obscure the underlying political problem. They strengthen extremist unionist resistance to any form of dialogue and accommodation with nationalists. Similarly, terrorist acts by extreme loyalist groups which affect innocent nationalist people have a correspondingly negative impact on nationalist attitudes. The involvement of individual members of the security forces in a number of violent crimes has intensified this impact. Every act of murder and violence makes a just solution more difficult to achieve. The greatest threat to the paramilitary organizations would be determined constitutional action to reach and sustain a just and equitable solution and thus to break the vicious circle of violence and repression. No group must be permitted to frustrate by intimidation and threats of violence the implementation of a policy of mutual accommodation.

3.21—The Forum's report, The Cost of Violence arising from the Northern Ireland Crisis since 1969, has attempted to quantify the human loss and economic costs of violence and political instability in the North. The most tragic loss is that of the deaths of over 2,300 men, women and children. These deaths in an area with a population of one and one half million are equivalent in proportionate terms to the killing of approximately 84,000 in Britain, 83,000 in France or 350,000 in the United States of America. In addition, over 24,000 have been injured or maimed. Thousands are suffering from psychological stress because of the fear and tension generated by murder, bombing, intimidation and the impact of security measures. During the past 15 years, there have been over 43,000 recorded separate incidents of shootings, bombings and arson. In the North the prison population has risen from 686 in 1967 to about 2,500 in 1983 and now represents the highest number of prisoners per head of population in Western Europe. The lives of tens of thousands have been deeply affected. The effect on society has been shattering. There is hardly a family that has not been touched to some degree by death, injury or intimidation. While the South and Britain have not suffered on the same scale, they too have been affected directly by the violence—by bombings, armed robberies and kidnapping and by other acts resulting in deaths, maiming and threats to security; they have also had to bear a significant price in terms of extraordinary security and judicial measures.

3.22—As that report also shows the economic and financial costs have been very high. They include additional security costs and compensation for deaths, injuries and considerable damage to property. Since 1969 the estimated total direct costs, in 1982 prices, is IRL 5,500 million (1) incurred by the British Exchequer in respect of the North and IRL 1,100 million (2) incurred by the Irish Exchequer in the South. Over the past 15 years the violence has destroyed opportunities for productive employment, severely depressed investment that could have led to new jobs and greater economic well-being, and greatly damaged the potential of tourism. These further indirect costs in terms of lost output to the economies of the North and the South could be as much as IRL 4,000 million (3) and IRL 1,200 million (4), respectively, in 1982 prices.

(2) Equivalent to Stg.901m. or US$1,300m at current (30 March 1984) exchange rates.

(3) Equivalent to Stg.3,278m. or US$4,728m at current (30 March 1984) exchange rates.

CHAPTER 4

Assessment of the Present Problem

Assessment of recent British policy

4.1—The present formal position of the British Government, contained in Section 1 of the Northern Ireland Constitution Act, 1973, is that the only basis for constitutional change in the status of Northern Ireland within the United Kingdom is a decision by a majority of the people of Northern Ireland. In practice, however, this has been extended from consent to change in the constitutional status of the North within the United Kingdom into an effective unionist veto on any political change affecting the exercise of nationalist rights and on the form of government for Northern Ireland. This fails to take account of the origin of the problem, namely the imposed division of Ireland which created an artificial political majority in the North. It has resulted in a political deadlock in which decisions have been based on sectarian loyalties. Sectarian loyalties have thus been reinforced and the dialogue necessary for progress prevented. The Sunningdale Agreement of 1973 introduced dialogue and partnership to the Government of Northern Ireland. However, the hopes thus raised were dashed by a number of factors, amongst them the refusal of the then British Government to support the power-sharing Executive in the face of loyalist extremist disruption.

4.2—Since the Sunningdale Agreement of 1973, several initiatives have been undertaken, in response to circumstances, with the states aim of resolving the problem in a context limited to Northern Ireland. These initiatives foundered largely because the problem itself transcends the context of Northern Ireland. It is only in a fundamental change of context that the effective exercise on an equal basis of the rights of both nationalists and unionists can be permanently ensured and their identities and the traditions accommodated. Although the policy of the British Government was to favour power-sharing, there was no firm determination to insist on implementation of this policy in practice. Nor was recognition of the Irish identity of Northern nationalists given any practical expression. Thus it is that initiatives, which may give the appearance of movement and flexibility to domestic and international opinion, have been inadequate though not addressing the fundamental nature of the problem. Instead the crisis has been addressed as a security problem and the political conditions which produced the conflict and sustain the violence have in effect been ignored.

4.3—The immobility and short-term focus of British policy—the fact that it has been confined to crisis management and does not take account of fundamental causes—is making an already dangerous situation worse. There is increasing frustration with the state of political paralysis, uncertainty as to long-term British intentions and growing mutual distrust between both sections of the community. The failure to provide the nationalist population of the North with any constructive means of expressing its nationalism and its aspirations is undermining constitutional politics. The net effect of existing policy is to drive both sections of the community in Northern Ireland further apart, alienating them from each other and providing a breeding ground for despair and violence. It has thus contributed to the emergence in both sections of the community of elements prepared to resort to violence, on the one side to preserve, and on the other to change the existing constitutional position.

4.4—The problem of security is an acute symptom of the crisis in Northern Ireland. Law and order in democratic countries and, in particular, the introduction of emergency measures depend on a basic consensus about society itself and its institutions. Present security policy has arisen from the absence of political consensus. In Northern Ireland, extraordinary security actions have taken place that call into question the effectiveness of the normal safeguards of the legal process. This has led to harassment of the civilian population by use of abnormally wide powers of arrest and detention, exercised not for the purpose of bringing suspects before a court of justice and making them amenable to a process of law but for the purpose of gathering information and unjustifiably invading the privacy of a person's life; e.g. between 1978 and 1982 more than 22,000 people were arrested and interrogated, the vast majority being released without charge. This has the consequence that the availability of legal remedy of habeas corpus in Northern Ireland is in practice extremely limited. It has also at different periods led to the use of internment without trial combined with inhuman interrogation methods that have been found to be in breach of the European Convention on Human Rights; the trial and conviction of people on evidence of paid informers; the use of plastic bullets; and killings by some members of the security forces in doubtful circumstances. The various measures were introduced on the basis that they were essential to defeat terrorism and violent subversion, but they have failed to address the causes of violence and have often produced further violence.

4.5—Nationalists, for the most part, do not identify with the police and the security forces. It is clear that the police will not be accepted, as they are in a normal democratic society, by the nationalist section of the community nor will they themselves feel confident in their relations with nationalists, until there is a change in the political context in which they have to operate.

Nationalist identity and attitudes

4.6—The parties in the Forum, representing a large majority of the people of Ireland, reaffirm that their shared aim of a united Ireland will be pursued only by democratic political means and on the basis of agreement. For nationalists, a central aim has been the survival and development of an Irish identity, an objective that continues in Northern Ireland today as nationalists seek effective recognition of their Irish identity and pursue their rights and aspirations through political means. For historical reasons, Irish nationalism may have tended to define itself in terms of separation from Britain and opposition to British domination of Ireland. The positive vision of Irish nationalism, however, has been to create a society that transcends religious differences and that can accommodate all traditions in a sovereign independent Ireland united by agreement. The aim of nationalists, therefore, in seeking Irish unity is to develop and promote an Irishness that demonstrates convincingly to unionists that the concern of the unionist and Protestant heritage can be accommodated in a credible way and that institutions can be created which would protect such concerns and provide fully for their legitimate self-expression.

4.7—The division of Ireland inevitably gave rise to the unconscious development in both parts of Ireland of partitionist attitudes on many political, economic, cultural and social questions of importance, diminishing significantly the development of a prosperous democratic society on the whole of the island. Such attitudes persist up to the present day. However, the tragedy of Northern Ireland and the suffering of the people there has stimulated among nationalists in both parts of Ireland a new consciousness of the urgent need for understanding and accommodation. The work of the Forum has underlined the urgent need for sustained efforts and practical steps in the political, economic, cultural and social spheres to transform the present nationalist/unionist relationship and to promote and secure consensus. In addition, both parts of Ireland, North and South, face a number of economic and social realities which contribute to the sense of urgency in providing for a political solution. These include the demographic profile of the population and the very high unemployment rate in both parts of the island and the problem of steady emigration from Northern Ireland of a substantial proportion of educated young people.

Unionist identity and attitudes

4.8—Unionists have tended to view all form of nationalist self-expression as being directed aggressively against them and the North's status within the United Kingdom. Although the true nationalist ideal rejects sectarianism and embraces all the people of Ireland whatever their religion, Northern Protestants fear that their civil and religious liberties and their unionist heritage would not survive in a united Ireland in which Roman Catholicism would be the religion of the majority of the population. They base this fear on a number of factors including the diminution of the numbers of Southern Protestants since partition and the perception that the Constitution and certain laws in the South unduly favour the ethos of the predominant religion. The Forum has attempted not only to determine "what do unionists seek to prevent?" but also "what do they seek to protect?". What they seek to prevent varies to some degree but includes: an all-Irish State in which they consider that the Roman Catholic Church would have undue influence on moral issues, the breaking of the link with Britain; and loss of their dominant position consequent upon giving effective recognition to the more important question of "what do unionists seek to protect?" and to identify what qualities in the unionist ethos and identity must be sustained, nationalists must first of all acknowledge that unionists, sharing the same island, have the same basic concerns about stability and security as nationalists. The major difference between the two traditions lies in their perceptions of how their interests would be affected by various political arrangements. These perceptions have been largely formed by different historical experiences and communal values.

4.9—In public sessions of the Forum, contributors who put forward the unionist point of view were asked "what is it that the unionists wish to preserve?". Three elements were identified in their replies:

(1) Britishness;

(2) Protestantism;

(3) The economic advantages of the British link.

The degree of emphasis on each of these three elements varied among those who made submissions.

4.9.1—Unionists generally regard themselves as being British, the inheritors of a specific communal loyalty to the British Crown. The traditional nationalist opposition to British rule is thus seen by unionists as incompatible with the survival of their own sense of identity. Unionists generally also regard themselves as being Irish even if this does not include a willingness to live under all-Ireland political institutions. However, many of them identify with Ireland and with various features of Irish life and their culture and way of life embrace much that is common to people throughout Ireland.

4.9.2—The Protestant tradition, which unionism seeks to embody, is seen as representing a particular set of moral and cultural values epitomised by the concept of liberty of individual conscience. This is often accompanied by a Protestant view of the Roman Catholic ethos as being authoritarian and as less respectful of individual judgement. There is a widespread perception among unionists that the Roman Catholic Church exerts or seeks to exert undue influence in regard to aspects of the civil and legal organisation of society which Protestants consider to be a matter for private conscience. Despite the implicit separation of Church and State in the 1937 Constitution, many unionists hold the view that the Catholic ethos has unduly influenced administration in the South and that the latter, in its laws, attitudes and values has not reflected a regard for the ethos of Protestants living there.

4.9.3—There is also an economic concern in the perception of unionists in the North which is shared by nationalists. Studies by the Forum show that while living standards, North and South, are now broadly comparable, the North is heavily dependent on and its economy sustained by, the financial subvention from Britain. While a settlement of the conflict entailing an end to violence and the dynamic effects of all-Ireland economic integration would bring considerable economic benefits reconstruction of the Northern Ireland economy and the maintenance of living standards in the meantime would require the continued availability of substantial transfers from outside over a period of years, whether from Britain, the European Community, and the United States of America, or from Ireland as a whole.

4.10—There are other factors that are important in understanding the unionist opposition to a united Ireland. Among unionists there are fears, rooted in history and deriving from their minority position in Ireland as a whole. In more recent times the campaign of IRA violence has intensified those fears. Tensions have also arisen in regard to the South's extradition laws. There are similar fears in the nationalist tradition, based on experience of discrimination, repression and violence. In modern times, the unionist sense of being besieged has continued. Unionist leaders have sought to justify their opposition to equal treatment for nationalists in Northern Ireland on the basis that the demand for political expression of the nationalist identity, no matter how reasonable and justified, would lead to nationalist domination over the unionist population in a united Ireland.

Need for accommodation of both identities in a new approach

4.11—The Forum rejects and condemns paramilitary organisations and all who resort to terror and murder to achieve their ends. It strongly urges people in Ireland of all traditions and all those who are concerned about Ireland elsewhere in the world to refuse any support or sympathy to these paramilitary bodies and associated organisations. The acts of murder and violence of these organisations and their denial of the legitimate rights of others, have the effect of undermining all efforts to secure peace and political progress. Constitutional nationalists are determined to secure justice for all traditions. The Forum calls for the strong possible support for political progress through the democratic process.

4.12—Before there can be fundamental progress a major reassessment by Britain of its position is now essential. Underlying British thinking is the fear that the risks of doing something to tackle the fundamental issues are greater than the risks of doing nothing. This is not the case. The situation is daily growing more dangerous. Constitutional politics are on trial and unless there is action soon to create a framework in which constitutional politics can work, the drift into more extensive civil conflict is in danger of becoming irreversible, with further loss of life and increasing human suffering. The consequences for the people in Northern Ireland would be horrific and it is inconceivable that the South and Britain could escape the serious threats to stability that would arise. With each day that passes, political action to establish new structures that will resolve the fundamental problems become more pressing. Such political action clearly carries less risk than the rapid growing danger of letting the present situation drift into further chaos.

4.13—The new Ireland must be a society within which, subject only to public order, all cultural, political and religious belief can be freely expressed and practiced. Fundamental to such a society are freedom of conscience, social and communal harmony, reconciliation and the cherishing of the diversity of all traditions. The criteria which relate to public legislation may not necessarily be the same as those which inform private morality. Furthermore public legislation must have regard for the conscientious beliefs of different minority groups. The implementation of these principles calls for deepening and broadening of the sense of Irish identity. No one living in Ireland should feel less at home than another or less protected by law than his or her fellow citizen. This implies in particular, in respect of Northern Protestants, that the civil and religious liberties that they uphold and enjoy will be fully protected and guaranteed and their sense of Britishness accommodated.

4.14—It is clear that a new Ireland will require a new constitution which will ensure that the needs of all traditions are fully met. Society in Ireland as a whole comprises a wider diversity of cultural and political traditions than exists in the South, and the constitution and laws of a new Ireland must accommodate these social and political realities.

4.15—The solution to both the historic problem and the current crisis of Northern Ireland and the continuing problem of relations between Ireland and Britain necessarily requires new structures that will accommodate together two sets of legitimate rights: The rights of nationalists to effective political, symbolic and administrative expression of their identity; and the right of unionists to effective political symbolic and administrative expression of their identity, their ethos and their way of life.

So long as the legitimate rights of both unionists and nationalists are not accommodated together in new political structures acceptable to both, that situation will continue to give rise to conflict and instability. The starting point of genuine reconcilation and dialogue is mutual recognition and acceptance of the legitimate rights of both. The Forum is convinced that dialogue which fully respects both traditions can overcome the fears and divisions of the past and create an atmosphere in which peace and stability can be achieved.

4.16—A settlement which recognises the legitimate rights of nationalists and unionists must transcend the context of Northern Ireland. Both London and Dublin have a responsibility to respond to the continuing suffering of the people of Northern Ireland. This requires priority attention and urgent action to halt and reverse the constant drift into more violence, anarchy and chaos. It requires a common will to alleviate the plight of the people, both nationalists and unionists. It requires a political framework within which urgent efforts can be undertaken to resolve the underlying causes of the problem. It requires a common determination to provide conditions for peace, stability and justice so as to over come the inevitable and destructive reactions of extremists on both sides. Both governments, in co-operation with representatives of democratic nationalist and unionist opinion in Northern Ireland, must recognise and discharge their responsibilities.

Framework For A New Ireland: Present Realities and Future Requirements

5.1—The major realities identified in the Forum's analysis of the problem, as set out in earlier chapters, may be summarised as follows:

(1) Existing structures and practices in Northern Ireland have failed to provide either peace, stability or reconciliation. The failure to recognise and accommodate the identity of Northern nationalists has resulted in deep and growing alienation on their part from the system of political authority.

(2) The conflict of nationalist and unionist identities has been concentrated within the narrow ground of Northern Ireland. This has prevented constructive interaction between the two traditions and fostered fears, suspicions and misunderstandings.

(3) One effect of the division of Ireland is that civil law and administration in the South are seen, particularly by unionists, as being unduly influenced by the majority ethos on issues which Protestants consider to be a matter for private conscience and there is a widespread perception that the South in its laws, attitudes, and values does not reflect a regard for the ethos of Protestants. On the other hand, Protestant values are seen to be reflected in the laws and practices in the North.

(4) The present formal position of the British Government, namely the guarantee, contained in Section 1 of the Northern Ireland Constitution Act, 1973, has in its practical application had the effect of inhibiting the dialogue necessary for political progress. It has had the additional effect of removing the incentive which would otherwise exist on all sides to seek a political solution.

(5) The above factors have contributed to conflict and instability with disastrous consequences involving violence and loss of life on a large scale in Northern Ireland.

(6) The absence of political consensus, together with the erosion of the North's economy and social fabric, threatens to make irreversible the drift into more widespread civil conflict with catastrophic consequences.

(7) The resulting situation has inhibited and placed under strain the development of normal relations between Britain and Ireland.

(8) The nationalist identity and ethos comprise a sense of national Irish identity and a democratically founded wish to have that identity institutionalised in a sovereign Ireland united by consent.

(9) The unionist identity and ethos comprise a sense of Britishness, allied to their particular sense of Irishness and a set of values comprising a Protestant ethos which they believe to be under threat from a Catholic ethos, perceived as reflecting different and often opposing values.

(10) Irish nationalist attitudes have hitherto in their public expression tended to underestimate the full dimension of the unionist identity and ethos. On the other hand, unionist attitudes and practices have denied the right of nationalists to meaningful political expression of their identity and ethos.

(11) The basic approach of British policy has created negative consequences. It has shown a disregard of the identity and ethos of nationalists. In effect, it has underwritten the supremacy in Northern Ireland of the unionist identity. Before there can be fundamental progress Britain must re-assess its position and responsibility.

5.2.—Having considered these realities, the Forum proposes the following as necessary elements of a framework within which a new Ireland could emerge:

(1) A fundamental criterion of any new structures and processes must be that they will provide lasting peace and stability.

(2) Attempts from any quarter to impose a particular solution through violence must be rejected along with the proponents of such methods. It must be recognised that the new Ireland which the Forum seeks can come about only through agreement and must have a democratic basis.

(3) Agreement means that the political arrangements for a new and sovereign Ireland would have to be freely negotiated and agreed to by the people of the North and by the people of the South.

(4) The validity of both the nationalist and unionist identities in Ireland and the democratic rights of every citizen on this island must be accepted; both of these identities must have equally satisfactory, secure and durable, political, administrative and symbolic expression and protection.

(5) Lasting stability can be found only in the context of new structures in which no tradition will be allowed to dominate the other, in which there will be equal rights and opportunities for all, and in which there will be provision for formal and effective guarantees for the protection of individual human rights and of the communal and cultural rights of both nationalists and unionists.

(6) Civil and religious liberties and rights must be guaranteed and there can be no discrimination or preference in laws or administrative practices, on grounds of religious belief or affiliation; government and administration must be sensitive to minority beliefs and attitudes and seek consensus.

(7) New arrangements must provide structures and institutions including security structures with which both nationalists and unionists can identify on the basis of political consensus; such arrangements must overcome alienation in Northern Ireland and strengthen stability and security for all the people of Ireland.

(8) New arrangements must ensure the maintenance of economic and social standards and facilitate, where appropriate, integrated economic development, North and South. The macro-economic and financial implications are dealt with in a study by DKM Economic Consultants published with this Report, which is based on a range of assumptions with regard to the availability of external financial transfers.

(9) The cultural and linguistic diversity of the people of all traditions, North and South, must be preserved and fostered as a source of enrichment and vitality.

(10) Political action is urgently required to halt disillusionment with democratic politics and the slide towards further violence. Britain has a duty to respond now in order to ensure that the people of Northern Ireland are not condemned to yet another generation of violence and sterility. The parties in the Forum by their participation in its work have already committed themselves to join in a process directed towards that end.

5.3.—It is clear that the building of a new Ireland will require the participation and co-operation of all the people of Ireland. In particular, it is evident that the people of the South must wholeheartedly commit themselves and the necessary resources to this objective. The parties in the Forum are ready to face up to this challenge and to accommodate the realities and meet the requirements identified by the Forum. However, Britain must help to create the conditions which will allow this process to begin. The British Government have a duty to join in developing the necessary process that will recognize these realities and give effect to these requirements and thus promote reconciliation between the two major traditions in Ireland and to make the required investment of political will and resources. The British and Irish Governments should enter into discussions to create the framework and atmosphere necessary for this purpose.

5.4.—Among the fundamental realities the Forum has identified is the desire of nationalists for a united Ireland in the form of a sovereign, independent Irish State to be achieved peacefully and by consent. The Forum recognizes that such a form of unity would require a general and explicit acknowledgement of a broader and more comprehensive Irish identity. Such unity would, of course, be different from both the existing Irish State and the existing arrangements in Northern Ireland because it would necessarily accommodate all the fundamental elements in both traditions.

5.5—The Parties in the Forum are convinced that such unity in agreement would offer the best and most durable basis for peace and stability. In particular, it would have a number of advantages and attractions:

It would restore the historic integrity of Ireland and end the divisions in the country.

It would enable both traditions to rediscover and foster the best and most positive elements in their heritages.

It would provide the most promising framework for mutual interaction and enrichment between the two traditions.

It would give unionists the clearest sense that all of Ireland, in all its dimensions, and not just Northern Ireland, is their inheritance and the opportunity to share in the leadership and shape the future of a new Ireland.

It would end the alienation and deep sense of injustice felt by nationalists.

It would provide a framework within which agreed institutions could apply economic policies suited to the particular and largely similar circumstances and interests of both parts of the country, and in which economies of scale and the possibilities of integrated planning could be fully exploited.

It would best allow for the advancement internationally of the particular and largely common interests of Ireland, North and South and for the contribution, based on distinctive shared values, which the people of all traditions can make to the European and international communities.

It would end the dissipation of energies in wasteful divisions and redirect efforts towards constructive endeavour, thus giving a major impetus to the social, cultural and economic development of the entire country.

5.6—The parties in the Forum will continue to work by peaceful means to achieve Irish unity in agreement. There are many varying constitutional and other structures of political unity to be found throughout the world, for example, Australia, France, Italy, Spain, Switzerland and the United States of America which recognize to the extent necessary the diversity as well as the unity of the people concerned and ensure constitutional stability. It is essential that any structures for a new Ireland must meet both these criteria.

5.7—The particular structure of political unity which the Forum would wish to see established is a unitary state, achieved by agreement and consent, embracing the whole island of Ireland and providing irrevocable guarantees for the protection and preservation of both the unionist and nationalist identities. A unitary state on which agreement had been reached would also provide the ideal framework for the constructive interaction of the diverse cultures and values of the people of Ireland. A broad outline of such a unitary state is set out in Chapter 6.

5.8.—Constitutional nationalists fully accept that they alone could not determine the structures of Irish unity and that it is essential to have unionist agreement and participation in devising such structures and in formulating the guarantees they required. In line with this view, the Forum believes that the best people to identify the interests of the unionist tradition are the unionist people themselves. It would thus be essential that they should negotiate their role in any arrangements which would embody Irish unity. It would be for the British and Irish Governments to create the framework and atmosphere within which such negotiations could take place.

5.9.—The Forum in the course of its work, in both public and private sessions, received proposals as to how unionist and nationalist identities and interests could be accommodated in different ways and in varying degrees in a new Ireland. The Forum gave careful consideration to these proposals. In addition to the unitary state, two structural arrangements were examined in some detail—a federal/confederal state and joint authority—and a broad outline of these are set out in Chapters 7 and 8.

5.10.—The Parties in the Forum also remain open to discuss other views which may contribute to political development.

Unitary State

6.1—A unitary state would embrace the island of Ireland governed as a single unit under one government and one parliament elected by all the people of the island. It would seek to unite in agreement the two major identities and traditions in Ireland. The democratic basis of a unitary state in Ireland has always existed in modern times. Historically up to 1922 Ireland was governed as a single unit and prior to the Act of Union in 1801 was constitutionally a separate and theoretically equal kingdom. Such a state would represent a constitutional change of such magnitude as to require a new constitution that would be non-denominational. This constitution could only be formulated at an all-around constitutional conference convened by the British and Irish Governments. Such a constitution would contain clauses which would guarantee civil and religious liberties to all the citizens of the state on a basis that would entail no alteration nor diminution of the provisions in respect of civil and religious liberties which apply at present to the citizens of Northern Ireland. These guarantees could not subsequently be changed, except in accordance with special procedures.

6.2—The rights of all citizens woud be guaranteed in the constitution. Reinforcing guarantees would incorporate in the constitution the clauses of the European Convention of Human Rights with a right of access to the European Court of Human Rights.

6.3—In a unitary state, there would be a single legal and judicial system throughout the island. The study by Professors Boyle and Greer, The Legal Systems, North and South, shows that there would be no significant technical obstacle to the creation of a unified legal system.

6.4—Political and administrative arrangements in a unitary state would be devised to ensure that unionists would not be denied power or influence in a state where nationalists would be in a majority. For example, provision could be made for weighted majorities in the parliament in regard to legislation affecting changes in provisions on issues agreed to be fundamental at the establishment of the new state. In the Senate unionists could be guaranteed a minimum number of seats. The powers of the Senate could include effective blocking powers in regard to the issues agreed to be fundamental. Mechanisms for ensuring full Northern participation in an integrated Irish civil service would have to be devised.

6.5—A unitary state would have a single police service recruited from the whole island so designed that both nationalists and unionists could identify with it on the basis of political consensus.

6.6—A redefined relationship between Britain and Ireland would take account of the unionist sense of Britishness. In a unitary state, persons in Ireland, North and South, who at present hold British citzenship would continue to have such citizenship and could pass it on to their children without prejudice to the status of Irish citizenship which they would automatically acquire. The state could develop structures, relationships and associations with Britain which could include an Irish-British Council with intergovernmental and interparliamentary structures which would acknowledge the unique relationship between Ireland and Britain and which would provide expression of the long-established connections which unionists have with Britain.

6.7—All the cultural traditions in Ireland, North and South, would be guaranteed full expression and encouragement. The educational system would reflect the two main traditions on the island. The Irish language and culture would continue to be fostered by the state, and would be made more accessible to everyone in Ireland without any compulsion or imposition on any section.

6.8—A unitary state achieved by agreement between the nationalist and unionist traditions would for the first time allow full participation by all traditions in the affairs of the island. This would require a general and more explicit acknowledgement of a broader and more comprehensive Irish identity. A unitary state would promote administrative and economic efficiency in the island by ending duplication and separate planning and investment programmes and by facilitating integrated promotion of investment, exports and tourism. Natural resources, oil, gas and minerals will be developed for the benefit of all the people of Ireland and could make a significant contribution to securing the economic basis of the state. With no scope for conflicts of jurisdiction and with single taxation and currency systems, the implementation of an integrated economic policy suitable to the largely similar needs of the economies, North and South, would be facilitated, with consequent benefit. Integrated economic policies would ensure a united voice in advancing vital interests of both parts of Ireland, especially in the European Community, within which both North and South have common interests in areas such as agriculture and regional policy which diverge from the interests of Britain.

Federal/Confederal State

7.1—A two state federal/confederal Ireland based on the existing identities, North and South, would reflect the political and administrative realities of the past 60 years and would entrench a measure of autonomy for both parts of Ireland within an all-Ireland framework. While protecting and fostering the identities and ethos of the two traditions, it would enable them to work together in the common interest.

7.2—In a federal/confederal constitution would be non-denominational and capable of alteration only by special procedures. There would be safeguards within each state and in the country as a whole for the protection of individual and minority rights. There would be a federal/confederal Supreme Court to interpret the constitution and to adjudicate on any conflicts of jurisdiction between federal/confederal and state governments, which could be made up of an uneven number of judges, one of whom could be from another country—possibly a Member State of the European Community—with the remaining judges coming in equal numbers from North and South. There would either be a special Bill of Rights or, alternatively, all the rights already defined and accepted in international conventions to which Ireland and the U.K. are signatories would be incorporated in the new federal or confederal constitution. This constitution could only be formulated at an all-round constitutional conference convened by the British and Irish governments.

7.3—In a federation, residual power would rest with the central government. Certain powers would be vested in the two individual states. A confederation would comprise the two states which would delegate certain specified powers to a confederal government.

7.4—In a federal/confederal arrangement, each state would have its own parliament and executive. Authority for security would be vested in the federal/confederal government in order to gain widespread acceptability and to ensure that the law and order functions were administered in the most effective and impartial manner.

7.5—In a federation, the federal parliament could have one or two Chambers, a House of Representatives, and/or a Senate. Laws relating to previously agreed fundamental issues could be passed only if they received the support of a weighted majority of the Senate in a two chamber system or of the House of Representatives in a one chamber system. The federal government would be approved by and be responsible to the federal parliament. The powers held at the federal level would be a matter for negotiation but in an Irish context matters such as agriculture, industry, energy, transport, industrial promotion and marketing might be more efficiently administered on an island basis at federal level, while other services such as education, health, housing and social welfare might best be administered by the individual states. The functions of Head of State could be carried out by a President, the office altering between persons representative of the Northern and Southern states.

7.6—In a confederal arrangement, the powers held at the centre could be relatively limited, (for example, foreign policy, external and internal security policy and perhaps currency and monetary policy), requiring a less elaborate parliamentary structure at the confederal level. It might suffice to have an arrangement whereby the representatives of the two states would determine jointly issues of policy relating to the powers of the confederation. The decisions taken by the confederation would, as appropriate, e.g. implementation of EEC directives, fall to be implemented by the authorities in the individual states.

7.7—A federal/confederal arrangement would, in particular, provide institutions giving unionists effective power and influence in a new Ireland. The Northern parliament would have powers which could not be removed by an Act of another parliament. Existing civil and religious rights in the North would be unaffected. With a federal/confederal framework unionists would have parallel British citizenship and could maintain special links with Britain. Mechanisms for ensuring full North participation in the federal/confederal civil service would have to be devised. Provision would be made for the full recognition and symbolic expression of both traditions.

7.8—A federal/confederal arrangement would allow the retention within the North and South of many laws and practices reflecting the development of both areas over the past 60 years. All the cultural traditions in Ireland, North and South, would be guaranteed full expression and encouragement.

7.9—A federal/confederal arrangement would allow all those living on the island to share and give expression to the common aspects of their identity while at the same time maintaining and protecting their separate beliefs and way of life. The central authority would promote their common interests while the state authorities protected individual interests.

Joint Authority

8.1—Under joint authority, the London and Dublin governments would have equal responsibility for all aspects of the government of Northern Ireland. This arrangement would accord equal validity to the two traditions in Northern Ireland and would reflect the current reality that the people of the North are divided in their allegiances. The two governments, building on existing links and in consultation with nationalist and unionist opinion, would establish joint authority designed to ensure a stable and secure system of government.

8.2—Joint authority would give political, symbolic and administrative expression of their identity to Northern nationalists without infringing the parallel wish of unionists to maintain and to have full operational expression of their identity. It would be an unprecedented approach to the unique realities that have evolved within Ireland and between Britain and Ireland.

8.3—Joint authority would involve shared rule by the British and Irish Governments. Although this could be exercised directly, there would be enabling provision for the exercise of major powers by a locally-elected Assembly and Executive.

8.4—There would be full and formal recognition and symbolic expression of British and of Irish identity in Northern Ireland and promotion of the cultural expression of the two identities. Joint citizenship rights would be conferred automatically on all persons living in Northern Ireland, resulting in no diminution of the existing rights of Irish or British citizenship of persons living in Northern Ireland.

8.5—A comprehensive and enforceable non-denominational Bill of Rights for Northern Ireland would be promulgated ensuring the protection of both individual and communal rights and freedoms.

8.6—The overall level of public expenditure would be determined by the two Governments. Problems of external representation of Northern Ireland would be resolved between the two governments.

8.7—Under joint authority the two traditions in Northern Ireland would find themselves on a basis of equality and both would be able to find an expression of their identify in the new institutions. There would be no diminution of the Britishness of the unionist population. There identity, ethos and link with Britain would be assured by the authority and presence of the British Government in the joint authority arrangements. At the same time it would resolve one basic defect of (a) the failed 1920-25 attempt to settle the Irish question and (b) the present arrangements for the government of Northern Ireland—the failure to give satisfactory political, symbolic and administrative expression to Northern nationalists. Structures would thus be provided with which the nationalists in the North could identify, which might reverse their progressive alienation from existing structures. Security arrangements in which for the first time both nationalists and unionists could have confidence could be developed, thus providing a basis for peace and order. The climate would thus be created for the emergence of normal political life, of compromise and of mutual confidence based on security in the reciprocal acceptance of identify and interests.

A PROFILE OF TED JOHNSTON AND OTHER VIETNAM VETERANS

Mr. COHEN. Mr. President, it has often been said on the floor of the Senate that our debt to this Nation's veterans is enormous. This is indisputably true.

Our Vietnam veterans have borne the special burden of having participated in an unpopular war, and of returning home to face the occasional scorn of their countrymen.

Vietnam may forever bear the label of having been an unpopular war. But the men who fought in Vietnam were not asked whether they thought the war was popular or not. They were motivated by the same true and honorable faith which leads a soldier to sacrifice his life in a cause he might not fully understand.

Remembering Vietnam is painful. It forces us to think of the hearts that beat high with hope, of young lives snuffed out well before their time, of fields not planted, of homes not built, and of children not born. It forces us to remember the hundreds of thousands of selfless acts of patriotism by Americans whose individual courage and deeds will be forever unknown to us.

I am privileged to have a special Vietnam veteran as a member of my staff in Maine. Ted Johnston has served me very well for several years. His story is one of trial and triumph, of a Vietnam veteran who has struggled with success to reenter society.

The Sunday, a newspapèr in Lewiston, Maine, recently profiled Ted and other Vietnam veterans, and I ask unanimous consent that the article be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

VETERANS STILL FIGHTING A DIFFERENT KIND OF WAR

(By Mark Mogensen)

Ted Johnston is leaving Vietnam behind.

The green forests hiding North Vietnamese snipers, the native children he saw blown up by land mines, the river patrol boat on which he was ambushed, the epileptic seizures, the close friend who committed suicide and the bad dreams—he's leaving them all behind.

Like almost every other veteran of America's longest war, Johnston has been walking a long and treacherous road away from the ghosts of Vietnam—a road often littered with lives waylaid by divorces, suicides, unemployment, alcoholism and drugs, physical ailments and mental anguish.

While plagued by his share of setbacks and frustrations, Johnston has gained the border and has joined the majority of veterans who have either successfully left Vietnam behind or are far enough down the road to see the light.

America's Vietnam veterans are growing up; and they're contributing to a society that once alienated them, but which now appears more willing to welcome them back.

Johnston looks comfortable in a suit. He has his own spacious office in Lewiston. As a representative for Sen. William Cohen, he has the necessary warmth, affability and professional attitude to deal effectively with people and their problems.

He has come a long way.

In 1972, as an 18-year-old draftee, his river patrol boat was blown out of Vietnamese waters. He was knocked unconscious and believes he was kept afloat by his sergeant, who lost his left leg and right shoulder in the raid.

One of only seven who survived the raid and the only non-amputee, Johnston spent the next year in a U.S. Naval hospital suffering from severe head trauma and epileptic seizures.

"It was the pits. I was manic; I was elated, I was depressed. I couldn't relate to people. I got down on myself a whole lot for not being able to deal with my problems, to the point where I was suicidal. No goals. No objectives. No rhyme or reason. I went down to 135 pounds. I'm 180 and I don't think I'm fat," he says, leaning back in his office chair and patting his stomach. "I started to abuse alcohol . . . It was the pits. When people think of the slimy veteran, that's what I was."

"When I came home, my mother would say, 'What's wrong with you?' because I would sit and stare blank or play solitaire. I wasn't angry. I was just totally stunned. Dazed. Everything was overwhelming."

He was slowly recuperating when a close war friend stepped in front of a truck on Interstate 95 in Miami and killed himself. "That's when I took flight and left and went to Aroostook," said Johnston.

For eight months, Johnston lived by himself in the woods, skiing for supplies and then skiing back into the woods.

"It wasn't because I hated anybody. I just was not at all healthy. I wasn't crazy, but I was on the verge, that's for sure. My perspectives were way out of whack. A horn (blowing) would send me flying on the floor—things like that. I (went to live in the woods) just to think. To have quiet. Peace. Not to escape from (people), but to escape from everything else. So I would have no responsibilities and I could deal with my own mind-set, which took a long period of time."

Slowly, over the next decade, Johnston would come out of the woods, get a degree in political science from the University of Maine at Presque Isle, begin working in Cohen's local office there and even get married. A year-and-a-half ago, he moved to take a job in Cohen's Lewiston office, specializing in veterans' issues.

Johnston cites the therapy, medication and treatment he received from the Veterans Administration during those last 10 years for helping him take control of his life and ridding him of his seizures.

"If you had talked to me six years ago," he says, "I would have been real down on the government, I think. It's hard now (to be critical) because my life is good. I'm happily married. I'm a homeowner, drive a fairly new vehicle. I have a motorcycle that's paid for. You know. Life's pretty easy . . . But it's all a matter of perspective. I have a lot of empathy for the veteran who's having a hard time. Particularly if they're unemployed (because) I can't think of anything worse."

Saying he considers himself extremely lucky, Johnston said his remaining problems involve talking about some of his experiences and an occasional "surge of emotion" that washes over him, recreating the fear he felt in Vietnam.

"Sometimes I'll get a surge of emotion . . . I don't know why. It used to precipitate seizures. Today, I go for a walk, I run, I have a beer, I'll talk to my wife, start wrestling, something, anything."

Johnston, who hesitated to talk about his experiences, fearful of making an example of myself, is just one of the estimated 16,000 Vietnam combat troops in Maine and 3 million nationally who returned to piece their lives back together.

His story of success is the rule, not the exception.

There are wonderful success stories and some horrible stories of failure. But basically speaking, people have been able to get on with their lives . . ." said Phil Vampatella, executive director of Maine's Vietnam Veterans Leadership Program headquartered in Portland.

Vampetalla, a Vietnam veteran whose program is designed for successful veterans to help still-troubled ones, said only 15 to 20 percent of the veterans who returned from Vietnam still have serious problems psychologically or physically.

The other 80 to 85 percent, he said, have successfully merged into society with some rarely thinking about their experiences and others battling tough-but-manageable problems on a daily basis.

However, he said the public still has the perception that all the veterans returning from Vietnam are violent and unstable.

"The way I see it . . . we have been depicted as everything from a bunch of druggies to baby killers to pot heads," said Vampatella. "A lot of us have just hidden out so as not to have to put up with the nonsense and garbage that's been cast on us. But we're just like everybody else. We have our houses, and mortgages and kids with braces."

"I think there's a stigma out there about the Vietnam veteran," added Jon Guay of Lewiston, "as the guy with the Army fatigues, the ponytail, a ring in his ear and a chip on his shoulder. But most of the time, he's your neighbor or the local doctor or dentist or school teacher."

Guay, a former prisoner interrogator who served during the Tet offensive, is assistant director of the Marine Job Service in Augusta. Very few scars from Vietnam remain with Guay.

He can talk about his experiences—although he has only begun to talk about them in the past year or two. He is employed in a high-level job. He no longer suffers flashbacks or nervousness at night.

Guay says he was luckier than some. He came from Bingham, a small, still-patriotic town where many people knew him, wrote to him while in Vietnam and welcomed him home on his return.

Like Johnston, "I also had the advantage of spending some time by myself, getting reoriented to civilization. I have a log cabin on a stream in Somerset County and I spent about two-and-half months in that cabin by myself . . . mostly hunting. But I also needed that time to kind of rearrange myself. I think that time was very valuable for me . . . I think that was an adjustment many veterans missed."

"The other thing, too," said Guay, "is I didn't have any pressures on me when I came back. While I hadn't selected a career yet, I had many avenues open to me. And I also didn't have a girlfriend I was writing to or anything, or my own wife and children that I was coming back to. I think that would have added to the pressure of being over there . . ."

Guay added, "It's my feeling some of the veterans who have come back who haven't been able to adjust haven't had that break."

Even with the advantages he had, Guay says vivid memories remain with him, particularly about the week-long Tet offensive in his Central Highlands area.

"There were bullets flying overhead. There were flares going off. Nobody slept. Nobody ate.

"(When I first returned) I would wake up when I heard a noise like a car backfire. There are some residual things that to this day probably still stay with me."

"Even to this day," he continued, "when I go into a restaurant, I have to sit so I know where the door is and the exits are. That was something you always did there. You would sit strategically so that you wouldn't be caught with your back to the door because there were always people throwing in (small bombs) and blowing up places where Americans were. So even today, it's very important where I sit."

Guay said the transition back to life in the United States was not helped by the reception most veterans received from a war-weary, cynical America, wracked internally by protests.

"When I was over there in Vietnam and when I came back, if I ever ran into one of those (protesters) I was always looking forward to confronting one of them because I had physical plans for him," he said, with a quick laugh.

"This is very interesting for me," Guay added after a thoughtful pause. "All the time I didn't want to go over there because I was scared. All the time you're over there you can't wait to get back. All the time you were over there you hated it. But when you came back, there was a sense of pride you had that did not allow you to emphathize with those people who were protesting the war. At least that was my own experience."

Guay's reaction was typical. Many of the men spoke of returning and hating the war for the physical and emotional toll it had taken; hating the South Vietnamese for often acting as if they did not care who won the war; hating the U.S. government for not taking the obvious steps needed to win the war; and often even disliking themselves for the actions they were forced to take.

They were confronted by a vocal segment of the population that often blamed the returning veteran for abetting the war.

The reception was a blow to the already reeling veterans, many of whom entered the war either because they had to or because they felt it was the right thing to do for their country.

Talking about their experiences quickly became a major problem for many veterans, either because they couldn't vocalize their feelings or because no one wanted to listen.

"One major problem I found was that I was not able to talk, even to fellow veterans, about Vietnam. I was angered . . . by the protests and what not," said Merrill Morris, organizer and program director of Maine's new Veteran Employment Training Service.

"When I came back, I just tried to forget about it, because people at home were tired of it and didn't want to hear any more about it," said Steve Bentley, a 37-year-old veteran who is seeking his master's degree in rehabilitation counseling at the University of Southern Maine.

"But," Bentley added, "you stuff things like that away and it's got to come out somewhere."

The pent-up frustrations and emotions held by many veterans did show themselves—often in the form of emotional instability, the inability to hold down a job, disrespect for authority, dependency on drugs, guilt, remorse, strained personal relationships and the need for support.

Relying on their own tenacity and internal strengths, the support of friends and family and the growing number of state and federal programs available during the past decade, 80 to 85 percent of the veterans now fit well into society. But manageable problems remain, they say.

Vampatella remarked, "There's probably something like that hiding in each of us. I think we all have that hidden thing in each of us that needs to be taken care of."

Such remnants of Vietnam depend on each man's experiences, the intensity and duration of those experiences, the period of war when those experiences occurred and each man's own internal strengths, veterans say.

Johnston occasionally has surges of emotion.

Guay is aware of where he sits in public places.

Morris will forever lack some of his innocence and his soul. "I quit caring and I had no anticipation of ever leaving (Vietnam)," he said. "To this day, I feel like a part of me died there. It's like you left a part of you there. Other veterans who were there say the same thing; that they seemed to leave a piece of their soul there. I believe it's true."

Bentley, while unmarried, says that because of the war he will never consider having children. "I feel the world is too crazy to bring children into it. In general, I feel the way living, breathing people treat each other is madness."

Bentley's high-risk job, which he volunteered for, was to operate a Rome Plow, a tractor-like machine used to clear the jungle of vegetation and eliminate enemy hiding places.

With only thin wire mesh around the driving compartment to protect him from vegetation, Bentley and other machine drivers would often be the targets of bombs and booby-traps. He survivied. But he knew other drivers killed and maimed by snipers, 250-pound bombs planted under the ground and concussion bombs suspended by string between trees.

"I went over there for two tours. You know, I really bit into it. I was there for a Hemingway-experience kind of thing, plus the mom-and-apple-pie thing. You know, my father said to me before I left, 'go over there and earn some medals and be a man. . . ."

"But after a while, it began to occur to me how insane this all was. I began to see that the enemy was a human being. Pretty soon, I was in an immense state of confusion, so I began to—well—there were plenty of chemicals to numb yourself with and I poured them into the boiling cauldron of emotion and then things really got bad,"

Bentley returned and spent six years wandering through 20 or more jobs from Minnesota to Maine, Nebraska to Florida.

"I couldn't stay in any one place. I couldn't get a grip. I was floundering. I was also drinking heavily and using other drugs . . . But if you spend a year killing people and having people trying to kill you and watching people around you die, that is going to have an effect on you on some level."

He finally stopped long enough to begin going to the U.S. Veterans Administration at Togus for group therapy and enrolled at USM seeking a master's degree in rehabilitation counseling.

"I think a lot of veterans could grow by group and by going through the process," noted Bentley, saying he has met many veterans who have yet to cope with their experiences.

"I run into (veterans who haven't talked about their feelings) all the time. I run into that at school and at meetings . . . Mostly what you get is, 'Yeah, I was there and I haven't really talked about it.'"

But after more than 11 years and many long miles on the road away from Vietnam, the veterans say they are beginning to talk about both their triumphs and remaining problems. What's more, they say society seems to be increasingly willing to listen.

"I think that from the time the war ended to now, the nation has had time to adjust," said Guay.

"I would say, at least at face value (the veterans' public image has gotten better) especially in the last few years," Morris added. "I think it's because the conscience of this country—of our parents' age group particularly—realized that Vietnam was a lot worse and a lot crazier for us than they ever gave us credit for when we first came back."

"I think they've matured," said Johnston, referring to the protesters of yesterday, "and realized that you're often in circumstances beyond your control."

"We don't blame the American people with being upset with the situation. After 10 years, given the best fighting machine ever developed in the world, the national treasury and 3 million young men, we lost. we didn't even have a stated clearly defined goal," said Vampatella.

"We can't blame the American people. And we can't blame them for blaming us. We symbolized all the things that were painful to them. But they were wrong about putting the blame on us. The blame was clearly on our civilian leaders in Washington," he said, saying his hope is that "people realize that hatred was misdirected."

"The most important thing to get across . . . is that the Vietnam veterans desire to have people understand they were doing a job just like all other veterans and they were doing a job for the American public," said Jim Wyatt, a decorated veteran who now works as a National Service Officer and veteran advocate at Togus.

"All they want is for that hand to be extended and people to say a silent thank you so that they're just like those people who didn't have to go," he added.

If the growing number of newspaper and magazine articles, television newscasts and programs and movies more favorably depicting the plight of the Vietnam veteran are an example, the hand is finally, hesitantly, being extended say veterans.

In addition, some say the government, long criticized by Vietnam veterans for its lack of support, seems to be making an effort.

Vampatella's Vietnam Veterans Leadership Program, Morris' Veteran Employment Training Service, Guay's involvement with the Veteran Affairs Committee of the Interstate Conference of Employment Security Agencies and the recently erected Vietnam Veterans memorial in Washington, D.C., indicate growing government awarness, some acknowledge.

But perhaps the most important change is occurring within the veterans themselves.

"The experience you had, had to sit there for a while, and now we're able to look at it a lot more rationally," said Guay.

"Many pretty much feel the time is right to come out of the closet. We have prospered despite the image," said Vampatella.

Vietnam veterans like Guay and Johnston are finding successful careers in the private and public sectors.

Vietnam veterans like Vampatella and Merrill are discovering satisfaction and success working in executive-level positions helping other Vietnam veterans.

Many Vietnam veterans are working to develop the mental stability and educational background needed to work in the public or private sectors.

Many others say they are now finding the courage and desire to voice their long-stilled emotions, considered one of the first steps in the healing process. "Many veterans still having difficulty have decided to come out for treatment," said Morris.

Some have found an inner strength from their experiences. "Fortunately, the majority of us that went over are back in society now and would never want to go back, but would never trade in the experience," said Wyatt, who lost both his legs to a "bouncing Betty" land mine. "It showed me the value of life, loved ones and family."

And some veterans are even finding an inner strength—pride—from their experiences, particularly as the American public becomes more accepting of the Vietnam veterans' role in the war.

"I think history will certify that those of us who went to Vietnam are going to prove to be some of the greatest warriors and leaders of this country," said Wyatt.

Guay, talking quietly about the Bronze Star Medal he earned for his contribution to the war, commented, "It didn't mean that much to me when I first got it. At the time, I didn't feel I was decorated. Now, I feel kind of proud of it."

THE FUTURE OF TAIWAN

Mr. PELL. Mr. President, I rise today to call to your attention an article that appeared in the Wall Street Journal, on April 24, entitled "The U.S. Should Encourage a 'Republic of Taiwan.'" The article, written by Trong R. Chai, professor of political science at the City University of New York, questions the wisdom of trusting China to keep its promises regarding Taiwan's future status. As you know, China repeatedly insists that the people on Taiwan have nothing to fear from reunification with the People's Republic. Professor Chai quotes Chinese Premier Zhao Ziyang's assertion that:

> After the country is unified, Taiwan, as a special administrative region of China, can retain much of its own character and keep its social systems and life style unchanged. The existing party, government and military setups in Taiwan can also remain unchanged.

But Professor Chai also correctly points out that China made similar promises in a 1951 written agreement with Tibet only to break its word a few years later in a brutal invasion. I believe the question Professor Chai poses deserves our careful consideration because the wrong decision on Taiwan's part could result in a repeat of Tibet's fate.

Professor Chai, after posing the difficulties associated with reunification, argues that the better choice for the United States is to encourage the formation of a Republic of Taiwan. Being a native-born Taiwanese, he prefers that any new republic formed be democratic and established by and for the benefit of all the people on Taiwan. But he would also favor a republic controlled by the present KMT government rather than accept the imposition of a Communist system by China.

His recommendations may strike some as being provocative. I frankly am saddened by reactions of this sort. Fearing to speak out for democracy and freedom of choice for the 18 million people on Taiwan runs counter to everything we as a people stand for. I urge my colleagues to judge for themselves by reading this article in its entirety.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to insert at this point in the RECORD Professor Chai's article.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the Wall Street Journal, Apr. 24, 1984]

THE UNITED STATES SHOULD ENCOURAGE A "REPUBLIC OF TAIWAN"

(By Trong R. Chai)

During his visit to the U.S. in January, Chinese Premier Zhao Ziyang asserted that "the Taiwan question is the main obstacle in the growth of Sino-U.S. relations." The prime minister's solution to this problem? "After the country is unified, Taiwan, as a special administrative region of China, can retain much of its own character and keep its social systems and life style unchanged. The existing party, government and military setups in Taiwan can also remain unchanged."

Would the Chinese keep their promise and allow Taiwan to maintain its own social and political systems if they took over the island? The current status of Tibet provides an answer.

In 1951, China and Tibet signed an agreement governing relations between them. Article 4 stated that "the central authorities will not alter the existing political system in Tibet. The central authorities also will not alter the established status, functions and powers of the Dalai Lama." Article 7 promised that "the religious beliefs, customs and habits of the Tibetan people shall be respected." The Chinese even pledged that "in matters related to various reforms in Tibet, there will be no compulsion on the part of the central authorities; the local government of Tibet shall carry out reform of its own accord."

Less than eight years later, China invaded Tibet. This touched off massive uprisings, and the Dalai Lama fled to India. Since that time, killings by the Chinese and the wholesale destruction of Tibetan culture have been well documented.

The case of Tibet demonstrates China's failure to translate its words into deeds. Premier Zhao's formula for Taiwan should thus be seen as nothing more than an empty promise.

The people of Taiwan have more than the heavy hand of Chinese rule to fear, however. For the past 35 years, they have been living under Kuomintang martial law. Basic human rights, such as freedom of speech, assembly and association, have been denied. Native Taiwanese, who constitute 85% of Taiwan's total population, occupy less than 10% of the seats on national legislative bodies. The president and the governor of Taiwan, along with the mayors of the two largest cities, aren't elected by the people.

In its 90-year separation from China, first under the Japanese and then the KMT, Taiwan has developed its own distinctive character. For example, the Taiwanese illiteracy rate is less than 5%, compared with more than 30% in China. Taiwan's per-capita income is five times higher than China's.

The difference between the two societies is so great that the Taiwanese people wish to establish a new nation independent of China. Evidence came in a supplementary congressional election last December in which the joint platform of the non-KMT candidates stressed that "the future of Taiwan should be determined by the people on Taiwan." Self-determination is a code word for Taiwanese independence—discussion of which is prohibited by the KMT.

Instead, the Taiwanese people suffer from international isolation. Only about 20 countries maintain diplomatic relations with Taiwan.

When a nation establishes formal ties with Peking, it invariably agrees to the Chinese demand that Taiwan be recognized as part of China. Consequently, the Taiwanese people fear that China will eventually try to annex the island by force.

This fear has precipitated a growing flow of wealth from Taiwan. In testimony before the Senate Foreign Relations Committee last November, Lo Fu-Chen, a visiting professor of economics at the University of Pennsylvania, stated: "Already a so-called Hong Kong phenomenon is experienced in Taiwan. Based on a banker's estimates, some $3 billion in capital, equivalent to 7% of [the] GNP of Taiwan, has flown into Los Angeles alone. In the last three years, the investment index has experienced a steady decline for the first time in three decades of rapid growth."

The U.S. was deeply concerned about Taiwan's security until 1972, when President Richard Nixon and Chinese Premier Chou En-lai issued the Shanghai Communique, in which Washington acknowledged that there is "but one China and . . . Taiwan is a part of China." Since then, the U.S. has cut its formal ties with Taipei and pledged to reduce its arms sales to Taiwan over time "to a final resolution."

It is vital that the U.S. continue to protect the independence of Taiwan. President Reagan should keep in mind the following points during his visit to China this week:

First, as the U.S. has been involved with Taiwan for four decades and champions freedom and democracy everywhere in the world, it has a moral obligation to prevent the mainland Chinese from imposing their communist system upon the island's 19 million people.

Second, American corporations have invested over $12 billion in Taiwan, and a Chinese takeover would threaten their investments.

Third, by taking over Taiwan, China's submarines would pose a threat to peace and security in the Pacific region.

Clearly, it is necessary to create a Taiwan that is independent of Peking's rule. How can the U.S. help this aim?

One alternative would be for the U.S. to help the Taiwanese people overthrow the KMT, which represents neither China nor Taiwan.

Another alternative would be to encourage the KMT to declare Taiwan a new political entity, separate and independent from China. In this regard, the Reagan administration sent a positive signal to Taipei at the November Senate hearing. Asked by a senator whether the U.S. expected China to apply military force to Taiwan if independence is declared, a State Department spokesman said that "a decision to use force would have an impact on U.S. policy." Citing a provision in the Taiwan Relations Act of 1979, the official added that "the president and the Congress shall determine, in accordance with constitutional processes, appropriate action by the United States in response to any such danger.

The third alternative would be for the U.S. to urge the KMT to release all political prisoners, lift martial law and call for free elections. Only when the Taiwanese people have political freedom will they have sufficient power to change the Republic of China into the Republic of Taiwan.

In light of current U.S. involvements in Central America and the Middle East, it is unlikely that the Reagan administration would take the first alternative. The KMT would oppose the second alternative simply because it is afraid of losing power to the Taiwanese people after independence.

Therefore, the third alternative appears to be the most feasible. The KMT would certainly resist American pressure for democracy in Taiwan, but the U.S. could still use arms sales, foreign trade and cultural exchanges as weapons to press the KMT to cooperate.

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The assistant legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

CONCLUSION OF MORNING BUSINESS

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Routine morning business is closed.

MISCELLANEOUS TARIFF, TRADE, AND CUSTOMS MATTERS

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Under the previous order, the Senate will now resume consideration of H.R. 2163, which the clerk will report.

The legislative clerk read as follows:

A bill (H.R. 2163) to amend the Federal Boat Safety Act of 1971, and for other purposes.

The Senate resumed consideration of the bill.

Pending:

(1) Baker amendment No. 3027, to further reduce deficits by including reconciliations and appropriations caps for defense and nondefense discretionary spending for fiscal years 1985, 1986, and 1987.

(2) Chiles amendment No. 3044 (to Baker amendment No. 3027), to reduce deficit reduction for fiscal years 1985, 1986, and 1987, and to provide for a delay for 2 years of cost-of-living adjustments to tax tables.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Florida. The Senator from Florida is recognized.

Mr. CHILES. Mr. President, this is an amendment to the Baker amendment. My proposal is not perfect. It does not provide as much saving as the Senator from Florida would like or as much as I have proposed in a number of other forums. But the issue today is, how does the Chiles amendment compare to the Baker-Rose Garden amendment?

On that question, Mr. President, I do not have any problem defending my proposal. In fact, I feel quite confident about it. It compares very favorably.

The exercise we are now going through is an attempt to make some deficit reductions which will allow us to get by until next year.

Everyone was upset, this being an election year, that we were not going to be able to make any major changes—major changes to the tax bill, major changes to a number of the spending programs, major changes in entitlements. Yet, we find ourselves facing this horrendous deficit. It is somewhere in the neighborhood of $170 billion to $180 billion. And it is a deficit that continues to grow every year, a deficit that is no longer cyclical, but is now structural.

That cyclical term, I recall, was developed during the Nixon administration in an attempt to show that if we were at full employment, we really would not have to worry. We would still have sufficient revenues while there would be a reduction in what we would have to say for unemployment compensation, food stamps, and other stimulative programs. The budget deficit was not supposed to be a problem under those circumstances.

But now, all the projections indicate that even if we were at full employment—and we certainly are not—we would have a deficit. And the deficit would be structural.

Now we find ourselves in a situation where our revenues are approximately 18.9 percent of the gross national product, our spending is over 29.5 percent. The gap has widened.

Revenues, under the existing tax cut plan, will continue to decrease somewhat if no action is taken. Spending will continue to increase by virtue of the baselines we have adopted, and by virtue of the entitlement program increase.

So the gap will become wider and wider, and we will see those deficits going up above $350 billion in just a few short years. The national debt is now over $1 trillion, and the second trillion dollars will come about in several years. It took us almost 200 years to reach the first trillion dollars, but in just a short of time, it will double.

The exercise we are in now, both in the rose garden plan and in the pending amendment is a time-buying enterprise.

It would be nice if we could go further. I think we should. I believe it is pretty clear, from the votes we had on the Hollings freeze and the Kassebaum-Grassley-Biden freeze that the votes are not here to take more drastic action. Even those plans, of course, would not go as far as we need to go.

Why has that happened? Why are we unable to go further? Primarily we find ourselves as an army without a leader. We do not have a general who is ready to lead the troops. The general has said: "Steady as you go. Stay the course. Have confidence in me."

It reminds me of the story about the fellow who fell off a cliff. As he was falling, he stuck out his hand, and he finally was able to grasp a branch. It was shaking, and dirt was falling off the roots, and he did not know whether the branch was going to hold him.

He cried out: "Help! Help!" There was no reply. He said: "Is anybody up there?"

Finally, a voice said: "I am here."

He said, "Who is there?"

The voice said, "It is I, the Lord. Have faith."

The fellow said: "I have faith."

The voice said: "Turn loose."

The fellow said: "Is anybody else up there?" [Laughter.]

That, I think is where we find ourselves in this body. The leader has said, "Have faith. Steady as you go. We are going to grow our way out of this." But I hear this Chamber and the other body saying: "Is anybody else up there?"

Well, nobody has answered yet. So we find ourselves as this ragtag army, trying to march a little on our own. We have one side trying to march in winding lines and we have the other side trying to march in uneven ranks. We are down to two plans; the rose garden plan and the plan of the humble corporal from the imperial Polk County trying to get us by until next year.

Well, which of these plans should we adopt, and how do these plans stack up one against the other? Both make some savings.

The rose garden plan purports to save $150 billion, according to the author's figures. If we ask the Congressional Budget Office to tell us how much comes off the bottom line, they tell us it is only about $89 billion. If we use the arithmetic of the rose gardeners, our plan would save about $200 billion. If we ask the Congressional Budget Office to tell us how much comes off our bottom line, they say approximately $150 billion.

Well, what is the difference? Perhaps it is hard to see. I think what we are trying to say to the financial markets and what we are trying to say to the decisionmakers who will determine whether they are going to lend money for housing, or for farm credit and how much it will cost, is that we are concerned about this deficit. Both sides are trying to tell them the same thing.

But we want to do more. We know that we have to do more. Yet we are asking for some time. We seem to be saying, "You have to allow us to get these elections behind us. You have to allow the leader, the general, the President, a little more time to make up his mind that he really wants to fight these deficits—whoever that President might be next year. But to show your good faith, we are going to take a step this year.

How much of that step do we have to take? That is really what we are talking about here. Is $89 billion enough? Is $150 billion enough?

I do not know the answer to either one. But I do know that $150 billion is more than $89 billion, and I do know that we have a better chance of sending that signal with $150 billion than we have sending it with $89 billion.

I know from the votes taken yesterday and the day before that there are not sufficient votes in this Chamber to send a bigger signal. We have had 38 votes for the Hollings plan and 32 votes for the Kassebaum-Biden-Grassley plan.

The question is, Can we send that signal at $150 billion? I hope that we can. I think that it gives us the best chance to buy the additional time.

What happens if we do not send either one of these signals? What happens if the signal is not enough?

What I think happens, Mr. President, is that interest rates will continue to rise. We have seen interest rates go up since the rose garden plan was announced, since an economist of Shearson/American Express Co. said that the rose garden plan is "chicken feed." Interest rates have ticked up since then.

I think if we do not pass a plan that has sufficient restraints—and I hope the one we are on, does—then those interest rates are going to go up. If the economy turns around and goes sour on us, if we start another recession before this year's actions take hold we are in big trouble. Most of us recognize that if you take action for 1985 it will be 1986 before that action begins to bite. If we are in a recession in 1986, we may have to undo steps we took previously. We might have to stimulative spending, the conventional way of pulling out of a recession. Usually we take action in Congress, but even if we did not, there are automatic stimuli that come into play. So we could find ourselves going into a recession with a $200 billion deficit. If that happens, hang on to your hats.

Who knows where we would come out of something like that or what the problems would be if we go into that kind of recession?

That is a risk we are loathe to take. And that is why we are here working on these plans.

I intend to repeat this a number of times today, but our cardinal responsibility is to adopt a plan that leaves us, in 1987, better than we find ourselves going in during 1984. Simply put, I think our deficits must be going down under any plan we adopt rather than going up. That, Mr. President, is a basic difference between my amendment and the rose garden plan.

The deficits in the rose garden plan will go from $181 billion in 1985 to $204 billion in 1987. That I fear is the worst of all signals to send the financial markets. That I think is why the Shearson economist described the rose garden plan as "chicken feed." That is why I think that the market has not responded since the rose garden plan was announced. Interest rates have gone up because what money managers are looking at is the bottom line. They are not much concerned about rhetoric. They want to know what the plan does to the bottom line. And the rose garden plan has the bottom line going up.

My plan, contained in the pending amendment, will have the deficits going down, to $169 billion in 1984. That is still very high, still much higher than I would like. But if you compare that to deficits rising to $204 billion under the rose garden plan, I think you see there is a great difference.

I think my plan is fair. It restrains defense as well as domestic spending. And it also provides some additional revenue.

We find $31 billion in additional revenue. We find about $26 billion in spending restraints, a combination of defense and domestic restraints, or $26 billion more than we have in the rose garden plan. Comparing it to the rose garden plan, $20 billion more in outlays, $47 billion more in budget authority and below the baseline our amendment would be $53 billion in budget authority and a $26 billion reduction in outlays. Those are our savings.

You match that with $31 billion in revenue and I think you have a fair and a balanced plan. It is not exactly like the Hollings plan that tried to do it all with revenue. It is not like the Kassebaum plan that tried to do it all with spending. We have struck a balance between the two plans. We are down to a choice between the rose garden plan and the Chiles plan.

I hope the Senate will consider seriously that choice. I hope that they will consider what the bottom line looks like in the deficits of the two plans. I think they will recognize that we do not have a complete budget resolution. We are not getting a chance to vote on the bottom line because of the procedural situation. The budget resolution will be handled perfunctorily after this. so, here, right now, is really where the main ball game is.

We better be looking and seeing what the bottom line will be because here, right now, will determine whether and to what extent we affect the deficit.

Mr. DOMENICI. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The bill clerk proceeded to call the roll.

(During the quorum call Mr. ARMSTRONG occupied the chair; subsequently, Mr. GORTON occupied the chair.)

Mr. DOMENICI. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. COCHRAN). Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. DOMENICI. Mr. President, the distinguished Senator from Florida has requested that we see if there is another amendment that we could work on and perhaps vote on today. The distinguished junior Senator from the State of Georgia is here and he has a line-item veto amendment.

It is may understanding that we might set aside the pending matter by unanimous consent and let the distinguished Senator from Georgia take up his amendment. Does the distinguished Senator from Florida have some comment on that?

Mr. CHILES. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent——

Mr. BAKER. Will the Senator withhold his unanimous-consent request?

Mr. CHILES. Yes.

Mr. BAKER. Will the Senator from New Mexico yield to me?

Mr. DOMENICI. I am pleased to yield to the majority leader.

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, let me say that I do not have any objection to this. I talked to the distinguished Senator from Florida and the chairman of the committee, the Senator from New Mexico. I admit to a degree of chagrin that we are not going to have a vote on this today, but I understand the circumstances.

I do not doubt the representations made by the Senator from Florida. I was grateful last evening that he would lay down his amendment. I know he did so in good faith, expecting to dispose of it today, and we discussed that. But, he was equally candid and frank with me—and I am sure he will not mind me repeating this—in saying that a number of people have necessarily left the Senate and that he would prefer not to vote on the matter today. Goodness knows, I understand that, because the name of the game in the legislative arena is learning how to count. So I do understand that.

While it would be possible, I suppose, to move to table the amendment, notwithstanding, I hardly think that that would be an appropriate thing to do. The distinguished Senator from Florida is the ranking Democratic member of the Budget Committee. His proposal is a major Democratic initiative and it deserves better than that in terms of consideration of the Senate.

So I made the decision not to try to table the amendment, not to try, thus, to force a vote today. I do so with great reluctance because I had hoped we would even finish today.

But, Mr. President, that is the way things are. You have to take the bitter with the sweet. So I am not going to object to moving off this amendment for the moment.

But I would like to inquire of the Senator from Florida to see if he would consider giving us a time certain on Monday—frankly, I do not care how late Monday—to have a vote on his amendment. I am perfectly willing to have a vote up or down, if the chairman of the committee is agreeable.

Mr. DOMENICI. Mr. President, we are referring to the Chiles amendment, and not any other that we might take up.

Mr. BAKER. That is correct; the Chiles amendment. I am certainly not talking about final passage.

I am now abandoning the idea of finishing today. My question to the Senator from Florida is whether or not we can vote on the amendment on Monday.

Mr. CHILES. Mr. President, I thank the Senator from Tennessee for his indulgence and patience. He has always intended to try to accommodate everyone in a fair way. The Senator is right.

Yesterday, I looked forward to a vote early this afternoon on this amendment. I came in this morning thinking that was going to happen. I thought we could start the debate.

But as the day wore on, there was something about the announcement that there was not going to be a Friday session that tended to make people start making early reservations, and some are leaving today.

I found that a number of people were leaving. I was trying to find out exactly how we stand on Monday. That is the reason I did not want to make an arrangement. But again I am not trying to delay.

I want to get a vote on our proposition. I thought the packages should stay together, move together, and that we should vote before we take up the underlying Baker amendment. I want to accommodate the desire to get this debate going forward. Certainly I will try to do that Monday. If not, we will try to have other matters to dispose of. We will not delay.

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, I thank the Senator.

If the Senator from New Mexico will yield further, I hope the Senator can give us a time to do this amendment on Monday. Even though we might be doing things, we are postponing the inevitable and that is, to deal with the major Democratic initiative. I would like to deal with that on Monday, if we can.

I have been handed a note reminding me that the next item which might be taken up is the Mattingly amendment. That is a matter that is uniquely within the jurisdiction of the Appropriations Committee. The distinguished chairman of that committee, Senator HATFIELD, wishes to be on the floor before any action is taken in respect to proceeding with the Mattingly amendment.

While we wait for Senator HATFIELD to arrive, we could buy a little time by a quorum call, and perhaps in the meantime the Senator from Florida could futher pursue the possibility of a time certain for passage.

Mr. CHILES. I would be glad to do that.

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The bill clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, I have been advised by the staff director of the Appropriations Committee that Senator HATFIELD indicates he is agreeable to go to the Mattingly amendment. He wishes to speak on the subject, and will be here in a few moments.

In view of that information, I ask unanimous consent that the pending question, the Chiles amendment, be temporarily laid aside; and that the Senate turn to the consideration of the Mattingly amendment with the understanding, Mr. President, that after the consideration of the Mattingly amendment—Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry: In the form that I have put the request that the Senate temporarily lay aside the Chiles amendment and proceed to the consideration of the Mattingly amendment after the disposition of the Mattingly amendment, the pending question will recur as the Chiles amendment. Is that not correct?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator is correct.

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, I put the request.

Mr. DOMENICI. Mr. President, reserving the right to object, might I ask our good friend from Florida when he thinks he would be ready to talk with us about a possible time certain to vote on his amendment?

Mr. CHILES. I hope to do it soon.

Mr. DOMENICI. Perhaps by the time we are finished with the Mattingly amendment, you will have some information.

Mr. CHILES. I hope so.

Mr. DOMENICI. I would suggest, Mr. President, that just as we found there are some people who could not be here this afternoon because of the announcement regarding Friday's session, that maybe the same thing will apply if we do not have some agreement for a time certain to vote in the afternoon or evening of Monday, inviting less attendance rather than more. I am merely suggesting that. I could be wrong. I seems to me that is what happens.

I have no objection to the unanimous-consent request.

Mr. BAKER. I put the request, Mr. President.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection? Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, I thank all Senators.

Mr. MATTINGLY. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The bill clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. MATTINGLY. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

AMENDMENT NO. 3045

(Purpose: To authorize the President to veto items of appropriation relating to fiscal year 1985 and items of appropriation relating to fiscal year 1986)

Mr. MATTINGLY. Mr. President, I send my amendment to the desk and ask for its immediate consideration.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will report.

The bill clerk read as follows:

The Senator from Georgia (Mr. MATTINGLY) proposes an amendment numbered 3045.

Mr. MATTINGLY. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that further reading of the amendment be dispensed with.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The amendment is as follows:

At the end of the amendment, add the following new section:

LINE-ITEM VETO

SEC. . (a) The President may disapprove any item of appropriation in any Act or joint resolution, except any item of appropriation for the legislative branch or the judicial branch of the Government.

(b)(1) If an Act or joint resolution is approved by the President, any item of appropriation contained therein which is not disapproved shall become law.

(2) The President shall return, with a statement of objections, any item of appropriation disapproved to the House in which the Act or joint resolution containing such item originated.

(c) The Congress may reconsider any item of appropriation disapproved under this section in the same manner as is prescribed under section 7 of article 1 of the Constitution of the United States for reconsideration by the Congress of Acts disapproved by the President, except that only a majority vote of each House shall be required to approve an item which has been disapproved or to restore an item which has been reduced by the President to the original amount contained in the Act or joint resolution.

(d) The Provisions of this section shall apply to items of appropriation for the fiscal year beginning on October 1, 1984 and to items of appropriation for the fiscal year beginning on October 1, 1985.

Mr. MATTINGLY. Mr. President, today I am offering an amendment to grant the President authority to veto individual items in appropriations bills. This amendment, however, is more tightly controlled than earlier proposals introduced in the Senate. There are important safeguards in this amendment that should allay the fears of those who say the line-item veto would alter the balance of power between the executive and the legislative branch.

Specifically, my amendment would: First, grant the President authority by legislation rather than a constitutional amendment to veto individual items in appropriations bills; second, allow Congress to override items vetoed by the President under this authority by a majority vote rather than the traditional two-thirds override requirement; and third, contain a provision to sunset the line-item veto authority after 2 fiscal years.

For many years, there has been a need for some form of spending control. With deficits projected at near $200 billion for the next several years, that need has reached the crisis point. We are facing a test of the legislative and executive will. Together, we must put aside partisan politics and not worry about the next election. What may be even harder for us to do, is to put aside our jealous guarding of every scrap of power and influence we, individually may have cornered in the legislative process. We all swore an oath to defend this country against all enemies, foreign and domestic. I say to all my fellow Senators that the massive deficit this country now faces is a powerful domestic enemy. We created this enemy and we must now take strong action to destroy it.

While I strongly support a constitutional amendment that would require a balanced Federal budget, we cannot wait for the enactment and ratification of such a proposal. It may take a call for a constitutional convention to prod Congress into putting the balanced budget amendment to our State legislatures for ratification. On that subject, I ask unanimous consent to have inserted into the RECORD at the conclusion of my remarks a recent article by former Attorney General Griffin Bell.

Mr. MATTINGLY. Just as we cannot wait for a constitutional amendment on the balanced budget, we cannot wait on a constitutional amendment on the line-item veto. We need an interim response and enactment of my amendment will serve that purpose.

There are those who will say the line-item veto will undermine our budgeting process. To that I say our budgeting process needs change. It needs improvement. when we passed the Budget Act in 1974, the Federal Government was spending 18.5 percent of the gross national product. Now Government is spending nearly 25 percent of the gross national product. If the process is working, why is Government spending so completely out of control?

If we were running a business that went into the red ink year after year, our stockholders would not expect us to continue business as usual. They would demand change in the process. They would probably also demand a change in their leadership.

As Senators, we have perhaps the most long suffering stockholders in history. They are the American taxpayer. But if we do nothing in the face of the deficit disaster, the public will be justified in seeking a new board of directors.

What the line-item veto will do is put a magnifying glass on the budget and spending. It will be a tool to draw a clear focus on items that may or may not be worthy.

The budget has grown so large that no one person can know every item included. Its very size precludes a proper study and an informed vote. I serve on the Appropriations Committee. I know how hard our chairman and the rest of my fellow committee members work to bring forth reasonable legislation. It is a Herculean task and I marvel at the accomplishments of our chairman in the last 3 years. Some departments have their first appropriations bills in many years. But one excellent committee chairman will not solve the problem.

We need to look at the States and learn from their experience. The Governors of four-fifths of the States have line-item veto authority. They exercise that authority and as a result, most States have a balanced budget. Governors have to balance their State's budget. If they did not they would be voted out of office. It is long past time we brought the same authority and commonsense to Washington.

Mr. President, some will argue that enactment of my amendment will disrupt the constitutional balance of powers. I disagree. Under my amendment, the ultimate authority for spending will remain with the legislative branch. Any Presidential line-item veto can be overriden by a simple majority vote.

If any appropriations item cannot get a majority vote in both Houses of Congress, it does not deserve to be passed. In theory that is what the appropriations item had to have to be passed in the first place. So this is not adding any new burden. This will just let any doubtful or hidden project be judged on its own merits—not on the fact that it is attached to the funding for other popular and necessary programs. As I stated before, my amendment will just allow a magnifying glass to be focused on certain items in the budget.

The simple majority override also answers the questions of those who fear that a President with the support of just one-third of one House behind him could prevent the funding of any program. I have heard conservatives worry about defense funding and liberals worry about their social programs under the line-item veto. The simple majority override should calm those fears.

There is another safeguard against altering the balance of powers. My amendment will sunset in 2 years. I say let us try this approach and see how it works. If you do not trust the experience of nearly every State government in the Union, let us give the line-item veto a 2-year trial. If it is not successful, it will automatically die at the end of 2 years.

So we have two safeguards on the balance of power between the executive and the legislative branch: First, is the simple majority overide. Second, is the automatic 2-year sunset.

There are those who will say we should not rush into enacting the line-item veto. They will say there should be much more study given to the proposal first. To that I answer, this is not a new idea. Far from it. Most Presidents since the Civil War have favored the line-item veto. In 1790, appropriation bills were so small and acted on in such a timely manner, that the President did not really need a special veto. But once the Government grew to even the level of 1870, it became apparent that the threat of vetoing an entire appropriations bill was no longr enough to control the congressional appetite for spending. From Ulysses S. Grant to Franklin Roosevelt to Dwight Eisenhower, the call for the line-item veto has gone out.

Hearings have been held on the issue through the years including one last month before a Senate judiciary subcommittee where I discussed this very amendment we are considering today.

Until 1974, the President had the power to not spend or to impound moneys appropriated by Congress. By taking that right away from the President through legislation, Congress made a bad problem worse. It is time we returned to the President through another piece of legislation, some tool in which he can bring more control to Federal spending.

This is not a partisan effort. There are Members of both parties on both sides of the issue. This is not even a conservative/liberal issue. There are conservative and liberal opponents and supporters. Let me say right now, that I am not doing this for the benefit of the Reagan administration. I am doing it because I believe it would be the best for our country.

Mr. President, I know I am asking Members of this body to commit what some would consider heresy by voting for this amendment. But some times it is necessary to move in new directions. The adoption of my amendment would be the first step toward returning responsibility to the congressional budget process.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD several items and editorials on the line-item veto.

There being no objection, the material was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

MATTINGLY TAKES THE LEAD IN FIGHT FOR LINE-ITEM VETO

Sen. Mack Mattingly is proving to be an effective watchdog on federal spending practices. He has used his committee appointments to expose pork-barrel projects and unnecessary partronage employees. Georgia's junior senator also has fought effectively against the murky budget lines for consultants in every federal department.

But his most recent fight is his biggest. Mattingly is taking the point on the restoring the balance of federal spending by giving the president the power to veto individual budget items. The line-item veto is the best proposal we've seen to discipline a profligate Congress. Our definition of "profligate;" is the uninterrupted river of red-ink passed by Congress since 1974.

The line-item veto has flaws, for certain. But those flaws seem a far more acceptable risk than current practice. Look to last November, for instance, when President Reagan had only "up" or "down" options on a $316-billion continuing resolution passed out of Congress. To veto to it was to shut down the government. To sign it, as Reagan did, was to approve billions in pork-barrel spending.

How much more effectively we would operate if Reagan had the opportunity to veto individual spending lines, passing them back to Congress for justification and debate (and into the public spotlight). A Congress certain of its priorities should be able to muster a two-thirds vote to overturn the veto.

Mattingly's plan, either by law or constitutional amendment, carries precedent. The governors of 43 states have such power. Gov. George Deukmejian of California vetoed $1.2 billion in spending last year. It is no accident that Deukmejian has restored his state's economy, held the line on taxes and now boasts a huge surplus.

Most governors use the process to trim 1 percent to 3 percent of their legislatures' spending requests. An analyst with the American Enterprise Institute points out that Reagan could easily trim $10 billion from the budget each year at that modest rate. At 2 percent, the president could trim close to $100 billion in five years. Federal deficits would be manageable soon if such a tool were in place.

For those who fear a presidential meat-ax aimed at social programs, it is worth noting that 55 percent of the budget is permanently appropriated in the form of interest payments and entitlements. Because of other limitations, only about 20 percent of federal spending would be subject to the line-item scalpel. Entitlement reform awaits another vehicle.

But Congress has proven it cannot manage responsibly its current grip on the budget. The line-item veto will restore budget balance. And it will give Congress an out for its lack of courage and discipline.

"HERESY" SOMETIMES NEEDED

Georgia's Senator Mattingly admits to "heresy" in proposing that the Congress surrender some of its power in the President of the United States. It's time, though, for a little of the heresy he's talking about.

Our senator is the sponsor of one of the several proposals that would allow the president to veto line items in spending measures. His proposal, in spite of the heretical character he assigns it, would help to restore some fiscal sanity to the federal government.

Instead of a constitutional amendment, as several lawmakers have proposed. Mr. Mattingly's proposal is for a law that would give the president line-item veto authority only for two fiscal years. If the law proved unworkable, then it would expire in two years; if it proved workable, Congress could extend the measure.

The line-item feature, while strange to Congress, is nothing new. Forty-three states, Georgia included, have such a law on the books. It gives governors a safeguard against reckless legislative spending.

The proposal has merit because of the way Congress attaches amendments to various pieces of legislation, amendments sometimes wholly unrelated in subject or substance to the measures to which they're attached. Also, Congress has a way of tacking pork-barrel projects onto more serious spending measures—a dam out West, or a post office down South, for example. Congress can do all sorts of things with a piece of legislation.

Well, why can't a president share some of that authority? And the Mattingly measure has built into it a safeguard for Congress against reckless presidental vetoes. It would require only a majority vote to override a line-item veto, rather than the two-thirds majority now required for any override.

The Mattingly proposal would provide a safeguard in both directions, and it makes sense. It bucks the system at a time when the system begs for bucking.

[From the Athens (Ga.) Daily News, Apr. 11, 1984]

LINE-ITEM VETO COULD CUT DEFICIT

Economically, the nation's deficit is the greatest problem facing the United States today. So far little, if anything, has been done to solve this problem. All anyone wants to do is blame someone else.

Congress blames the president, who in turn blames Congress. Democrats say the deficit is larger than ever under a Republican administration. Republicans say it is the legacy of Democratic administrations that has created this monstrous problem.

Meanwhile, each side tenaciously clings to every ounce of power it can muster, which is not to be confused with struggling to solve the problem.

Georgia's own Republican senator, Mack Mattingly, however, has introduced a measure we have discussed here before—the line-item veto. We think the idea deserves positive action.

The Associated Press story that reported Mattingly's bold move stated that he had "committed political heresy" by urging Congress to turn over some of its power of the purse to the President. Considering the federal deficits of late, we think that political heresy is just what is needed. Martin Luther, father of the Protestant reformation, was considered a heretic too.

President Reagan asked for a line-item constitutional amendment in his State of the Union address three months ago. He pointed out that 43 states allow their governors the freedom to single out individual appropriations for veto rather than approve or veto an entire spending measure as sent to him by Congress.

The beauty of a line-item veto is that it would make Congress more prudent in its spending priorities if it were aware that the president could delete individual programs.

Mattingly is not the first to propose the line-item veto, but his proposal is not for a constitutional amendment, which would have to be ratified by the states to take effect. Instead, Mattingly has proposed that Congress pass a law giving the president line-item veto authority for two fiscal years. Congress could override budget items vetoed by the president by a simply majority vote, rather than with the two-thirds vote required to override other vetos.

The two-year duration of the bill, if nothing else, would be a practical lesson in civics to prove that the proposal will really work. We have no doubts it will work, and we urge its implementation. And while Mattingly's bill is being tested, let's go ahead and start the process to amend the Constitution to give the president this power permanently. It will bring some fiscal sanity to the federal budget process.

[From the Jacksonville (Fla.) Times Union, Apr. 10, 1984]

PRESIDENTIAL LINE-ITEM VETO IS NEEDED TO CONTROL SPENDING

Hearings begin today before the U.S. Senate Judiciary Committee on the question of an executive line-item veto. Properly controlled, it would be a useful device that could help hold down federal spending.

As the system works today, the president is presented with bills proposing the expenditure of hundreds of billions of dollars and must accept them or reject them en toto.

They may contain billions of dollars of pork-barrel projects that fatten the deficit but do nothing for the vast majority of hard-working, taxpaying Americans. But he can't root out those projects.

In 43 states, the chief executive can pare bills one item at a time. Ronald Reagan had the power himself when he was governor of California. But, like virtually every president since the Civil War, he has asked for and been refused the line-item veto.

Currently, the president has one option. He can ask Congress for recission of a spending measure. But unless both houses approve the recission by two-thirds vote within 45 days, the original appropriation stands.

In fairness, Congress has not been insistent in this regard. It has gone along with the president 59 percent of the time since 1975.

Sen. Mack Mattingly, R-Ga., would give the president the power to use a line-item veto by a constitutional amendment, which some authorities believe is necessary.

Another proposal would give Reagan limited power to defer or rescind spending whenever the federal debt exceeds limits set by Congress.

Another reason the line item veto is only a limited tool is that 55 percent of federal spending such as interest payments and entitlements is permanently authorized and not subject to presidential review. Another 20 percent of the budget is carried over from previous years and cannot be vetoed. So about 30 percent, or $200 billion in the 1985 budget, would be subject to veto.

There are several reasons to be cautious. Advocates of a strong defense would note that two-thirds of the $200 billion is defense spending that would be subject to veto. Also, there is the possibility that any antagonistic Congress could load up bills with items they knew Reagan would veto, making them the hero and him the villain.

There is concern that it would upset the balance of power. But Mattingly's proposal would allow a line-item veto to be overridden by majority vote instead of two-thirds, which might help to maintain that balance.

The proposal would give the country some defense against the congressional propensity for slipping terrible pork-barrel projects into bills that otherwise are necessary and desirable. If Congress would act responsibly, the line-item veto would not be needed; but the line-item veto is needed.

[From the Gainesville (Ga.) Times, Apr. 16, 1984]

NEW LINE-ITEM VETO IDEA DESERVES A CAREFUL LOOK

"We can tuck all manner of spending goodies into legislation knowing the president will swallow the unwanted in order to receive the approval of funding for the vital elements of government."

Sen. Mack Mattingly described succinctly the root of the problem of budget-busting federal spending. The process by which "Christmas tree" projects get included in the budget is a vital part of the legislative checks and balances that prevent the smaller states from being run over by the few large ones whose delegations can make up a majority.

Today's problem is that like so many worthwhile processes, this one has been terribly abused in ways unintended. A cure is needed, but let's not destroy the process in prescribing the cure. The line item veto has been proposed a number of times as a cure. As previously proposed, it was more like cutting off the arm to cure the finger.

Mattingly has conceived a modification that could make the line item veto more palatable. He would give the president line item veto powers over spending legislation, but Congress would be able to override the veto by simple majority vote rather than by the now-required two-thirds majority.

If a majority passed the objectionable appropriations in the first place, isn't that same majority likely to override the veto? Probably. But the veto would have the effect of subjecting those vetoed line items to more intense public scrutiny and debate. Sometimes specific spending measures sail through unnoticed by the public as part of a larger package. Our representatives don't hesitate to vote for them knowing we probably won't find out about it. Subjected to individual attention, the vote might be different.

In other words, if our representatives believe we know what they're doing, they're apt to do differently.

Mattingly's proposal deserves a close study before it is summarily rejected.

[From the Savannah Morning News, June 24, 1983]

THE LINE-ITEM VETO

While Mack Mattingly has caught on fast and made good inroads since Georgians sent him to the Senate in 1980, some of his congressional colleagues must wonder if he's forgotten so soon that the members of Congress hold certain special-interest and bondoggling tools. He sometimes acts more like a taxpayers' advocate than a senator.

There's nothing wrong with being a taxpayers' advocate. But it's somewhat strange for a member of Congress to want to give up a special privilege whereby he can tack on to a major piece of legislation some special-interest amendment that may benefit only a small part of his constituency. Bravo, Senator Mattingly.

What the Senator has proposed is a bill that would permit line-item presidential vetos on an appropriations bill.

The change that would create has some members of Congress worried, especially Texas Jim Wright, the House majority leader. Goodness gracious, to allow a president to veto certain items in a bill would upset a lot of apple carts.

Under the present system, a president must sign or veto a bill in its entirety. If he objects to an appropriation for an unneeded dam in Podunk, the president still must approve it or an entire bill containing some very essential and worthwhile appropriations will suffer from a veto. Especially is this true when Congress fails to override a veto, and overriding is a difficult process.

Majority Leader Wright and other Democrats contend the power of line-item veto would make the president a dictator of sorts. Georgia's governor has line-item-veto power, but no one's called him a dictator, or any of his recent predecessors. Governors of 42 other states also have that power.

The line-item veto may be just one of the things this nation needs to harness the growing national deficit. One of its effects would be to place a heavier burden of responsibility on the president's shoulders. Also, it would not remove the authority of Congress to take back any vetoed line item and make an attempt to override. If the sponsor of a dam in Podunk can convince his colleagues that the course of civilization will change tragically, if the dam isn't built, they'll override. Otherwise, it will be good riddance to a worthless project.

Senator Mattingly may have upset some of his colleagues on Capitol Hill, but the people of America probably would welcome such a change as he has proposed. Wish the measure success.

[From the Augusta Herald, Oct. 18, 1983]

DICTATORIAL VETO?

Sen. Mack Mattingly, R-Ga., has introduced a sensible measure that would permit the president a line-item veto of appropriations bills. As it stands, a president each year receiving only a handful of multibillion-dollar bills that cover everything from A to Z. He must either approve such bills or veto them in toto. In effect, this means that a president if forced to be the bag man for a lot of special-interest whoopee money, because a veto would deprive many crucial federal agencies of funding.

Of course, opposition to the "surgical" veto will be fierce. Rep. Jim Wright, D-Texas, the House majority leader, charges that giving the president a line-item veto would confer on him "dictatorial powers." Well, the governors of 43 states, including South Carolina and Georgia, enjoy line-item privileges, and as far as we know none of them has begun to resemble Idi Amin. Also, as Lloyd Cutler, former counsel to President Carter has stated, "We are the only country where the legislature can vote a larger budget than the executive proposes."

To be sure, instituting a line-item veto would shift political heat, as well as power, to the president. Yet congressmen who have built careers on brokering for various interest groups won't change their ways willingly. But they shouldn't resort to this "dictatorial powers" guff. A president (with his party) would be judged on his use of line-item-veto power in the next election. That is democractic, not dictatorial.

Naturally, anyone who favors expanding the president's powers in this fashion ought to remember that the sword cuts both ways. Faced with an omnibus appropriations bill, a president might cheerfully approve much needless social-welfare spending, while smacking down funding for national defense. Even so, the public could call one individual to account. Now responsibility for federal expenditures is spread 536 ways—that is, spread so thin it's invisible. That's no way for a democracy to operate.

Reaganomics generally is working, but interest rates are still too high because of huge federal deficits that are deepened by ungoverned federal spending. A line-item veto could solve that problem, too, and make President Reagan an economic wizard in the public eye. Could that prospect explain much of the opposition to the veto reform?

MATTINGLY MOVES OUT AHEAD ON START FOR LINE-ITEM VETO

Sen. Mack Mattingly of Georgia has moved out ahead of the Reagan administration with what we have suggested should be a major issue in the coming presidential campaign.

He has introduced a bill to allow the president a line-item veto inside appropriations bills. The Journal has urged a constitutional amendment granting the president those powers, but if it is legally permissible for Congress to pass such a measure, it would be a less cumbersome process.

We view the line-item veto as a far more sure control on federal spending than the constitutional amendment mandating a balanced federal budget. That amendment lacks only the approval of two more states before it becomes the trigger for a constitutional convention. Such a convention, without controls, could be a divisive morass. An amendment for a line-item veto is a way to avoid that.

Virtually every state gives its governor the power to strike individual budget items. It is far more vital that the president have that power, given the complexity of the federal budget process and the profligacy of a Congress whose subcommittees are increasingly the hostages of special interest groups.

The president would by no means have the last word. Any veto can be overridden by a two-thirds vote.

In the monstrous federal budget process, the President gets only 13 choices—he must vote them up or down. That's the number of appropriations bills Congress sends to the White House. Too often, one or more of those bills is needed "to keep the government running," or it carries a program or rider the president considers vital.

Too often as well, those 13 appropriations bills are far beyond overall spending targets. But by their very size and complexity, the president has little choice but to sign them.

This week Treasury Secretary Donald Regan said he was prepared to push the issue as a campaign theme. White House Counselor Edwin Meese is behind it as well. Sen. Mattingly has done well to put the issue before his colleagues.

LINE-ITEM VETO: TRIMMING THE PORK

(By John Palffy, Policy Analyst)

INTRODUCTION

Congress begins consideration of President Reagan's call for a line-item veto April 10th with hearings before the Senate Judiciary Committee. The proposal could come to the Senate floor by late April, when an increase in the debt ceiling is debated. The controversial initiative to strengthen presidential control over appropriations recently has earned surprising, if tentative, respect—largely because Congress seems unable to control the budget process it created ten years ago.[1]

The problem is that under current law the President is faced with only two unpleasant options when unacceptably large appropriations bills, such as last November's $316 billion continuing resolution, land on his desk. He can "rubber stamp" the bills in their entirety, replete with billions of dollars of special interest spending. Or he can shut down government operations by vetoing the bill. No middle ground is available. A line-item veto would permit the President to "blue pencil" individual items from congressional appropriations, so that pork-barrel or special interest spending is not approved merely by "riding the coat-tails" of essential appropriations.

There is nothing new about the line-item veto. Forty-three state governors have the power, and the veto has been requested by virtually every President since the Civil War. Many bills to give the President line-item veto power have been put before Congress—and failed. The line-item veto has not been considered seriously by Congress as a budget control device until today.

Opinions are divided, however, on the merit and legality of the proposal. Opponents claim that the line-item veto would be unconstitutional, and that it would grant the President undue power over spending priorities—without significantly reducing the deficit. Proponents respond that it would be constitutional, that safeguards could be added to control White House power, and that the cumulative impact on spending could be considerable. If Presidents during the last ten years had used line-item veto to cut just 1 percent from yearly spending, the FY 1985 deficit could be half its projected level.

Many practical concerns and constitutional objections need to be answered before the line-item veto is enacted. Despite such problems, however, greater control of federal spending is a legitimate responsibility of the President. And more effective executive control of spending is needed to counter the current institutional incentives for Congress to spend taxpayers' money so freely. The line-item veto, therefore, deserves very serious consideration.

WHY ACTION IS NEEDED

Because, under current law, the President must approve or disapprove entire appropriations bills, Congress is able to pass special interest and non-germane "riders" by incorporating them into major last-minute funding bills and resolutions. If the President refuses to sign such "Christmas tree" bills, he often must shut down the government agencies covered by the legislation. The President can, of course, petition Congress to cancel any spending plans, but unless both Houses of Congress approve the rescission by a two-thirds vote within 45 days, the President must spend the funds. Since the Budget Control Act went into force in 1975, 41 percent of all such presidential rescission requests have been ignored by Congress. None of President Reagan's 1983 rescissions were approved.

A line-item veto would strengthen the President's rescission powers. The President would be able to rescind individual appropriations and allow the rest of the bill to pass. This rescission would stand unless Congress explicitly overrode the veto.

Senator Mack Mattingly (R-GA) has proposed two methods to convey the line-item veto power to the President—a constitutional amendment (S.J. Res. 178) and a legislative rule (S. 1921). The amendment would involve the lengthy amending process, requiring approval by 34 states after passage through both Houses of Congress S. 1921 would grant the President statutory power for the line-item veto. In theory at least, this could become law in time to give the President line-item veto power for the FY 1985 budget. But this could face serious constitutional challenges and, of course, it would be subject to repeal at any time.

A modification of the line-item veto proposal, offered last November by Senators William Armstrong (R-CO) and Russell Long (D-LA), failed in the Senate by only three votes. Armstrong has promised to present it for a vote again this spring, when Congress debates the debt ceiling. A similar proposal (H.R. 5000) has been introduced in the House by Minority Leader Robert

[1] See John Palffy, "Giving the Budget Process Teeth," Heritage Foundation Backgrounder No. 305, November 11, 1983.

Michel (R-Ill.) Under the Long-Armstrong proposal, the President would be required to defer or rescind spending whenever the federal debt exceeds quarterly limits imposed by Congress. This power would be limited, however. He could not eliminate an entire program or project, or reduce any program by more than 20 percent. Nor could he restrict payments to individuals.

Because the President would still have to accept or reject entire appropriation bills under the Long-Armstrong proposal, and because there would be precise limits on the occasions when the President could employ it, the amendment technically is not a line-item veto. Rather, it strengthens existing rescission powers. Senator Pete Domenici (R-NM) has noted,[2] however, that tying the line-item veto to the debt ceiling may not be very effective; Congress, for instance, could simply raise the ceiling to prevent presidential action.

THE CASE FOR A LINE-ITEM VETO

Deficit reductions

The fiscal effects of the line-item veto would be limited because 55 percent of federal spending (interest payments and most entitlements) are permanently authorized, not "appropriated," and thus are not subject to presidential review. Moreover, a President cannot veto appropriations committed from previous years—and these appropriations make up approximately 20 percent of each fiscal year's spending. So less than 30 percent of federal spending (or $260 billion in the proposed FY 1985 budget) would be subject to line-item veto. The House Budget Committee, in a recent analysis, has argued that even 30 percent might prove an over-estimate.[3] By assuming that President Reagan would not veto any defense spending, the Committee concluded that less than $90 billion would actually be subject to a Reagan line-item veto in FY 1985.

The House Budget Committee analysis is subject to at least two criticisms, however. It is not clear, for instance, that defense spending would be exempt from a Reagan line-item veto. The Administration knows well that the defense budget is not immune from pork-barrel spending—Pentagon and White House officials have tried for years to close a number of unneeded military installations, for example, only to be ignored by Congress. And, while President Reagan might focus the line-item veto on the non-defense side of the budget, the converse would likely be assumed the case during a Democratic administration.

American Enterprise Institute budget analyst Norman Ornstein contends that a President would use the line-item veto to cut only 1 percent a year from the budget. While a 1 percent cut in the FY 1985 budget would amount to only $9.2 billion—a tiny fraction of the projected $200 billion deficit—the compounding effects of cutting 1 percent from the budget every year soon would become signficant.

Table 1 illustrates such cumulative effects. The table indicates what federal spending might have been in past years if the President had used a line-item veto to make very modest cuts in the budget every year, beginning in 1974. As the table indicates, a line-item veto of just 1 percent of total spending would have reduced the projected FY 1985 deficit by $105 billion. If the President had cut 2 percent of discretionary, or "controllable," government spending ($265 billion in FY 1985), the projected deficit would be reduced by $49 billion.

TABLE 1.—THE LONG-TERM EFFECTS OF A LINE-ITEM VETO

Table 2 illustrates the likely consequences of instituting a line-item veto for FY 1985. If the President cut 1 percent from the budget each year, the total savings over the next five years could amount to $174 billion, and the FY 1989 spending would then be reduced by $65 billion. If the President were to cut two percent from only "controllable" items, the total five year savings would still be $99 billion, and the fiscal year 1989 spending reduction would be $37 billion (assuming controllable outlays remained at 27 percent of total budget outlays).

Source.—Calculations based on CBO budget projections.

It is not clear which constituency has the most to lose from a line-item veto. For instance, of the $260 billion that could be made subject to the line-item veto in FY 1985, two-thirds would be defense spending. That means that for every $1 of non-defense spending open to the line-item veto, the Pentagon would risk up to $2. Moreover, the fastest growing segments of the budget, interest and entitlements (constituting 55 percent of the budget) would not be affected by the veto. Advocates of a strong defense are understandably cautious about a line-item veto that puts at risk twice as much defense spending as non-defense spending.

Cuts in pork-barrel programs

The line-item veto could be an effective deterrent to the practice known as "logrolling." This occurs when members of Congress vote with one another on a quid pro quo basis to pass appropriations for programs benefitting local areas and interest groups—even though each program would fail to win a majority on its own. The result is that Congress passes appropriations bills loaded with costly amendments and riders that provide benefits to local constituencies.

A line-item veto specifically would allow for the President, the only official in the U.S. who must answer to the country as a whole, to cancel such spending on a case-by-case basis according to national interests. By returning these projects to Congress for reconsideration on an individual basis, the President would have the power to break the logrolling coalition. The line-item veto seems to be the best available defense against logrolling and omnibus spending resolutions.

OBJECTIONS TO THE VETO

Passing the buck

The line-item veto is viewed by some, however, as just an excuse for Congress to abandon the search for a responsible appropriations process. Senator Lawton Chiles (D-FL), for instance, fears that Congress: "would add to program after program, making all our constituents happy and never have to look at the bottom line. We could pass that responsibility over to the President. He would cut the bill back down to size and be the spoilsport."[4]

State experience gives some support to this view. Political observers argue that the Illinois legislature, for instance, adds funds to the budget in hope that the governor will veto them. But strong institutional constraints on total spending, such as balanced budget legislation, reduce such politicizing at the state level. At the federal level, a strong binding budget resolution would also reduce such opportunities. But it should not be forgotten that the line-item veto is an executive branch responsibility, with potentially significant political liabilities as well as benefits.

Presidential pork-barrelling

State experience also suggests that "just by having [the line-item veto], you can avoid getting a bill you don't want," says Robert Wilburn, former Pennsylvania budget secretary. "Exactly," retort opponents—the President could use the threat of a line-item veto to further his political interests. He could, for instance, hold hostage discretionary projects supported by Congress to force significant increases in defense spending, they argue, or he could target his veto against political opponents in election years.

Upsetting the balance of power

Many congressmen claim the line-item veto violates a literal interpretation of the Constitution—which vests spending power in the Congress. No state or federal court has handed down any decision to this effect, and the Law Division of the Congressional Research Service has determined that Senator Armstrong's beefed-up rescission proposal would be constitutional.[5] Since there seems to be little difference in principle between Armstrong's rescission proposal and a line-item veto, the veto's constitutional critics need to marshall better evidence to support their case. Moreover, there is historical precedent for a presidential refusal to accept specific appropriations. Between 1921 and 1974, the President possessed unilateral and absolute impoundment powers; he could refuse to spend appropriations without any explanation to Congress. The 1974 Budget Control Act stripped the White House of such power.

Opponents also fear that the line-item veto would grant nearly unilateral authority to the President, because he could veto a program if he could hold the backing of just one-third of one chamber of Congress. But if the veto could be overridden by a congressional vote of only fifty percent, as Senator Mattingly's proposal provides, this objection might be overcome—since any program of truly national importance presumably could win majority support.

The general argument that a line-item veto would circumvent the intent of the Founding Fathers holds less weight when viewed in the context of the structural changes that have altered the institutional balance of power firmly in favor of Congress. Moreover, although the Constitution specifically limits the president's veto powers to entire bills, it is not exactly clear, according to some experts, what the Founding Fathers meant by a "bill." In early years "bills" were limited in their scope of authorizations and financing—it is unlikely that the Founding Fathers envisaged the passage of single bills with $316 billion of spending authority (a tenth of the nation's entire output). As Senate Finance Committee Chairman Robert Dole (R-KS) noted in congressional debate during the Carter Administration, "the growth of the size of appropriations bills has eroded the intent of the original veto provision of our Constitution and I believe that erosion should be reversed." [6]

The balance of power has also shifted away from the President in the last ten years as the rules on germaneness have become largely ineffective.[7] The Constitution did not intend for Congress to attach non-germane authorizing language to critical appropriations bills in order to pressure the President into accepting those special interest additions.

Moreover, while Congress has assumed more extensive budgetary powers, it has failed to assume the corresponding fiscal responsibilities. The line-item veto proposal offers a means to effect such fiscal responsibility, and to restore the balance of power existing prior to 1974. It is not a revolutionary attempt to create an "imperial" presidency.

STATE EXPERIENCE

Forty-three state governors now have line-item veto power over appropriations. These states adopted the veto after the Civil War and none of the states subsequently has withdrawn it—clear evidence that the veto is both popular and workable.

California Governor George Deukmejian "popularized" the line-item veto in the media last summer when he "blue pencilled" $1.2 billion in legislative requests to avoid tax increases. But Deukmejian has not been the only governor to flex his line-item muscles. In Illinois, Governor James Thompson routinely slices about 3 percent off appropriations bills each year to keep the budget balanced. And during his eight years in Sacramento, Ronald Reagan used the line-item veto to reduce the legislature's spending plan by an average of 2 percent a year.

Learning from the States

The simple fact that no line-item veto law has been repealed in any of the 43 states that enacted it is clear testimony to its success and acceptance. But state experience also suggests that some problems would need to be solved before a federal version of the veto would be successful.

The primary hurdle would be the ambiguity over the term "item." Opponents of the proposal contend that the vagueness surrounding the term would mean granting the President uncertain power. The issue could be a stumbling block in the line-item veto initiative. Litigation in the states has centered on the precise meaning of the term "item" and whether it would encompass reductions as well as disapprovals. Contradictory decisions have been handed down in different states; for instance, in Oklahoma and Illinois.[8] A bill that specifies that the President must approve or reject an entire line appropriation, might lead to such questions as: Would individual projects within a military construction or mass transit appropriation be subject to line-item scrutiny, or would the President be confined to action only on major appropriation headings?

Senate Majority Leader Howard Baker (R-TN) is concerned that this confusion would allow Congress to manipulate the language of bills to avoid the line-item veto. Says Baker: "I am really afraid if we had line-item vetoes Congress would start sending the President appropriations bills with just one line."

Senator Mattingly's bill may deal with this problem by granting the President sweeping authority to reduce or disapprove any part of an appropriation. This would eliminate any ambiguities and potential court conflicts over presidential power, but it would also grant the President very extensive power over the federal purse-strings—and so is not likely to receive congressional approval in its present form. The senator has sought to balance this sweeping power, however. A recently introduced amended version of S. 1921 would allow Congress to override a line-item veto with a simple majority. It would also require the veto to be "reapproved" after two years.

CONCLUSION

The line-item veto faces considerable opposition from two groups within Congress. Legislators who wish to protect their ability to force acceptance of pork-barrel spending and non germane authorizations have every reason to oppose the proposal. In addition, legislators who are concerned that critical defense systems could be the primary targets of future presidential vetos understandably hesitate supporting the device.

Senator Dole has reminded the first group that they have clear obligations to the country. "I do not impugn those members of the Senate who support such (pork-barrel)," says the Finance Committee chairman, "because it is our duty to do as much as we can for our states. However, as a group I believe that we could all endorse an institutional change which would eliminate some of this."

The fears of the second group, however, must be weighed carefully in assessing the full political costs and benefits of the line-item veto. Moreover, critics of the line-item veto should remember that the Constitution was written in the context of one set of political parameters and institutional conditions and that those parameters and conditions have changed. The budgetary process can only achieve the purposes of the Constitution if it is adopted to these new circumstances. A legislated line-item veto could restore the balance of power originally intended by the Founding Fathers, without intruding on the clear intent of the Constitution.

Most concerns over the constitutionality of the line-item veto appear to be little more than political rhetoric. The President enjoyed unilateral impoundment powers for over fifty years during this century.

Yet the line-item veto proposal is still wrought with practical problems. Conservatives, for instance, must ponder the fact that a liberal President could block certain weapons systems approved by Congress. And the best mechanism for introducing such a veto is by no means clear. State experience suggests that the least problematic method of instituting a line-item veto would be to accompany it with a statutory rule granting the President the right to disapprove or reduce any part of any appropriation bill. Such language would carry the principle of executive review to its logical conclusion. A rule of this kind could be achieved by amending existing rescission powers such that a rescission would stand unless Congress explicitly overrode it. In order to make such sweeping executive review palatable, and to reduce the danger of a President preempting spending priorities, it would be prudent to allow congressional override with less than a two-thirds vote.

A line-item veto would be no fiscal panacea. It does not even address the primary federal spending problem—the spiraling growth of entitlements. Nor would it deal with many of the serious shortcomings of the congressional budget process. But by taking the handcuffs off the President in the appropriations process, the line-item veto would constitute an important first step toward fiscal responsibility.

Mr. MATTINGLY. Mr. President, there was a speech given not too long ago before the New York Economic Club, on April 3, 1984, by Senator DOLE. I will submit the entire speech for the RECORD. Mr. DOLE said:

But if we fail to beat the deficits, we will once again be plunged back into boom-and-bust, inflation-and-recession cycles.

The huge borrowing needs of the Treasury will force the Federal Reserve to choose between inflation and high interest rates. Either way, the chance for extended prosperity will be lost.

He said:

Some see the deficit as a problem, but I see it as a tremendous opportunity. We can work together and remove this last impediment to a secure, prosperous America. And if we can pull it off, we will have done more than strengthen our economy. We will have made a major contribution to restoring the faith and trust in our political institutions.

Mr. President, that is the purpose of this line-item veto, to help beat the deficits.

HOW THE PEOPLE CAN FORCE CONGRESS TO CURB DEFICIT

(By Griffin B. Bell)

(Griffin Bell, who served as U.S. attorney general during the Carter administration, now practices law in Atlanta.)

Like most Americans, I am deeply concerned by the federal government's continuing failure to control budget deficits. The interest payments on the debt now amount to 12 percent of the current budget. Basic to this failure is that no counterforce exists against the special-interest groups that are the driving force behind excessive government spending.

Because Congress has failed to control runaway deficits, the people have acted through their state legislatures, 32 of which have called for a constitutional convention to draft a federal balanced-budget amendment. When 34 states have so acted, Congress, under Article V of the Constitution, must call a convention.

We are now hearing predictions of doom and gloom that have not been heard since the passage of the 17th Amendment 72 years ago. In our original Constitution, Senators were appointed by the state legislatures rather than elected by the people. By 1912, the people had concluded by a wide margin that the Senate should be elected, not appointed. The House of Representatives agreed, five times passing a proposed Constitutional amendment to make the Senate elective.

But five times the Senate killed the amendment in committee, thereby forcing the people to take action. State legislatures began passing conditional calls for convention, if Congress did not approve the amendment.

At that time, the two-thirds required was 32 legislatures. When 31 states had acted, the Senate read the handwriting on the wall and passed the amendment. Without the use of the alternative route in Article V of our Constitution, the 17th Amendment would not have been passed and senators would still be appointed.

This is precisely what the founding fathers had in mind. They provided for amendment through action of state legislatures to deal with situations in which the people and the legislatures saw the problem and the need for change, but in which Congress was part of the problem and would not act. That situation prevailed in 1912. It prevails equally in 1984.

Aside from the specious argument that a convention is "alien" to the constitutional process, we hear other objections. It is argued that our friends abroad would recoil in horror at the prospect of a constitutional convention that would presumably destabilize America.

But the free world has been decimated by our interest rates and the dollar exchange rate, which foreign financial experts attribute to our huge deficits and general fiscal profligacy. A serious effort to install long-term constitutional control over U.S. fiscal practices would be welcomed by our friends abroad.

Also, we are bombarded with ominous stories about a "runaway" constitutional convention which, presumably, would repeal the Bill of Rights, dismantle the Constitution and install some sort of totalitarian regime. Well, while we have not had a federal convention since 1787, there have been more than 200 conventions held in various states, many of whose constitutions provide for periodic conventions to propose amendments. Such gatherings have brought out the best, not the worst, in people's government.

It is claimed that James Madison said that a "new" constitutional convention would be a cloud over the Constitution. He did indeed utter those words, but in response to critics who declared that the Constitution written in Philadelphia in 1787 should be rejected and a new convention be held immediately. Thomas Jefferson, author of the Declaration of Independence, assumed that we would have a new convention about every 20 years.

In fact, fears about a "runway" convention are groundless. The various state applications to Congress not only exhort Congress to pass the Tax Limitation-Balanced Budget Amendment but limit the scope of a convention to the sole and exclusive purpose of the balanced-budget issue.

Those who wring their hands over the prospects of a convention run the risk of exposing their elitism, implying that the average citizen cannot be trusted. At the same time, they are willing to place their full faith in Congress, the very institution that has precipitated the fiscal mess which, in turn, has prompted the constitutional Tax Limitation-Balanced Budget movement.

But suppose that other resolutions were offered at the balanced budget convention. Congress would not be compelled, nor would it have any incentive, to send along to the states for ratification any proposals emanating from the convention that exceeded the scope of the call. And 38 states are not about to ratify any proposal that does violence to or seeks to dismantle fundamental constitutional protections and guarantees.

Finally, it is important to understand that a convention will not necessarily take place upon the application of 34 states. The state calls have said: If Congress does not pass the amendment, then a convention for that purpose is called. The calls are conditional, not absolute.

I believe there will not be a balanced budget constitutional convention. Congress simply will not abide letting mere citizens decide its taxing and spending power. Congress will act, I predict, as it did on the issue of the direct elections of senators—when overwhelming pressure from the states and the people can no longer be ignored.

Mr. EVANS. Mr. President, will the Senator from Georgia yield for a question?

Mr. MATTINGLY. Yes; I will.

Mr. EVANS. Mr. President, is it the Senator's understanding that the line-item veto, as he has proposed it, would allow the President not only to strike in entirety a particular item of appropriation, but line through and reduce the amount of a particular item?

Mr. MATTINGLY. Yes; I think that would be the implication. I am familiar with what the former Governor, now Senator from Washington, is referring to, the authority permitted in his State, I believe.

Is that correct?

Mr. EVANS. Not in my particular State, although I had very strong item veto authority. In a number of States, that particular authority, in precisely that form, does exist.

I further ask the Senator from Georgia, that if this was done, would not this reflect, in essence, just an enhanced rescission authority? In other words, the President would have the opportunity to initiate by reducing an appropriation and Congress would have the authority by majority vote to deny that to the President whereas under present law, the President must request a reduction and Congress has to take a positive action of approval.

Mr. MATTINGLY. That is correct, Mr. President. By implication, I would say that that is the intention.

Mr. EVANS. I thank the Senator.

Mr. MATTINGLY. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

Mr. EVANS. Mr. President, if the Senator will withhold, I wish to endorse the proposal of the Senator from Georgia. He has pointed out that I had the opportunity to serve as Governor and I find myself, of course, in a different position now as a Member of a legislative body. I understand the difficulty of a legislative body appearing to give up some of its authority and expanding the veto authority of the President. But I believe in this case, it is appropriate to do so.

The President has a more stringently restricted veto authority than almost any other chief executive in the United States. Virtually every Governor has broader veto authority than the President in terms of items or sections of particular pieces of legislation. I would truly view this not as increasing the authority of the President as some of our colleagues would suggest, but as an evenhanded rescission authority that gives to the President an opportunity to initiate action, with the opportunity for Congress to deny it. Whereas today, the President must ask, Congress must initiate, and that is a much more difficult task in terms of getting control of the budget, which is now very much out of control.

Some suggest that this is not really effective because it applies to a relatively small percentage of the budget. After all, no President can reduce our obligations to pay interest on the national debt; no President, through veto, can change the obligations we have made to our entitlement programs—which take almost half of our total Federal budget. But even if the opportunity to use this tool is restricted to a relatively small part of the budget, it is still an important tool and should be viewed just as that. We need a whole kit, we need a large number of tools to deal effectively with a budget now out of control. That may not be a hammer; it may be a pair of pliers. Whatever it is, it is one tool and, I suggest, Mr. President, an important tool as we move ahead on the budget reduction package we are now debating.

The Gallup poll of last November, in asking about this question, had a 67-percent affirmative reply from citizens who were asked whether they thought the President ought to have veto authority. I believe strongly that, as we look at specific ways either to close tax loopholes or to reduce expenditure, we ought to be looking quite seriously at the other tools we can use to control budget expenditures now and in future years.

These tools clearly should include an item veto or an evenhanded rescission authority. It ought to include, I believe personally, a commitment to move toward a 2-year budget with stronger congressional oversight responsibilities. And there may well be other tools. We ought not to ignore those procedural acts as we deal with the dollars that we have been debating over the past weeks.

I thank the Chair.

Mr. CHILES. Mr. President, this issue has been before us several times. Now we find it again in the guise of a statute. I think this avoids the real deficit issue. We are talking about a deficit problem in which only about 18 percent of the budget in nondefense discretionary programs would fall within the ambit of the line item proposal. If you look at these programs, you will see they are not growing faster than the gross national product. They are all growing slower. Congress and the President together have already restrained the growth of these programs. So either the existing veto is working, or the present budget system is working. We do not see a problem there. The major problems are coming from our entitlements. The line item veto is not going to help in that area.

With the interpretation that has been placed on this by the Senator from Georgia, we see that the President will have the right to really take the basic power Congress has, the power to write legislation. If he can reduce items or modify them, I take that he could strike a legislative prohibition; he could reduce any of the amounts proposed by Congress. So, Mr. President, it seems to me that the one power that Congress has, that ability to write legislation, would be taken away.

Legislation like this would make Congress less responsible. I can envision that it would be a lot easier to vote for programs, saying, "The President will take care of this; he will line-item veto this. I can go ahead and please the home groups that want us to put in more for veterans, for example, knowing that. Somebody in the administration will take care of that. They will reduce that item." That would be safer for us than being held responsible.

The other thing that has always concerned me, Mr. President, is that a line-item veto is not going to be exercised by the President of the United States. It is not even going to be exercised by the Director of the Office of Management and Budget. It is going to be exercised by some faceless, nameless bureaucrat, who wears a little green eyeshade. He sits down in the bowels of the building somewhere. He does not change whether the Republicans are in power or the Democrats are in power and generally, he "ain't never liked that program nohow." He has always wanted a chance to "get it." So he puts it on the list for the line-item veto.

That will happen time after time. Then a Member of Congress, who has had some program brought to his attention by his constituents or through an oversight hearing, may find himself facing the fact that he got the Congress of the United States to override the President's veto on this little line item. It may be the Mississippi Seashore gatehouse at the park.

How in the world are you going to be able to deal with that? A gatehouse is something the bureaucrat has never felt they needed, and so he gets it put on the list.

Just multiply that by the number of items that may be involved. That has always concerned me.

The other thing that has concerned me is that you would be giving tremendous power to the executive and his team. If they do not think that CHILES has been behaving lately, they can ask the computer to give them a list of the things in which CHILES is now interested. They would look for the "little one," and send him a message. The administration might look at CHILES or some other Senator and decide he is not answering our calls right now. He is not paying attention to us right now. We do not like his record right now. So let us send him a message, but we will not do anything real big, nothing prominent. We will just find a few here and there. The printout will come through, and they can look over it and circle a few things. That is a tremendous power.

Mr. President, I am seriously concerned that we are talking about rewriting the Constitution of the United States. We are going to do it with a statute. There have been attempts before to try to amend the Constitution. There have been constitutional amendments proposed. They have been going on since the time of President Jackson and before, urging the administration to change the veto power. Thus far that has not happened. I would hate to see us now attempt to achieve that change with a statute. I do not think it would be a very wise thing to do. I think we would be altering the separation of power.

States have evolved differently from the U.S. Congress and Constitution. They have different powers. Generally speaking, in the States they have had citizen-type legislators who do not operate full time. Their budgets are much smaller and the line items are fewer. In my State, we had so-called legislative courtesy. Any time there was a line-item veto, the Senate would go into executive session and say, "What does the Senator from Polk County want to do on this item? And you would just indicate up or down, and that was what determined whether that line-item veto was overridden or not. It was a perfunctory thing. So the States have worked their will on what they would do on this particular matter.

Mr. President, I ask for the yeas and nays.

Mr. MATTINGLY. I object.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator may not object. The Senator has a right to ask for the yeas and nays.

Is there a sufficient second? There is not a sufficient second.

Mr. CHILES. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The bill clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. MATTINGLY. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

Mr. DIXON addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Georgia has the floor.

Mr. DIXON. Mr. President, I wonder if my distinguished friend and colleague from Georgia will yield for a question or two from the Senator from Illinois?

Mr. MATTINGLY. Yes.

Mr. DIXON. May I ask my colleague from Georgia whether his amendment concerning a statutory line-item veto power provides in essence that if there was a line-item veto of any appropriation item by the President, an override could take place in both Houses by a constitutional majority as distinguished from the two-thirds majority now required when the President fully vetoes a bill?

Mr. MATTINGLY. Yes.

Mr. DIXON. May I further pursue the question by asking my friend from Georgia whether he has made some inquiries of respected legal counsel as to the opinion of those individuals of the constitutionality of a statutory as distinguished from constitutional approach to the question?

Mr. MATTINGLY. There are different opinions on that, as the Senator well knows. I think the 1974 Budget Act probably raises similiar difference of opinions.

Mr. DIXON. May I say to my colleague from Georiga that I am delighted to see him present this amendment. At the appropriate time, I would like to speak, Mr. President, in favor of this point of view, although I share the very serious legal reservations as to the constitutionality of the approach he is taking. In view of the overriding importance of addressing all of these fiscal problems when we face a $1.5 trillion budget deficit, I should like, Mr. President, when my friend has concluded, to express my supporting point of view on this matter.

Mr. MATTINGLY. I will not take long, I say to the Senator from Illinois. I have just a few very brief comments.

I suggest, in order to respond to some of the questions by the distinguished Senator from Florida, that this or any other President will not be unduly influenced by the green eyeshade people. The buck still stops in the Oval Office when a decision is made on vetoing line items or anything else.

In reference to the line-item veto only addressing a small part of this Federal budget, the line-item veto is really a scalpel approach rather than a meat ax approach or cleaver approach. That seems to really be an argument in favor of the adoption of this technique rather than to be opposed to it.

According to some students of the line item-veto, they make the comment that if the line-item veto had been applied against only the so-called controllable items of the budget for the last 5 years, cutting no more than 2 percent each year, the savings would be $99 billion.

So the line-item veto is not being offered as a panacea for all the budget miseries we have. It is only one solution to our fiscal problems. A balanced budget amendment would be another asset.

In addressing the comment made about items that may be under question that were possibly from Mississippi or from Georgia or from any other State, I think it would require justification of such items. I think, so long as it were justified, it would stand the scrutiny of the magnifying glass.

Is it a tremendous power we are giving to the President of the United States, since it applies to so little of the Federal budget? I do not think we are giving away tremendous power. I think, rather, what we see are those who oppose this legislation because they fear losing some of their own personal power, which I really do not think would happen at all. I think it would probably end up making us stronger representatives in the Congress.

As far as the constitutional amendment addressing that issue, with a $200 billion deficit today and facing deficits down the road of $200 billion, you cannot wait on a constitutional amendment. You cannot wait on the $200 billion deficits. So why not try to address it legislatively by statute?

I yield to may friend and colleague from the State of Illinois.

Mr. DIXON addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Illinois is recognized.

Mr. DIXON. First, I ask my colleague from Georgia whether he has any objection to my joining him as a cosponsor of this amendment?

Mr. MATTINGLY. Mr. President, I am happy to have the Senator as a cosponsor.

Mr. DIXON. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that my name be added as a cosponsor of the amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. DIXON. Mr. President, I say to my colleagues that I have not introduced any of the bills to achieve a statutory line-item veto power in the President because, as a lawyer, I have some difficulty about the constitutional viability of this approach. But since my friend from Georgia has done it, I want to support it, at least to make it clear on the record how supportive some of us are of the concept involved.

Let me make this statement on the constitutional issue.

I was in the Illinois Legislature for 20 years—12 years in the house and 8 years in the senate—in leadership capacities in both places, and during all those years, we used to discuss the question of an income tax in Illinois. Throughout the years, it was accepted as a constitutional fact that if you adopted an income tax in Illinois, it had to fall on corporations with the same percentage effect as on people.

Finally, when Richard Ogilvie was Governor of our State, there was such a tremendous revenue drop that the Governor, who happened to be a Republican, suggested an income tax. The whole session was devoted to debating the question of an income tax.

Finally, it became apparent that no tax could pass unless corporations were taxed at a higher rate than people. Everybody said: "You can't do that constitutionally. We all know that. For decades we have not done it because we know you can't do it that way." Everybody said, "Well, we'll try, anyhow."

The bill was passed. The question which was supposed to be a constitutional given was taken to the supreme court of the State of Illinois, and the supreme court said: "It is a reasonable way to do it. You can do it that way."

So, after all the decades that had not been done because it was an article of faith that you could not, when it was finally done as a compromise, because it was the only course to follow, the supreme court said it was OK.

Why do I tell that story? For this reason: Because there is a lot of difference between trying to get a two-third majority in the House and in the Senate to accomplish a line item and reduction veto in the Constitution, on the one hand, or to adopt the amendment of my colleague and friend from Georgia, which requires only a simple majority, on the other hand.

In other words, if my friend from Georgia can prevail here today by a simple majority in this place, we can send this question to the House. If it prevailed there, at their tender mercy—and I have some doubts that it would—it would go to the President, and then we would let the Supreme Court of the United States decide.

So I dispose of the constitutional question by saying it is for the courts, not the Senate. Nobody knows, because the courts have never ruled. This country is more than 200 years old, and this question has never been dealt with in court, so nobody really knows.

It comes down, then, to the question of whether this is a good idea. I do not know whether we even are a simple majority in the Senate for the support of the idea of a line item and reduction veto in the President. But I want to answer the objections to it one point at a time.

The first is this: Are we really giving away our powers as a legislative body, as a Congress, as a House of Representatives, as the U.S. Senate, if we give a line item and reduction veto power to the President of the United States? I say, positively no, we are not. We do not because, under this amendment, a simple constitutional majority in both places could override the President of the United States. Since it takes that kind of vote in the first place to pass legislation, what in the world is the matter with saying that we should give the President of the United States a fiscal tool to address the problem, leaving to us the strength, under the democratic system we live in, to override in both places? It makes good sense.

Will it save money? That is a reasonable question.

Mr. DOMENICI. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. DIXON. I yield.

Mr. DOMENICI. I merely want to ask for the yeas and nays on the amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there a sufficient second? There is a sufficient second.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. DOMENICI. I thank the Senator for yielding.

Mr. DIXON. I thank my friend from New Mexico.

Mr. President, based on the Illinois experience with the item veto, we can save between $25 billion and $30 billion by giving to the President of the United States a line item and reduction veto power. I think it makes good sense to give this power to the President.

I suggest once again that 43 of the 50 States of the Union have given this power to their Governors, and it has worked well. There has not been one effort in those States to attempt to take away from the Governors of those States the power for a line item and reduction veto.

The other night, when we debated the tax bill, we spent a good deal of time debating the question of changing the depreciation allowance on real estate from 15 years to 20 years. I opposed changing it from 15 to 20 years. My distinguished friend the chairman of the Finance Committee said it would be a terrible thing. We would lose a billion dollars if we did not go along with the Finance Committee's tax recommendations. One billion dollars—and we fought all night. Here is a chance to save $25 billion to $30 billion if it can be done constitutionally.

I suggest that we should bite the bullet and try it. I suggest that we should not be so jealous of our prerogatives. I suggest that we should do what we can to save money in this budget and to give everybody in Government effective tools to save money.

So I am delighted to join my friend from Georgia, even though I have some reservations about the constitutionality of the amendment in suggesting that we should try to put a majority vote on this amendment and to put it in this bill, send it to the House, call upon the House to put up or shut up, send it to the President, and say to the President:

"Now, Mr. President, you put up or shut up. You take this power. You show us where you will make the cuts, reserving to us the right to look at it again in our wisdom as a Congress and by a majority, a simple majority in both places express our points of view."

I say this is fair. It makes sense. It will save money and an overwhelmingly majority of the people of this country whenever they have been polled on this question have favored doing this.

I should think it ought to be an issue that is before us as long as these outrageous deficits are before us, and I call upon the Senate to take this opportunity to express its point of view and let the courts ultimately decide the constitutional question.

Mr. THURMOND. Mr. President, I am pleased to be a cosponsor of this amendment offered by the distinguished Senator from Georgia (Mr. MATTINGLY). This proposal would grant the President statutory authority to veto individual items in appropriations legislation.

For at least the last decade, the problem of deficit spending by the Federal Government and the concomitant problem of a compounding national debt have been the focal point of criticism of Federal fiscal practice. This increased awareness of the severity and persistent nature of these problems has spawned various suggestions as to how this situation could be corrected. One of the possible solutions which has been proffered is the line-item veto.

Simply stated, the item would place in the Chief Executive the power to disapprove a line item or individual statement of the Government's allocation of funds to a particular purpose. This power would apply to appropriations contained in both acts and joint resolutions. However, this authority would not apply to appropriations for the legislative and judicial branches of the Government.

Further, under this measure, only a simple majority vote of each House would be necessary for the Congress to override an item veto, as opposed to the two-thirds vote normally required to reverse such a Presidential act.

As of this time, 43 States have this budgetary device available in some form. When I was Governor of South Carolina, the line-item veto proved to be a most useful fiscal tool. On January 25, 1984, President Reagan gave the concept of an item veto his endorsement in his state of the Union address. I, also, support it and believe it would be most helpful, particularly at this time when there is a great urgency to reduce Federal spending, for the President to have this authority.

On April 9, 1984, the Constitution Subcommittee of the Senate Judiciary Committee held a hearing on Senate Joint Resolution 26 and Senate Joint Resolution 178, line-item veto constitutional amendments, and S. 1921, A statutory proposal with a similar purpose, the latter two of which have been introduced by Senator MATTINGLY and which I have cosponsored. As a member of that subcommittee and chairman of the Judiciary Committee, I was pleased to participate in the hearing and to give my endorsement to this important legislation. As I indicated during the hearing, I support either the proposed constitutional amendment, which would have greater permanency, or the statutory approach, such as is embodied in the pending measure.

Since the statutory change can be enacted by simple majority vote of both Houses and signature of the President, it would seem to offer the most expeditious means of granting the President this enhanced authority over discretionary spending. I urge the Senate to act favorably on this important, much-needed change in the legislative process with respect to appropriations measures.

Mr. President, it has been said that billions of dollars could be saved if this line-item veto is passed. I would prefer the constitutional procedure, but I am not too sure we can get two-thirds of both bodies to submit that to the people for consideration and ratification.

We can pass this. We can try it out for 2 years. If it does not work, then we will let it expire. A majority of both bodies would be able to override the President. If you do not get a majority that would end it.

I see no harm in this. It might give us a testing ground, it might be a forum in which we can determine whether we should give the greater authority later and place this matter in the Constitution which then under Senate Joint Resolution 178, would require two-thirds vote to override. Now if we can just enact a statute in which a majority vote can override the President on a line item, we can decide later whether to go farther and put it in the Constitution.

It seems to me that the meritorious claim for this, that it will save billions of dollars, is certainly worth trying.

I remind the Senate again the budget had not been balanced but once in 23 years. If this will assist in helping us to get a balanced budget, I certainly think it is worth making a test out of it and trying it out.

I hope the Senate will see fit to pass this measure.

Mr. MATTINGLY. Mr. President, I think it is important to note a few other items.

First, I appreciate the Senator from South Carolina (Mr. THURMOND) cosponsoring and speaking on this legislation.

In addition, Mr. President, I wish to add Senator DIXON, Senator EVANS, and Senator EXON, as cosponsors, and ask unanimous to do so.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. MATTINGLY. As I said, Mr. President, I think it is important to note that the line-item veto would restore the balance of powers between the executive and legislative branches. Much of the President's constitutional veto power has been taken away by the congressional practice of passing continuing appropriations bills containing riders and other nongermane amendments.

Currently, Congress is subject to pressure from all manner of well-organized, vocal, and demanding special interest groups, all interested in continuing their favorite spending programs. Those interested in reducing the Federal spending are represented by no such lobbying group, meaning the taxpayer. Thus, the line-item veto will help to remedy that imbalance.

I wish to read a quotation from the late Senator Arthur Vandenberg. He said:

The line-item veto does not give the President one single additional, affirmative power. He cannot start anything as a result. He can only stop something long enough to focus the attention of the country on it.

Mr. President, I think faced with $200 billion deficits we have a plan before us, a deficit reduction plan of approximatly $145 billion over a 3-year period of time. It is however backloaded. If I am not mistaken there is something around somewhere between $15 billion and $20 billion in fiscal year 1985 in this deficit reduction package. That is not much. That borders on being insufficient.

I think putting the line-item veto in for 2 years, trying it, seeing if it will work, trying to apply it in this appropriations process would be one tool that we could use to help make certain that we do control the Federal budget, that we do control this defict.

Mr. President, I find it intriguing that some of the opponents of this proposal appear to be attacking it on the basis of its presumed constitutional deficiences rather than on its specific content and intent. The debate over its constitutionality is an interesting one and has been going on for some time.

With all due respect, I suggest that we will not be able to resolve that matter on the floor today, despite the fact that there appear to be worthy arguments on both sides of the issue. In particular, I bring to the attention of my colleagues the study conducted by the chairman of the House Judiciary Committee, Hatton W. Sumners, in 1938, in which Chairman Sumners studied the question of the constitutionality of an item veto through ordinary legislation and advised that he thought the power existed in Congress to enact a bill.

One might argue that by giving the line-item veto authority to the President, the Congress is merely ceding back to the Executive the constitutionally approved veto powers that to a great degree have been removed by the congressional practice of passing such legislative hybrids as continuing resolutions, omnibus appropriation bills, nongermane provisions, and similar items and thus making it next to impossible for the President to exercise his veto powers without shutting down Government agencies or creating similar disruptions.

Furthermore, some of those who have studied the question believe that the necessary and proper clause contained in article 1, section 7, clause 18 of the Constitution provides the authority needed to legislate a line-item veto.

But the question that we should be debating today is the $200 billion deficits reaching as far as the eye can see and what steps this Senate and this Congress is going to take to put our fiscal house in order. I am willing to let the constitutional questions be decided in their proper judicial forums: Is this Senate willing to make the critical decisions necessary to reduce ballooning deficits?

Mr. HATFIELD. Mr. President, I rise to oppose this amendment which would grant the President new authority to item veto appropriations. I have repeatedly spoken out against this notion and my views are hardly new at this time, but I am forced to restate them. I will be very brief and merely highlight what I believe to be the most fundamental reasons to reject this proposal.

A colleague of ours describes the line-item veto as "more power than a good man would want, and more than a bad man should have." This may be a little bit of hyperbole, but it is also, I believe, something that goes to the heart of the issue.

There can be no dispute that the line-item veto represents a significant grant of power to the Chief Executive at the expense of the legislative branch. And equally true at this time, and perhaps more arguable, is that there is no sound reason why this shift of power should be seriously considered and certainly none which outweighs the profound and untoward impact it may have.

First, it should be made clear in any discussion of the line-item veto that it is not a mechanism to achieve meaningful reductions of the Federal deficit.

Mr. President, I want to reiterate, this is totally false. Somehow we are reaching blindly for a way to control this deficit, and we have lost our sense of reason in doing so when we expect that the line-item veto is going to have any meaningful effect on this deficit. That is just false.

Proponents of this scheme play on a misperception of the composition of the Federal budget, either out of ignorance or out of the fact they do not want to face the truth.

The line-item veto cannot be applied against some of the largest and fastest growing portions of the budget, such as the permanently funded entitlement spending, which is $300 billion, and other mandatory costs, such as the interest on the Federal deficit, which will be $140 billion. Nor can this veto be used to reduce entitlements funded in annual appropriations acts, which represents another $100 billion.

These items, these few items that I have enumerated constitute about 55 percent of the total budget. Of the remaining 45 percent, two-thirds is defense spending. What is left, with less than 15 percent of the budget, is nondefense discretionary programs. That is a simple analysis of the budget.

This small fraction of the budget has always borne the brunt of spending reductions, and it is obvious that it will be the target of any line-item vetos. These activities include education assistance, community and regional development, law enforcement, environmental protection, health and safety research, securities and economic regulation, energy development and a host of other vital Federal responsibilities. They could all be eliminated and you still would have a substantial deficit. Furthermore, since there has been virtually no growth in this portion of the budget, reductions here will not curb the spiraling cost increases projected for Federal programs in future years.

That is an elementary, simple, almost childlike analysis of where we are and why this has absolutely no relevance to the proposition that somehow we are going to cure the deficit with this idea of a line-item veto for the President.

As a means to balance the Federal budget, the line-item veto is meaningless—but this is not to say that it has, I suppose, no scintilla of significance. In fact, it will make a substantial shift in the balance of power between the executive and the legislative branches of Government. That is the impact. It is not on the budget.

Currently, the President very effectively uses his veto power to enforce his aggregate budgetary plan on congressional spending bills. The line-item veto, however, will empower the President to go beyond simple control on overall spending, and allow him to virtually dictate spending priorities over individual programs and activities. With this power the President can frustrate a decision of the Congress on any individual program, be it for political or ideological reasons—or simply because of personal bias.

Now if that is what the Members want, why do they not review their role here in the Senate? Maybe they ought to go home and find a job in business or maybe they ought to go home and run for Governor. I think it is really ridiculous to think they want to be U.S. Senators unless they want only the title and be a figurehead and prance around and make fancy speeches. Maybe that is all they believe a Senator should do.

But if they believe in the Constitution, that there is a responsibility here in the Congress instead of trying to find someone else to blame and someone else to take the action and bite the bullet on the tough decisions on this budget, they ought to review their roles as a Senator.

Perhaps, more significantly, this is more than a question of who prevails on whether any particular activity is funded. The line-item veto has wide ranging ramifications on the gamut of decisions made by the Congress. We have all witnessed the power of the President when he lobbies Congress by telephone. It does not take much imagination to consider how much more persuasive he would be if his words were buttressed with a veto stamp over individual projects and activities within our States or districts.

Much has been made of the fact that 43 States currently grant their Governor some form of line-item veto authority. The argument here is that it works for the States and what works for the States ought to work for the Federal Government. I was a Governor for 8 years, and I had a line-item veto.

Without getting into the question of how well this authority works in the States, this rationale ignores the major differences between Federal and State responsibilities. The most obvious difference is simply the size and power of the Federal Government. The greater the scope and reach of the power the more critical it is that such power be held in check, balanced between the three, coequal, branches of Government.

Furthermore, unlike States, the Federal Government bears the responsibility for national defense, foreign policy, and broad-based social welfare entitlement activities like social security. States do not have this. These costs drastically alter the structure of the Federal budget from that of the States, so while a line item veto in the hands of a Governor could be used as an effective tool to make large budget reductions, such application at the Federal level is impossible.

Little concrete data is available on the actual effect that the line item veto has had in State budgeting. But what we do know is instructive. President Reagan, for example, reduced the California State budget by an average of less than 2 percent per year when he was Governor. If this rate of reduction were applied against the amount in the Federal budget for all nondefense discretionary programs, the projected Federal deficit would be reduced by only 1 percent. We also know that the legislatures in States which have the line-item veto routinely "pad" their budgets with projects which they expect or even want their Governors to veto. This is certainly not a practice which we would like to see in Congress, but if we abdicate our budget responsibilities to the President, should not he also take the blame as well?

Ten years have elapsed since the Congressional Budget Act was passed. That measure's principal goal was to make Congress more effective in its discharge of its constitutional role to control the purse strings of the Treasury. It is indeed ironic that 10 years later, when confronting the largest and most challenging budgetary problems ever, we find proponents of a scheme to diminish the responsibility of Congress over the budget. They would have us pass open ended shopping lists of spending items, to be culled through and selectively implemented by the President.

Mr. President, I am not arguing that the budget process we now employ in Congress is the best or the most effective in terms of assuring responsible spending decisions. Our difficulty in grappling with the current deficit is evidence enough of its shortcomings. But I am equally certain that the answer to our problems is not to delegate further responsibility to the executive branch. Our representative democracy should not and cannot risk such a concentration of power in one man. The prolonged and tortuous debate over the Federal budget reflects the enormous significance this issue has for our Nation. Let us get on with that debate, and put aside these notions of finding simple solutions to our budget problems.

Mr. President, the Mattingly amendment attempts to change the constitutionally established authority of the President to approve or disapprove legislation passed by the Congress, by a simple statutory device. This raises serious constitutional questions and while I am not a lawyer, I have grave doubts whether this amendment is a legally sound or permissible strategy, beyond the fundamental policy issues involved. Less than a year ago the Supreme Court affirmed the principle of Presidental presentment. That decision, I.N.S. against Chadha, struck down a wide variety of legislative veto statutes because they failed to provide for final legislative action at the time of presentment of a law to the President. The Mattingly amendment is merely a variation on that same constitutionally impermissible theme, and in effect, would allow Congress to veto what constitutes an impoundment of budget authority by the President.

Mr. President, I will recount briefly in closing that it is interesting to me that history is so poorly recalled, and so frequently forgotten. I can remember when the Congress was really sort of nothing but a rubberstamp to the President of the United States during the early part of the New Deal when the Republicans had 17 Members on this side. In fact, the Democrats went around this whole Chamber, and encircled the minority—that handful, stalwart bunch led by Oregon Senator McNary of 17 Republican Senators. That is all they had. The battle cry was Mr. Roosevelt had so much power that he was running the country singlehandedly, and they could not get much excitement about that until Roosevelt presented a proposal to pack the Supreme Court. Then some of those Democrats began to rise. Millard Tydings, Senator Russell, Senator George, and some of the other great constitutional lawyers of the South began to focus on this question of the balance of power between the legislative, the executive, and the judicial branches of government.

Let us remember our heritage. We hung to that small minority because we believed in the check and balance, and not to put everything into the hands of any President. This was Mr. Roosevelt sitting in the White House. What a cry would come up from this Chamber's Republican side.

The Democrats were trying to grant Mr. Roosevelt with more and more power. Here we are now with a delightful President, a Republican President, and one I support. But it is not a question of whether his name is Reagan, Roosevelt, or Republican, or Democrat. The question is the institutional question; that Congress was walked over, the Congress was a rubberstamp, the Congress was little other than an amen quarter for Mr. Roosevelt in his whole New Deal up until they began to realize that Congress had certain constitutional responsibilities.

Let us bear in mind that we are not trying to solve the budget problem here. It is really not honest to even raise this as a point to try to solve this budget problem.

Second, let us bear in mind that we have to look beyond the Republican President we trust with such power, and think in terms of Presidents that we may not have trusted in the past, or we might not trust in the future, and realize it is also not a question of just personal trust. It is a question of institutional checks and balances. We ought to bury this, forget it was ever even raised, and maybe ask for forgiveness for even having had such a thought.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Georgia.

Mr. MATTINGLY. Mr. President, I do not know how far I should respond to the chairman of the Appropriations Committee. He is a distinguished Senator and a friend. In his comments he referred to my honesty, and about the honest approach to this piece of legislation. He referred to it however as being a silly idea, and a simple solution. I think he suggested I go back home. I had written some of those comments myself. I was not however going to use them. So I am certainly glad he did, and I did not. But I would like to introduce for the RECORD an article in U.S. News & World Report, by Joseph Bower. He said, "Run the Federal Government Like a Business? Forget It." I would like to submit that for the RECORD.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

RUN THE FEDERAL GOVERNMENT LIKE A BUSINESS? FORGET IT

TWO DIFFERENT WORLDS OF MANAGEMENT

Business and political leaders have a hard time understanding each other because they operate in very different management systems. For the technocratic manager, the most pressing problem is getting the work done. The name of the game is efficiency. The legitimacy of businesses is grounded in their performance.

In politics, by contrast, the goal is to get consensus, not to achieve efficiency. The political system works on the distribution of costs and benefits. It's a world in which fairness and accountability, not return on investment, are key. Politicians have to explain themselves to the public, and it is what the public thinks that counts.

MECHANISMS FOR DEALING WITH REAL PROBLEMS

The higher the level of elected government, the less likely it will be efficient. The top levels shouldn't be given jobs that require efficiency. Just as in a big company, you've got to push decision making closer to the market. In many ways, you can't make government more efficient except by getting parts of it out of Washington. You can't run anything that big that well, and its limited ability is needed for macroeconomic policy, foreign policy and defense. Though local government is not always efficient either, it is more likely to be.

In order to get more efficiency, you need a certain stability in what government is trying to achieve. But the last two decades have seen a tremendous shifting of goals. Adding to the problem is turnover at the top. Several thousand key people come and go with each administration. When people change jobs in companies, the enterprises run extensive programs of acculturation. A lot of effort is made to bring people together socially so they know each other and know that they play on the same team. But in government what would happen if you took 50 senior managers to a nice place, let them eat decent food for a while and socialize—and work didn't dominate 92 percent of the agenda? It would be a scandal!

Despite all of its problems, government does give us mechanisms for dealing with real problems. The U.S. is very heterogeneous. Parts of the country are now Spanish speaking and have a totally different attitude than, let's say, New England. Government provides a way of trading those disparate interests and keeping us together, and it does respond. It's quite remarkable.

WHEN WALL STREET GOES TO WASHINGTON

When businessmen go into government, the differences in management approaches between the two spheres can lead to difficulties. I don't know that anybody has made a systematic survey of how business leaders have fared in Washington, but my sense is that those who come from manufacturing and service backgrounds have not had a very good record.

Businessmen out of Wall Street, however, have had remarkable success because they are accustomed to a deal-to-deal, day-to-day way of doing things. That's much closer to political management than the chemical or auto industries, where you make a decision today that's going to work out five years from now.

SACRIFICING EFFICIENCY FOR "DEMOCRATIC VALUES"

At the top of the corporate structure, the work is more like that of managing a political organization than at middle-management levels. In a healthy company, there are constituencies both within the organization and outside of it. The head of such a company is constantly aware of the need to mobilize those who will support him and try to meet their needs—or at the very least keep at arm's length those who can block the accomplishment of goals.

Still, the head of a corporation is given a lot more leeway than a political leader. The presumption is that affected constituencies give up a lot of democratic values to let corporate heads get on with it—unless they really make a mess of things—whereas in government we'd rather see a mess of things than give up democratic values.

Mr. MATTINGLY. I will quote from the article. He says, "When businessmen go into Government, the differences in management approaches between the two spheres can lead to difficulties." I guess that is the difference between a professional politician and somebody who has not been in politics all their life, and comes into this arena from the private sector.

He went on in the last paragraph—and said, "Still, the head of a corporation is given a lot more leeway than a political leader. The presumption is that affected constituencies give up a lot of democratic values to let corporate heads get on with it—unless they really make a mess of things—whereas in Government we would rather see a mess of things rather than give up democratic values."

The bottom line, Mr. President, irrespective of whether you like the amendment, support it or do not support it, or you think it is a simple solution or a complicated solution, or whether you think it is a shift of power—there is a lot of fear in people about something they have not seen before in the Federal Government. But I think what the overriding question again is what are we going to do about the deficit. Nobody has said the line-item veto would dissipate a $200 billion deficit.

But this approach is to try to get a technique into Government practice to try to impose responsible spending by the Federal Government. This is just one tool. If we used it, that could lead to responsible action by the U.S. Congress. And the solution is simple enough. It only requires a majority override.

Once again, as I said in the beginning, what it does is focus the attention of the public, and the attention of the Congress like a magnifying glass upon different items in the Federal budget that would not be brought out in the open unless that focus or attention was directed to it. That is the purpose of this legislation. That is the purpose of trying to control spending by our Government.

Mr. President, speaking from experience, I can state that one of the problems facing those Americans who are in fact currently involved in the business sector, and who daily struggle in the marketplace, are the enormous problems created by the Federal spending that has run amuck. It appears to have defied all attempts at using the tools to impose control. As I stated earlier, it is time to move in some new directions with such useful tools as the line-item veto.

Thank you, Mr. President.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Washington.

Mr. HATFIELD. Will the Senator yield for a question?

Mr. MATTINGLY. Yes.

Mr. HATFIELD. If the Senator thinks this is another important tool for the control of the budget, would the Senator be willing to amend his amendment to include the line-item veto for the President on revenue measures?

Mr. MATTINGLY. It is probably worth discussing.

Mr. HATFIELD. Pardon?

Mr. MATTINGLY. It is probably worth discussing.

Mr. HATFIELD. If the Senator would not oppose it, would the Senator consider entertaining an amendment to his amendment for that purpose?

Mr. MATTINGLY. No; I do not believe this amendment is amendable. It is not amendable.

Mr. HATFIELD. I thank the Senator.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Washington.

Mr. EVANS. Mr. President, I listened with great interest to the Senator from Oregon, my colleague. He suggested that perhaps his colleagues here in the Senate ought to go back home and run for Governor. Mr. President, I did that three times. During the first 2 years of my service, I had the privilege of serving as a neighbor to the distinguished Senator from Oregon as neighboring Governors.

There is a difference between this Congress and State legislatures, between a President and a Governor. But what I find most disturbing is the fact that we here in Congress lay on the President's desk huge trainloads of pork attached to vital pieces of legislation. We make it almost impossible for a President to veto what is absolutely necessary to carry on the operations of Government, but may be required to sign that legislation and accept a whole series of expenditures which could not stand on their own merits.

If we are frightened by the concept of a line-item veto, then it seems to me that this Congress, and particularly the Senate, might well be more careful in insisting on the germaneness of amendments to pieces of legislation before this body. That question of germaneness is constantly brought to the fore, at least in the State Legislature of Washington. With the Governor having line-item veto authority, which serves as a check for germaneness, he is seldom presented a bill that is not clear and consistent and within the framework of the title under which it passed.

The suggestion has been made by the Senator from Oregon that this is not an effective tool, that it only applies to a small piece of the budget. He also suggests that it is a major shift in the relative responsibility between the Congress and the President.

I think that he overlooks something that is terribly important. That is, this amendment is in the nature of a trial. It sunsets after 2 years. If it does not work, we do not have a permanently disabling piece of legislation under which we must live. If it does not work, we simply do not extend this legislation.

But if we try it and if it does work, and if it has the effect even of a small tool in helping bring this as well as future budgets under control, then I suspect this Congress might well continue such a proposal. Perhaps on a 2-year basis, so that Congress would always retain control as to whether it continued or died, but would allow a President the privilege and the opportunity of using this small tool, in conjunction with others, to bring our budget deficits under control.

I do not think there is anyone in this body who believes that in the next 2 years we are going to attain a balanced budget. But if this tool works; then in 3 years, 4 years, 6 years, or 10 years from now it may well be continued and, in being continued, offer some future administration and some future President an opportunity to deal with, perhaps, a broader spectrum within the budget than that which the current administration might be interested.

Let me just reiterate in closing that it is only a trial, it is only for 2 years. It gives us the opportunity to see if it works. If it does not, it gives us the opportunity to cast it aside. But if it does work, to be more certain at the end of 2 years whether this provision is worth continuing: not just for the present, not just for this administration, not just for this Congress, but for the future.

Mr. DOMENICI addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from New Mexico.

Mr. DOMENICI. Mr. President, it is my understanding that if there are no other Senators who desire to speak—does the Senator from Georgia know of other Senators who want to speak in favor?

Mr. MATTINGLY. No; but I wanted to have an opportunity to present concluding remarks.

Mr. DOMENICI. I will speak for about 5 minutes and then my good friend from Mississippi will speak. Then perhaps the Senator from Georgia can conclude.

Mr. STENNIS. Mr. President, may we have quiet?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senate will be in order.

Mr. DOMENICI. Mr. President, I am not going to speak very long. We have had this issue before us on a number of occasions. It has always failed to pass. We have had a much more elaborate proposal by the distinguished Senator from Colorado and it did not pass. We had a line-item constitutional amendment and it did not pass. We had a legislative line-item proposal and it did not pass. Frankly, I do not think this ought to pass today either.

First of all, I am convinced that it is unconstitutional. I do not agree at all with my good friend, the junior Senator from Illinois, that something as patently unconstitutional as this ought to be passed anyway, by using the analogy that in his State a tax law for years was used in one way and then used the other way and the courts said it was all right.

Clearly, the framers of our Constitution did not have this in mind. One might argue that if they knew what kind of government we have today they might have had a different U.S. Constitution. Perhaps. But we address that issue all the time. That is what constitutional amendments are all about.

When you read the simple language of the U.S. Constitution with reference to this, it says, "Every bill * * * shall * * * be presented to the President of the United States; if he approves he shall sign it but if not he shall return it."

I just cannot believe that that means line item veto. In fact, I have looked over this legislation and I do not know what it will mean if the President has the line-item veto. What is the "item?" We do not have things called items. Read the defense appropriations bills and see if you can find what the items are. There are some items that are so long that the whole bill could be called an item. Maybe it means he can edit it, that he can go through it and put in parentheses or strike something where we do not write English too well. That sounds like a line item. I do not think the Senator has that in mind because that will not reduce the deficit.

On the other hand, I do not think this proposal will reduce the deficit substantially either.

I would like to ask the Senator from Georgia a question: Are defense appropriations included in this?

Mr. MATTINGLY. Yes.

Mr. DOMENICI. I was thinking that if I were to propose and argue for a line-item veto, it would involve the item of defense because this President might use it on some things that we put in which the military would not want, and that veto would stick. I would congratulate the Senator from Georgia for including it, but that would not change my mind. If you pick up a couple of weapons systems that we might put in because we like jobs and not because it is what the military needs, the President might fix those up.

On the other hand, the arguments have been made as to why it really will have very little effect. There is not that much Federal spending which is appropriated other than defense, in terms of percentages. Nobody would argue that it applies to entitlements like social security, medicare, medicaid. Nobody would argue that it applies to any of the pension programs. So it is pretty obvious to me it is not going to have any serious effect on this growing deficit.

I really do believe, however, that it has the potential for dramatic change in the relationship between the President and Congress. Frankly, I am not ready to make that change in a statute. I think it clearly speaks for a constitutional amendment if we want to do it at all. The country ought to have a full debate across this land about what that might mean in terms of Congress and its powers to tax and appropriate, and how they relate to the President's.

I also think it is very interesting to note that the distinguished chairman of the Committee on Appropriations raised the issue of taxes and suggested that perhaps line-item vetoes should be involved in revenue bills. He was talking about a very interesting concept. If we are talking about spending money, many think that every tax bill that comes along has a type of pork in it. We talk about pork here as if the only pork is a bridge or a street. You know, when you put all those little loopholes in there, that is in effect spending tax dollars. Should the President have the right to veto those? I do not know. Frankly, I am not for that, either, but I just raise the point.

I think the proposal is unconstitutional; I think it is unclear; I think it has the potential for dramatically shifting the relationship between the President and the Congress.

I was thinking the other day, not that the President who is currently in the White House would ever have done anything like this, but when we had the Panama Canal question, there arose an interesting question. I was one of those who thought about it a long time. It seems to me that the line-item veto in the hands of a President with a Panama Canal Treaty, needing one or two votes, could produce some rather dramatic results. I would like to point out that my State is tremendously dependent on the Federal Government because we have all the national labs that provide services for the entire country. I could enumerate, but it would take a long time. I am not implying that anybody would do anything about those. I am not so sure I would like Presidents to be able to look over those facilities, especially when they have favorite legislation down here they would like me to consider.

In summary, I do not think we ought to vote for the proposal, but I also think we ought to decide ourselves here today whether we think it is constitutional or not. There is such a process, there is a way to propose a line-item veto that would be constitutional, and I hope somebody does that and that we pass judgment on it.

Just remember, the language of the Constitution is so clear. Then we have this amendment that says, "Send it to the President, and if he vetoes it by line item, whatever that means, it comes back over here and a simple majority could put that item back in whole or in part." I think that is really a rather strange process. Clearly, the Constitution did not envision it. I do not think it will work, so I think we ought to dispose of the question rather quickly.

I yield the floor, Mr. President.

Mr. STENNIS. Mr. President, the time is not controlled, is that correct?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator is correct.

Mr. STENNIS. I shall be very brief, Mr. President.

We have had a wonderful debate here the last few days on these different plans that are submitted, one by the President of the United States, another one by the Senator from South Carolina, a member of the Budget Committee, another plan by the Senator from Florida (Mr. CHILES) also a valued member of the Budget Committee, and one by the chairman of the Budget Committee, the Senator from New Mexico, who is opposed to this proposal.

Having really gotten into this meritorious debate, one of the the best I have ever heard here, frankly, we stop now and go to arguing about the legislative proposal tacked onto this budget question, reconciliation and so forth, setting out a plan, one might say, of how to veto a bill or an item in the bill. Let us see what the Constitution of the United States is. With all deference to the author, and he is a very valuable Member of this body and a hard worker, I do not believe this proposal touches top, side, or botton of the real Constitution that we have and live under.

The Constitution provides that all revenue bills shall originate in the House of Representatives, period. That is clear and unmistakable, that they meant at least everything those words say. That is the way the Government operated, totally that way, for a long time, as I understand. In the House of Representatives, the bills raising revenue and the bills appropriating the money were all handled by the same committee. They were jealous and they are still jealous of that power, the sole power of originating an appropriations bill. I think they have a basis for it. I have always been on their side in maintaining that as part of the Constitution.

They finally created a second committee on the general subject, with the understanding that the new committee, which is now called the House Appropriations Committee, would be considered a revenue committee for those purposes and things would go on the same way, that the House has the authority, the only authority, to originate a bill of that kind. We respect that generally. I am not meaning it violates the law; it is no violation, but it is an abrogation of the law. We cannot turn aside in one of the times of peril to our Nation, and that is what is in reference to these fiscal affairs, a time of peril, not only in my opinion but in the opinion of people like Mr. Volcker and others who have basic knowledge and background and experience in that field. Mr. Volcker said we are fast approaching a position of a debtor nation.

With deference again to the author of this amendment and those who might favor it, I do not think there is any doubt that it does not have a constitutional thread in it, that it is something that has some appeal that maybe this will help balance the budget and maybe it will be a step that will help out. There has been no hearing on it, not on this identical proposal. There has been no committee consideration of it. There has been no special study of it made by people who are versed in the field, including Members of this body.

Right here, when we are in a critical time, a crucial time, I suggest that we dispose of this amendment when all speak who wish to, forthwith dispose of it, and get on with the passage of this highly important legislation. It will be all right to come back to this in a formal way sometime.

I thank the Chair.

● Mr. LEVIN. Mr. President, I support substantial deficit reduction. I voted for the Hollings budget plan which would produce a deficit almost $100 billion lower in fiscal year 1987 than the President's most recent proposal. This was real deficit reduction through a program of shared sacrifice.

The proposal we have before us now to give the President a line-item veto should be unnecessary and would be unwise. It should be unnecessary because the President already has the primary budgetary power—he proposes the budget in the first place. If he wants to have a budget which substantially restrains spending, he already has the power to propose a budget which sets the benchmark against which that restraint can be measured. It is somewhat disingenuous for a President to propose budgets with $200 billion deficits and then claim that he needs a line-item veto to restrain spending on the grounds that Congress is fiscally irresponsible. In a very real sense, the buck not only stops at the White House—it begins there as well.

The line-item veto would also be an unwise step because it would make Congress less accountable and would be a substantial shift of power to the executive branch. It would allow Congress to abdicate its responsibility in budgetmaking while at the same time it frees the President from the need to compromise as he participates in the process. It is clear from all the budget proposals which we have looked at during this debate as well as the ones which have yet to be offered, that substantial deficit reduction will require sacrifice and possibly pain. If this is the case, the Members of Congress should be forced to put their names on the line in support of spending reductions. They should not be able to hide behind the President's line-item veto when asked by their constituents why one spending reduction or another took place. Otherwise, Members of Congress could pass all the spending programs they wanted, please whatever constituencies they wanted, and then leave the dirty work up to the President. However, this would not be consistent with responsible or accountable government.

At the same time, giving the President the line-item veto would give him a preeminent, if not unassailable, position in the budget process. All the Members of the Congress have to compromise when it comes to spending bills. Within a particular bill, there are frequently some projects or programs which they prefer, some to which they are neutral, and some which they outright oppose. In the last case, Members always have the opportunity to offer amendments to strike those provisions. But if they fail with these amendments, they must analyze the bill and weigh the good against the bad, and cast their vote. The line-item veto would exempt the President from this process. He alone would be able to pick and choose and enact his preferences without compromise. Further, reversing his veto of particular projects which affect only one or two congressional districts may very well be impossible, even if it is a majority veto as provided for by the Mattingly amendment.

A line-item veto would, thus, neither be an appropriate nor wise solution to our budgetary crisis.●

Mr. MATTINGLY and Mr. BAKER addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The majority leader.

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, first, I congratulate the distinguished Senator from Georgia for his good work. He is a valued Member of this body, the Senate, and of the committee on which he serves. I think his effort here is another example of his initiative and good thought on how to get the budget situation under control. But, Mr. President, I have three points to make; then I shall state that I shall not support this amendment. If a point of order is made, which I expect it will be, I intend to support the point of order.

The first point is a little story that does not take long to tell. I believe it really happened, but if if did not, it should have. I am told that at the time we passed the War Powers Act, the President of the United States called in one of his advisers and said, "I have got to decide whether to veto this or sign it."

His adviser, who told me this story and whom I shall not identify, said, "Let us see, Mr. President; the Constitution says here that you are Commander in Chief. Is that right?"

The President said, "Yes."

"And you are manager of the foreign policy of the United States?"

He said, "Yes, that is right, too."

"And this act apparently either removes part of that authority or limits it. Is that correct?"

He said, "Well, it appears to."

The adviser said, "Mr. President, what I would recommend you do is don't either sign it or veto it, but send a nice note back to the Congress and say, 'Gentlemen, thank you for your interesting idea.' "

The point is, Mr. President, that there is a doctrine of the separation of powers. One of the powers that is separated is the power to appropriate money.

As the Senator from Mississippi pointed out, it is vested in the House to originate such measures and the Senate to concur or to decline to concur and the President to approve or disapprove. It is a nice symmetry, and it has worked pretty well. But if we get into a line-item veto, I believe we have created a new constitutional power, and that is the power of a President to originate and appropriate an item, or the equivalent of that.

Now, my President does not agree with that. He argues with me at leadership meetings at the White House about it, but we remain good friends on most issues. And someday I may regret saying this. It may be someday that I will have a different view on what a President ought to be able to do, perhaps not. But right now I feel constrained to tell you really what I think, and what I think is this is a bad idea.

Now, let me tell you something else, Mr. President. This proposal, as I understand it, says that the President can veto an item, a line item. I will promise you, Mr. President, that I do not care whether it is Senator STENNIS or Senator HATFIELD, Republican or Democrat, who is chairman of the Appropriations Committee; one way or the other they will get around that. The way which occurs to me, just off the top of my head, is every appropriation bill from now on, if this were to pass, would have one item, just one line. It might have a lot of exhibits and references. But I will promise you that will not work.

The third item, Mr. President, I would make is I do, indeed, think that by this amendment we are attempting to deal with a constitutional issue in a statutory form. That is what prompted my story about the War Powers Act.

I do not think we can do that. I think you could by constitutional amendment. Maybe I would have a different view of that. But I am convinced, Mr. President, we are dealing with an item that violates the fundamental tenents of the Constitution in this respect, and that if a point of order is made on the constitutionality of this proposed statute, it should be sustained.

Mr. MATTINGLY addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Georgia is recognized.

Mr. MATTINGLY. In conclusion, nobody can be more eloquent than our majority leader, of course, but I would like to make a couple of brief comments to what the Senator from New Mexico said in reference to this amendment.

If we look at last year, we did not have one single appropriation bill vetoed by the President of the United States, and there were some bills that were over the budget. If we had had a line-item veto, I am certain that many in this body would have seen the President use that line-item veto authority.

The Senator from New Mexico said he would not be able to figure out what an item is on that appropriation bill, but I think most people would understand what an item is. I do not think you would end up with just one big item, no matter what he may say. The Senate does not move that fast where you could conjure up everything into one big item. They have not figured out how to put the M-1 tank in with the F-16, although I figure they might be able to do it within a few years.

The Senator from New Mexico also made a comment about we need a debate across the land. There is a debate now going on across our land. That debate is, "What is Congress going to do about the deficit?"

Well, we need to use every tool that we can, and once again that is the purpose of the line-item veto.

As far as the constitutionality of this issue today, that is what we have the courts for. Let the courts decide if this amendment is constitutional or not.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Florida is recognized.

Mr. CHILES. Mr. President, I raise a point of order that the bill is legislation which changes the Constitution of the United States.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair advised the Senator from Florida that under Practices and Precedents of Senate Procedure the Chair does not have the power to pass on such a point of order. The Chair, therefore, under the precedents of the Senate submits the question to the Senate: Is it in order to offer such an amendment to the pending bill? That point of order is debatable.

Mr. CHILES. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there a sufficient second? There is a sufficient second.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. MATTINGLY. Mr. President, I move to table the point of order. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there a sufficient second? There is a sufficient second.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The assistant legislative clerk called the roll.

Mr. STEVENS. I announce that the Senator from Florida (Mrs. HAWKINS), the Senator from Alaska (Mr. MURKOWSKI), and the Senator from Wyoming (Mr. WALLOP) are necessarily absent.

Mr. CRANSTON. I announce that the Senator from Texas (Mr. BENTSEN), the Senator from Ohio (Mr. GLENN), the Senator from Colorado (Mr. HART), the Senator from South Carolina (Mr. HOLLINGS), the Senator from Arkansas (Mr. PRYOR), and the Senator from Massachusetts (Mr. TSONGAS) are necessarily absent.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. SPECTER). Are there any other Senators in the Chamber who wish to vote?

The result was announced—yeas 45, nays 46, as follows:

[Rollcall Vote No. 86 Leg.]

YEAS—45

Abdnor	Goldwater	Nunn
Armstrong	Grassley	Percy
Biden	Hecht	Pressler
Boren	Heinz	Proxmire
Boschwitz	Helms	Quayle
Chafee	Humphrey	Roth
Cochran	Jepsen	Simpson
D'Amato	Kassebaum	Specter
Denton	Kasten	Stevens
Dixon	Laxalt	Symms
Dole	Leahy	Thurmond
East	Lugar	Trible
Evans	Mattingly	Warner
Exon	McClure	Wilson
Garn	Nickles	Zorinsky

NAYS—46

Andrews	Danforth	Huddleston
Baker	DeConcini	Inouye
Baucus	Dodd	Johnston
Bingaman	Domenici	Kennedy
Bradley	Durenberger	Lautenberg
Bumpers	Eagleton	Levin
Burdick	Ford	Long
Byrd	Gorton	Mathias
Chiles	Hatch	Matsunaga
Cohen	Hatfield	Melcher
Cranston	Heflin	Metzenbaum

Mitchell	Riegle	Stennis
Moynihan	Rudman	Tower
Packwood	Sarbanes	Weicker
Pell	Sasser
Randolph	Stafford

NOT VOTING—9

Bentsen	Hawkins	Pryor
Glenn	Hollings	Tsongas
Hart	Murkowski	Wallop

So the motion to lay on the table the point of order was rejected.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is, is it in order to offer this amendment to this bill?

On this question, the yeas and nays have been ordered, and the clerk will call the roll.

Several Senators addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The majority leader is recognized.

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the yeas and nays on the point of order be vitiated.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Tennessee?

Mr. McCLURE. Mr. President, I object.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Objection is heard.

Mr. LEAHY. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

Mr. MATTINGLY. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

Mr. RANDOLPH. Mr. President, Members cannot hear what is going on in the well of the Senate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The bill clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, I withdraw my request.

Mr. RANDOLPH. Mr. President, will someone please tell Senators who are seated what is going on in the well of the Senate?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. A quorum call is in progress.

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, I withdraw my unanimous-consent request. Would the Chair restate the matter pending before the Senate?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The request has been made for a restatement of the pending question.

The question is: Is the point of order well taken? The yeas and nays have been ordered, and the clerk will call the roll.

Mr. DIXON. Mr. President, a point of inquiry. My friend and colleague from Florida has raised a question of whether this is, in fact, in violation of the Constitution. Was that the ruling of the Chair?

Mr. BAKER. The Chair does not rule on that.

Mr. DIXON. On a prior occasion, it was my understanding that the Senator from Florida had asked for that ruling from the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Under the precedents and practices of the Senate, the Chair has no power or authority to pass on such a point of order raising a violation of the Constitution of the United States.

Mr. DIXON. So the question is for each Senator as to whether it is in violation of the Constitution, or ultimately the question for the courts, is that right?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Under the practices of the Senate, the Chair submits the question to the Senate. The Chair did that and there was a motion to table the point of order and the motion to table failed.

Mr. DIXON. Mr. President, may I be heard briefly on the question?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The point of order submitted to the Senate is debatable. The Senator from Illinois is recognized.

Mr. DIXON. Mr. President, I just want to briefly state what I said on a prior occasion in supporting my friend, the Senator from Georgia, and that is this: The Chair has not ruled on this question and the court has not ruled on this question.

We have a $1.5 trillion national debt, and we are trying to convince the people of this Nation that we want to do something about it. It is therefore a reasonable idea to pass this amendment, and let it be a question for the Supreme Court of the United States as to whether you can legislatively address this problem.

Now, you can keep on sweeping these things under the desks, but the question of a line item and reduction veto power is going to be before us as long as there is burgeoning national debt, which is increasing at the rate of almost $200 billion a year as far as the eye can see.

Now, you can go home once or twice and say that this is not anything but a procedural question, but that is a lot of baloney. This is a substantive question about how to balance this budget.

Let every Senator understand, this Presiding Officer has not ruled on this question. It is up to 100 Senators about whether this violates the Constitution.

I urge my colleagues to oppose the point of order raised by the Senator from Florida.

Mr. BAKER addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The majority leader is recognized.

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, I hope we will get on. Let me frame the question now. We are not voting on the merits of the proposal. We are voting on the point of order made by the Senator from Florida that this amendment violates the Constitution of the United States.

It is true that the Supreme Court of the United States can review and pass on the enactments of the Congress, but it is equally true, and the precedent is just as old, that the Senate of the United States must first exercise its own judgment as to whether a matter before it conforms with or violates the Constitution. It is a precedent as old as the Republic.

Mr. President, I submit that this does. I hope that the point of order will be sustained.

Several Senators addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from New Mexico.

Mr. DOMENICI. Mr. President, the distinguished majority leader is correct. I would say to the Senate the point of order specifically is very easy to understand and does not address the substantive issue of a line-item veto. It is this: Is this legislation changing the Constitution of the United States? The Constitution states:

> Every bill . . . shall . . . be presented to the President of the United States; if he approves, he shall sign it, but if not he shall return it.

It is a rather overwhelming proposition to change that with a line-item veto. We may want to do that some day, but the issue here is whether you do it with a piece of legislation that patently flies in the face of the Constitution. That is the point of order. Are you changing the Constitution?

Mr. DIXON. Will the chairman yield for a question on that?

Several Senators addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from New Mexico has the floor.

Mr. DOMENICI. I yield the floor.

Mr. CHILES addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Florida.

Mr. CHILES. Mr. President, the Senator from North Carolina, Mr. Ervin, a fine constitutional lawyer, had a statement he was fond of. He said, "I understand English. It is my mother's tongue." And if you can understand English, you can read the language in here and it says:

> Every bill which shall have passed the House of Representatives and the Senate, shall, before it becomes a law, be presented to the President of the United States; if he approve he shall sign it, but if not he shall return it.

Now, that is just about as clear as it can possibly be. If you think the deficit is too big and you want to overrule the Constitution of the United States, fine. If you want to do anything else if the end justifies the means, fine. But if you can read your mother tongue, you will know that this is unconstitutional.

Mr. MATTINGLY addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Georgia.

Mr. MATTINGLY. Mr. President, I think everybody knows we are not going to vitiate the yeas and nays; that we are going to have another vote on it.

The Senator from Illinois put it very clearly. You have a $200 billion deficit out there. The vote was 46 to 45 on the previous vote.

You are not talking about it being a constitutional question. What you are talking about is whether you are going to try to control the Federal spending of this Government. That is what it is. That is the botton line. You can talk about doing it in the same old way. Well, the same old way "ain't" been working.

Now, what we are trying to do is put a new tool, and now you constitutional lawyers are talking about this as not having any impact on the budget because it only impacts just a small part. If it impacts just a small part, then let us try it.

Mr. DIXON addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator form Illinois.

Mr. DIXON. Mr. President, I want to ask by distinguished friend, the ranking Member on this side, the Senator from Florida, if either he or my colleague, the distinguished former Supreme Court judge from Alabama, or any Senator can cite one single case in America that says what we are trying to do is unconstitutional. Everybody knows that there is settled law on many, many questions. There is no case on this question.

Mr. CHILES. The Senator is right. It is so clear that no court, from a justice of the peace on, has ever had to rule on it.

Mr. DIXON. Well, if my colleague thinks that any protion of the law is so clear, then that amazes me, as a practicing attorney who practiced for many years.

This question of law is unsettled. The only question is whether we have the courage to let the Supreme Court of the United States decide. This Senate is not the place where 100 separate Senators make that kind of judicial decision, and we desperately need to reduce these deficits.

Mr. EVANS. Will the Senator yield?

Several Senators addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Illinois yield?

Mr. DIXON. Yes; I yield.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Illinois still has the floor and has yielded for a question from the Senator from Washington.

Mr. EVANS. Mr. President, not being an attorney, I seek the advice of the distinguished Senator from Illinois. Everyone is talking about whether or not this proposal is constitutional. We have just heard an exchange which indicates that no court has ruled on the question.

Is it possible for a court to overrule on this question unless Congress takes action, puts the bill into effect to see whether the court can say it is constitutional?

Mr. DIXON. Well, there may be possibilities for doing that under other methods. But the best method, may I say to the Senator as a Member who is a lawyer, is to pass legislation and let the Supreme Court of the United States determine that.

There are people here that would argue that the War Powers Act is unconstitutional. They say that is a clear case of something that flies in the face about what the Constitution says about the President being the Commander in Chief. But this Senate passed a War Powers Act and the Constitution has never been challenged yet by the Supreme Court of the United States.

I say to my friend from Washington that until such time as we pass legislation there is no determination about whether we can constitutionally do this. I say to my friend from Washington as a lawyer that I have doubts and reservations about whether we can do it. But I want to do something to reduce our budget deficits. I want to pass this amendment, send it to the House, have them pass it, have the President sign it, and let the Supreme Court decide whether it is constitutional to do this.

Mr. EVANS. I agree with the Senator from Illinois, and I thank the Senator from Illinois.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Alabama.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. President, I notice in this bill there is the provision that in the event Congress wishes to override the veto of the President, it provides for a majority vote. The Constitution provides for a two-thirds vote to override a President's veto. I believe there is a difference in fractions. The President has requested a legislative veto. He requested it in the form of a constitutional amendment. I think that clearly reflects the views of the people that have studied it. Therefore, I think is not proper.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Montana.

Mr. MELCHER. Mr. President, very briefly since we are discussing the substance of the issue as the Senator from Illinois has eloquently described, and the Senator from Georgia has proposed, it ought to be recognized that this Congress during the past several years has cut the President's budget. A line-item veto allows the budgetmakers to veto. The President is not going to be the one that makes vetoes of small amounts. It is going to be the Office of Management and Budget, or one of the Federal agencies, that is going to make the small line item vetoes to make it conform to what their budget was when it was submitted, even though Congress has cut their budget below the total amounts.

So much for the argument that we have the huge deficit, and we have to do something about it. We do something about it every Congress. We have been cutting those budgets. But the real question on the substance is can somebody in the Office of Management and Budget—or one of the agencies who really does not care and does not want a small irrigation project, a small water project—have the opportunity for a line-item veto that might have been worked in the Senate for 6 or 8 years before it was finally appropriated, and finally gained enough votes out of both the Senate and the House to get in the appropriation bill.

I ask my friends who proposed this whether they really have considered what happens to some of these agricultural appropriations that finally get into a bill, whether it is on one of the nutrition programs such as summer feeding programs for youth, or whether it is on soil conservation.

These are small items. They do not get the President's attention. They get the attention of the bureaucracy. That is where a line item veto really, truly lies and where the benefit is, if there is a benefit. I do not subscribe that there is a benefit to this on balance because for the most part it will knock out small items that Members of both the House and the Senate have worked on for a long time—years in many instances—to have an appropriation bill contain the amount necessary to carry out the will of Congress.

I would just as soon vote on the substance myself. But it patently is unconstitutional, and for those who want to have that opportunity for the President, they should submit a constitutional amendment so it would be valid. But on the substance of it, I say, no.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Washington.

Mr. GORTON. Mr. President, I must say that I find the arguments made by the Senator from Illinois and the Senator from Georgia profoundly disturbing. It seems to be their position not that the proposal for this amendment is constitutional. I have not heard either of them make any argument in the form that they claim it is constitutional. The most that has been stated by the Senator from Illinois is that because Congress has never tried this before, because therefore there has not been a court decision on it, we ought to go ahead with it even in the face of the plain words of the Constitution, because the substantive issue involved is important.

That argument goes to the proposition that, if Congress is frustrated and does not feel it can solve the problem in one way within the Constitution of the United States, it may ignore the Constitution. It may ignore the necessity to amend the Constitution in a particular fashion. It is analogous to going before a U.S. district court, or even a U.S. court of appeals, and saying to the judges of that court because you do not have the final authority to interpret the Constitution, because your judgment may be appealed, go ahead and do this good idea, come up with a judgment in favor of me because I have a good idea, and, if you are wrong on the Constitution, you can be reversed by the Supreme Court of the United States.

I say quite profoundly to the Senator from Illinois and the Senator from Georgia that you swore an oath, as I did, when you became Members of this body to uphold the Constitution of the United States. You cannot hide behind the fact that the Supreme Court of the United States has final authority on constitutional questions. You cannot hide behind that proposition to ignore your own duty properly to interpret the Constitution, which you have inherited after 200 years of history. It is your duty to make a judgment as to whether or not this amendment is constitutional.

If you can in good faith say you believe that it is, you can vote in the way which the Senator from Illinois has made a claim. But to duck your responsibility on the ground that sometime, at some future date, the Supreme Court will have final authority over the question is to ignore the oath which you swore when you became a Member of this body.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Maryland.

Mr. SARBANES. Mr. President, I agree completely with the distinguished Senator from the State of Washington, who has just spoken. I hope Members will stop for a moment, and think very seriously about the issue that is before us. No one I have heard has advanced any case containing any reasonable argument that this legislative proposal before us is constitutional. It clearly alters the Constitution. If that is to be done, you need a constitutional amendment. Then we are told there is no case making that point.

The distinguished Senator from Florida is absolutely right. The reason there is no case is that the proposition is so patently unconstitutional that it has never been put. Suppose someone submitted a legislative proposal to change the term of the President to 2 years, or the Senate to four, or the House to three. Suppose I put in that legislative proposal; then say, well, the Supreme Court has never ruled on this question.

There has never been a case saying that a statute changing the term of the President of the United States to 2 years is unconstitutional, and, therefore, you ought to pass this legislation changing the President's term to 2 years, and let the Supreme Court of the United States decide the case.

What happens to our own responsibility to make a judgment to uphold the Constitution, and make a judgment with respect to whether a proposition before us has any slim claim to constitutional validity? That is the issue that is put here. The Senator from Florida is absolutely right, in my judgment, to press a point of order. I hope the Members of this body will support that point of order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Arkansas.

Mr. BUMPERS. Mr. President, I can only echo what the distinguished Senator from Washington and the distinguished Senator from Maryland have said. This is a very important debate, and I think the points that have been made here today have been highly edifying.

Each one of us held up our hand, took the oath of office, and said we will uphold the Constitution of the United States.

There was no caveat. You did not say, "I will uphold the Constitution of the United States only on those cases where precedent is well-established." You did not say, "I will uphold the Constitution unless something is presented to the Senate that the Court has never ruled on, in which case I will vote for it so the Supreme Court can rule."

You say you will uphold the Constitution.

The Senator from Maryland has made a very poignant case, that if we were trying to change the term of the President, to change the term of a Senator, if I were to offer an amendment to this body that said, "Henceforth and forever more the Roman Catholic Church will be the official church and the official religion of this country," what language would you have concerning the first amendment? But that amendment is no clearer on the hypothetical case which I have just stated than it is on this case.

Ben Franklin and all the Founding Fathers, Madison especially, when they got down to the question of how shall the Constitution be amended, made it tough. They did not want Members of the U.S. Senate and the House of Representatives to wake up every morning and just, by whim and caprice, change the fundamental organic law of this Nation. So they said, "You have to have a two-thirds vote by both houses."

This is the law that has made this country great for 200 years. I will be eternally grateful to our Founding Fathers because they made it very difficult to change it. They wanted every proposed change in the Constitution to be thoroughly aired, and the American people totally informed on all the possible implications of changing that document.

To come in here and say by a simple majority vote you are going to change the fundamental law of this Nation, which effectively abolished Congress, at least the Appropriations Committees of the two houses, and say we have to do this in the interest not because we have a consitutional responsibility but because we have the responsibility to duck it and kick it up to nine people on the Supreme Court.

I did not come here for that purpose, and I do not intend to vote for this amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Illinois.

Mr. DIXON. Mr. President, I hasten to suggest to my colleagues that I am somewhat bothered by protracting this argument, but I think something tremendously specious has been suggested by some of my friends, whom I greatly respect, when they tell you that this is so clear that that is the reason it has never been tested before.

I do have some reservations about whether you can do this statutorily. But the fact is that there is a respectable body of opinion in this country by respectable attorneys and others who have written on this that suggest that you can do it by statute. There is a difference of opinion about it.

I have not been in this place long, but I do know that an issue is not necessarily settled simply because it is said to be settled. I want to tell you about two experiences in my lifetime that were supposed to be settled that were absolutely reversed in my time in public service.

The first is this: When I went to the Illinois Legislature in 1950, the year that Everett McKinley Dirksen beat Scott Lucas, for all of those years, for a half century, they had not reapportioned Illinois. We represented by area in the Senate and in the House by population, and everybody said that is the way it is constitutionally. You cannot change it.

But while I was there the Supreme Court of the United States said one man, one vote was the way you did it and they did change it.

In all those years I was there, we argued about an income tax and they said it had to be the same percentage on people and the same percentage on corporations. There are people from the press in my State in the balcony that know that. When Governor Ogilvie proposed the State income tax he wanted a flat 4 percent on people and a flat 4 percent on corporations. Everybody said you had to do it that way, it was the only way that it was constitutional. We Democrats fought it and it ended up being 4 percent on corporations and 2½ percent on people. They said, "You cannot do that. It is unconstitutional. Everybody knows that you cannot do that." It went to the supreme court of our State and they said, "Absolutely you can do it. Sure you can do it. It makes good sense to do it."

Let me tell you, I respect the Senator from Washington, I respect the Senator from Alabama, and I respect the Senator from Arkansas. But not one of the three of them is on the Supreme Court of the United States.

I practiced law all my life. I do not know any more about the Constitution than them, but I do not believe there is not any man or woman sitting in this place who positively knows what the Constitution says on this.

There is only place in the world that can decide it and that is the Supreme Court of the United States.

I do not mind if Senators cop out on the issue. I copped out on a couple in my life myself. But do not tell me you are not voting for this because you think it is settled.

I want to come in your State and debate that question in any public place. It is not settled. It is only going to be settled when the Supreme Court of the United States decides.

Mr. CHILES. Will the Senator yield?

Mr. DIXON. Sure.

Mr. CHILES. The Senator would not imply that because some Member of the Senate did feel that this was unconstitutional and so voted to uphold the Constitution that the Senator was copping out, would he?

Mr. DIXON. No. Each Senator should vote the way they please, according to their own conscience. But I suggest the constitutional question is not settled.

Mr. MELCHER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. DIXON. Sure.

Mr. MELCHER. The two instances that the Senator from Illinois presented to us in favor of his argument——

Mr. DIXON. Do you want another? I will give you more.

Mr. MELCHER. In those two instances, the Senator will admit where the Supreme Court of the United States directed the State of Illinois that they had flaws in their laws.

Mr. DIXON. One case involved the Federal Constitution; the other was solely an Illinois constitution issue. And let me cite another case. Separate but equal was OK in the schools for a long, long time, for decades and decades. But a new case was brought back to the Court again and the Court said, "We changed our mind, it is not."

There are all kinds of things that have changed in the history of this country, and this question is open to doubts.

Mr. BOREN addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Oklahoma.

Mr. BOREN. Mr. President, it is a little difficult to follow the distinguished Senator from Illinois. I do not know whether he argues with passion or with conviction. I happen to be one of those who supports the concept of line item veto but now feels compelled to vote in the negative as to whether or not this proposal is constitutional.

A few moments ago I voted to table the point of order because I wanted us to be able to get a full debate on the substance of the issue of whether or not we should give the President the power of line-item veto.

I believe very strongly that we should. As Governor of Oklahoma, I had the opportunity under the State constitution of our State to have the power of line-item veto on appropriations bills. I utilized that power, I believe, more than all the Governors of Oklahoma combined in the State history during the 4 years that I served, to try to keep spending under control in our State at that time.

I think given the economic conditions of the country, this is a power that the President of the United States should have. Therefore, I wanted to see us have an opportunity to discuss this question.

But now, the question on which I must vote is not whether or not I support the line-item veto. I do support it. The question on which I must vote is, is the current proposal to make this change by statute rather than constitutional amendment consistent with the Constitution of the United States?

On that particular question, as much as I favor the line-item veto, I feel I have no choice but to vote that it does not comply with the Constitution of the United States. I say with all sincerity to my colleague from Illinois that I do think, as the Senator from Washington said earlier, that each of us has a responsibility under our own oath to read the Constitution and to uphold the Constitution. I do not believe that we can evade that responsibility to read the Constitution and study its meaning very carefully by simply saying that it is an issue that the courts must ultimately decide. I am one who has been concerned from time to time by what I thought was a misreading of the Constitution of the United States by the Supreme Court and other Federal courts. I think the Constitution of the United States does have clear meaning, and I think we have a responsibility to read it closely.

This is an economic emergency, I grant, and I admire the concern of the Senator from Georgia. On many occasions, he has led valiant efforts to bring spending under control. I think he has expressed on many occasions the fact that if we do not get these deficits under control, we are going to destroy our entire economy and we threaten to tear apart the social fabric as a result.

But, Mr. President, this is a dangerous and slippery slope on which we have embarked. Are we to declare, if an emergency exists in this country for one reason or another, social unrest or otherwise, that we should suspend the Bill of Rights, guaranteed by the Constitution to take care of that emergency? Are we to say that the right of free exercise of religion or the right of freedom of speech is something that we have no individual responsibility as elected officials to preserve, protect, and defend, that we should simply allow some court to decide whether or not the language of the Constitution means what it says it means? I think not.

This is not a situation, I say to may friend from Illinois, like the question of legislative apportionment, as to whether or not the apportionment of a State legislature based upon area rather than population violates the equal protection clause. We are not here interpreting a nebulous clause like that clause of the Constitution which says no citizen shall be denied equal protection of the law. We are here dealing with language of the Constitution under the legislative articles of the Constitution that spells out with great clarity the manner in which the laws of the United States shall be enacted, and the President of the United States shall consider a full bill under the legislation of the Constitution. And if the President vetoes a bill, it is not a simple majority of the Houses of Congress that is called upon to overrule such a veto.

If the Senator from Georgia were offering a constitutional amendment, I would be a cosponsor of it. I believe in giving the President line-item veto authority. If we were to research and find other ways, perhaps limited powers of rescission to be granted to the President of the United States in a manner that could pass constitutional muster, I would be supporting it.

I sympathize in terms of substance with what he is urging us to do, but I cannot say that I think anything, any current issue, any current emergency, any prevailing opinion in the country, any Gallup poll, anything that brings me political gain in the short term or political loss in the short term, overrules the responsibility that I have to uphold the Constitution of the United States.

I urge my colleagues who feel as I do that the line-item veto is a good idea to seriously consider this matter. I urge my colleague from Illinois and my colleague from Georgia, who are very sincere in their views, to consider it and to ponder whether or not we should return to this issue on another day, in another forum, with language drafted in another way.

I say to both of them that if we come back on another day, either with a constitutional amendment or with a different kind of statutory language that more arguably would pass constitutional muster, this Senator would be firmly in their corner. But as of today, I have to vote not on the legislative veto question but on the question of whether or not the proposal before us passes muster under the Constitution of the United States. I cannot delegate to another individual the responsibility which I have as an American to uphold the constitutional process.

I must with regret, Mr. President, say I think it is my duty as I see it—I cannot define anyone else's duty for them. I know how I understand the Constitution, I know how I read the Constitution. To me, personally, it is clear; therefore, I must do my own individual duty as I see it and vote that this does not pass constitutional muster.

Mr. MATTINGLY and Mr. McCLURE addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Idaho.

Mr. McCLURE. Mr. President, I thank the Senator from Oklahoma for his statement and I think he is perfectly right in voting his conscience as he sees it. My conscience tells me exactly the opposite and I shall vote exactly the opposite way. That does not mean he is right or that I am right. He is doing what his judgment tells him is his responsibility as a Member of the Senate of the United States and every one of the 100 Members here should do it. Nobody should vote for the point of order because he is against the line-item veto provision; equally, no one should vote against it because he is for the line-item veto. I happen to be against the Mattingly amendment and shall vote against it if we get to that point. I do not, however, believe that it is clearly unconstitutional.

We have had recent attempts on the part of the Congress of the United States to enact legislative veto and many within this body, including the Senator from Idaho, felt the courts were wrong in saying that the legislative veto was an improper exercise of legislative authority. I think there is another reasonable interpretation that the courts should have found and could have found. To suggest that there is only one point of view available or only one point of view possible begs the question about whether or not the Supreme Court should decide on this issue. If it were that easy, we would not need a Supreme Court. But the Supreme Court is not final because it is infallible; it is infallible because it is final. This body is neither infallible nor final and each of the 100 Members must exercise his own judgment.

I am against the line-item veto in this particular instance, because I agree with the statement of the distinguished Senator from Oregon outlining its deficiency. It is not the appropriation process that is failing in this body; it is the fact that we have created entitlement programs and do not have the courage to change them.

It is not the appropriations process, which could be reached by line-item veto, that is going to solve the budgetary problem. We shall have done something but have done something virtually meaningless if we grant the President of the United States the authority to reach those things that are governed by appropriations and not able to touch at all, all those other questions which are beyond the ability of the appropriations process to constrain.

I am opposed to the line-item veto because I think it deals with the wrong end of the problem. However, I do believe that we are not violating our oath of office if we vote against the point of order to say that it could be constitutional and we could, with good conscience, vote in favor of it if we are so disposed.

I shall vote against the point of order. I am pleased that we have the opportunity to vote against that point of order and I hope the point of order will be turned down. Then in turn, we shall vote on the substance, which I hope we shall get to before long.

Mr. MATTINGLY addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Georgia.

Mr. MATTINGLY. Mr. President, let me read from a study conducted by the chairman of the House Judiciary Subcommittee of an earlier Congress. Hatton Sumners stated that it is constitutional for the legislature to enact the line-item veto. He said:

> Members of Congress are sent to the seat of Government by the people charged with the responsibility of enacting the laws and fixing public policy, and are by general and specific grants as well as by implication given all the power and discretion essential to complete responsibility to the people for the discharge of those duties. When, therefore, the Houses of Congress, in order to add to their efficiency, guided by their judgment and acting under their responsibility to the people in the discharge of their constitutional responsibility, so draw an appropriation bill that in their judgment each item may be separately considered by the President and approved or disapproved, and as drawn and approved items may stand as complete and harmonious items of legislation while the items disapproved may be sent back to the Congress for further consideration, they act, it seems clear to me, within their constitutional powers and discretion.

Mr. President, if we are to begin legislating on the basis of what the courts may rule in the future, then it seems to me we unilaterally relinquish much of our constitutionally mandated authority. Some of us in this body believe that certain provisions of the War Powers Act and the Budget Act of 1974 are unconstitutional. That does not mean, however, that we should preempt whatever court challenges may be made to those acts and repeal them today. The question should be, should we substitute ourselves for that constitutionally approved judicial review system?

What this debate has done—and wish my colleague from Oklahoma was still in the Chamber when we were talking about going through the process of the constitutional amendment on the line-item veto, which I think we need to consider in the future—is to show that something must be done immediately. The deficits are not going to wait for a constitutional amendment to run its merry way through this Congress and the land to be approved or disapproved. Once again, I think what has happened is this debate today on the line-item veto has placed us and this budget deficit under a magnifying glass. It has created the focus where it belongs. If we lose, those who would try to include different items into an appropriation bill which, believe me, are not justified and should not be there, will probably think twice.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to place in the RECORD that letter by Mr. Sumners.

There being no objection, the letter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
COMMITTEE ON THE JUDICIARY,
Washington, D.C., December 17, 1937.

Hon. EDWARD T. TAYLOR, M.C.,
Chairman, Committee on Appropriations, House of Representatives, Washington, D.C.

MY DEAR COLLEAGUE: With reference to House Joint Resolution 515, introduced by you, proposing an amendment to the Constitution authorizing a veto of separate items in appropriation bills, which resolution has been referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, beg to advise that after an examination of the applicable provisions of the Constitution I have reached the conclusion which I submit for your consideration that the Houses of Congress, without an amendment to the Constitution, may authorize the President to veto separate items in an appropriation bill.

Article I, section 1, of the Constitution provides:

"All legislative powers herein granted shall be vested in a Congress of the United States, which shall consist of a Senate and House of Representatives."

Each of the Houses of Congress is authorized under the Constitution to establish its own rules of procedure. (Art. I, sec. 5, clause 2.)

Article 1, section 7, clause 2, of the Constitution provides:

"Every bill which shall have passed the House of Representatives and the Senate shall, before it becomes a law, be presented to the President of the United States; if he approves he shall sign it, but if not he shall return it, with his objections, to that House in which it shall have originated, who shall enter the objections at large on their Journal, and proceed to reconsider it. If, after such reconsideration, two-thirds of that House shall agree to pass the bill, it shall be sent, together with the objections, to the other House, by which it shall likewise be reconsidered, and if approved by two-thirds of that House, it shall become a law. But in all such cases the votes of both Houses shall be determined by yeas and nays, and the names of the persons voting for and against the bill shall be entered on the Journal of each House respectively. If any bill shall not be returned by the President within 10 days (Sundays excepted) after it shall have been presented to him, the same shall be a law, in like manner as if he had signed it, unless the Congress by their adjournment prevent its return, in which case it shall not be a law."

This section, as you will observe, is a limitation upon the general powers of Congress and is to be strictly construed. Does the word "bill" necessarily mean all the separate items assembled under one caption, each of which might have been the subject matter of a separate bill but which for convenience sake in expediting the public's business are assembled under one caption? It is clear that the sole purpose of this section is to make certain that no item of proposed legislation shall be law until it is approved by the President, or, if disapproved by the President, is again passed by both Houses by two-thirds vote, the objections of the President notwithstanding.

To hold that the word "bill" necessarily means all the items assembled under one caption would be a construction operative against the purpose and plan of the Constitution. That construction would compel the President officially to approve items which he does not in fact approve in order to avoid striking down other items which he does approve. On the other hand, such a construction would force him to disapprove items which in fact he does approve in order to reach other items which he disapproves. If, however, Congress draws an appropriation bill so that without doing hurt to the effectiveness of legislation the President is permitted to disapprove separate items and approve the remainder, permitting those items which have been agreed to by the Houses of Congress and approved by the President to become law, that would be in harmony with the plan and purpose of the Constitution. Under that arrangement the items which are disapproved by the President would be cut away from the rest of the bill and returned to Congress, with his objection, for reconsideration, as in other cases of veto, which arrangement likewise would be in harmony with the plan and purpose of the Constitution.

It would be necessary, as I view it, before the President would be authorized to veto a separate item in an appropriation bill, for the Houses of Congress by appropriate resolution to indicate to the President that they have drawn the bill so that each item may be regarded as a separate bill for the purpose of his examination and approval or disapproval, and that it is the will of Congress that the bill be thus examined and acted upon. Otherwise, we would have a situation under which the President could cut away parts of a bill, leaving as the law an incomplete item of legislation which the Houses of Congress would not have approved in that form as an original proposition. The Houses of Congress must have control over legislative processes in order that the people may hold them to full responsibility for the results of legislative processes. The power to do is always essential to the right to hold responsible for the fact and the method of the doing. Hence, the rule of strict construction of limitations upon general powers.

It would not seem necessary for the determination of this question to do more than examine, in the light of the general plan and philosophy of our system of government, the directly applicable provisions of the Constitution referred to. However, the general scope and character of the responsibility and discretion conferred by the Constitution upon the Houses of Congress by general and specific grants throw light upon the question being examined.

Congress is given the power to lay and collect taxes (there can be no more far-reaching power than that) to pay the debts; to provide for the common defense and the general welfare of the United States; to borrow money without limit on the credit of the United States; to regulate commerce with foreign nations and among the several States; to coin money and regulate the value thereof; to constitute public offices and provide for officers; to declare war and raise and support armies and navies (which is a great power and a great discretion) and to make rules for their government; to exercise entire legislative jurisdiction over territories, forts, arsenals, etc. In addition to that, the Senate exercises a veto power over the President's appointments. The personnel which constitutes the two Houses of Congress, functioning as separate entities under the impeachment provisions of the Constitution, is given the power to remove the entire judicial personnel from the Chief Justice down and the entire executive personnel from the President down.

In addition to making the rules for their procedure, the House and the Senate judge of the election and qualification of their respective Members and may remove them. They may not be questioned anywhere else as to what they say in debate. In other words, except for a few limitations upon the general powers contained in the Constitution, Members of Congress are sent to the seat of Government by the people charged with the responsibility of enacting the laws and fixing public policy, and are by general and specific grants as well as by implication given all the power and discretion essential to complete responsibility to the people for the discharge of those duties. When therefore, the Houses of Congress, in order to add to their efficiency, guided by their judgment and acting under their responsibility to the people in the discharge of their constitutional reponsibility, so draw an appropriation bill that in their judgment each item may be separately considered by the President and approved or disapproved, and as drawn and approved items may stand as complete and harmonious items of legislation while the items disapproved may be sent back to the Congress for further consideration, they act, it seems clear to me, within their constitutional powers and discretion.

Respectfully submitted.

HATTON W. SUMNERS.

I asked the legislative reference service of the Library of Congress to give me a statement as to the number of States and the provisions of each State on this subject. They have complied with my request, giving me the exact language of the constitutional provision of each one of the 39 States that have this provision in their Constitution. Under my leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I enclose those provisions herewith:

ITEM VETOES—TEXT OF STATE CONSTITUTIONAL PROVISIONS

1. Alabama (constitution, art. V, sec. 125):

"Every bill which shall have passed both houses of legislature, except as otherwise provided in this constitution, shall be presented to the Governor; if he approve, he shall sign it; but if not he shall return it with his objections to the house in which it originated, which shall enter the objections at large upon the journal and proceed to reconsider it. * * * If the Governor's message proposes amendment, which would remove his objections, the house to which it is sent may so amend the bill and send it with the Governor's message to the other house, which may adopt, but cannot amend, said amendment; and both houses concurring in the amendment, the bill shall again be sent to the Governor and acted on by him as other bills. If the house to which the bill is returned refuses to make such amendment, it shall proceed to reconsider it; and if a majority of the whole number elected to that house shall vote for the passage of the bill, it shall be sent with the objection to the other house, by which it shall likewise be reconsidered, and if approved by a majority of the whole number elected to that house, it shall become a law. If the house to which the bill is returned makes the amendment, and the other house declines to pass the same, that house shall proceed to reconsider it, as though the bill had originated therein, and such proceedings shall be taken thereon as above provided * * *."

Alabama (constitution, art. V, sec. 126):

"The Governor shall have power to approve or disapprove any item or items of any appropriation bill embracing distinct items, and the part or parts of the bill approved shall be the law and the item or items disapproved shall be void, unless repassed according to the rules and limitations prescribed for the passage of bills over the executive veto; and he shall in writing state specifically the item or items he disapproves, setting the same out in full in his message, but in such case the enrolled bill shall not be returned with the Governor's objection."

2. Arizona (constitution, art. V, sec. 7):

"* * * If any bill presented to the Governor contains several items of appropriations of money, he may object to one or more of such items while approving other portions of the bill. In such case he shall append to the bill at the time of signing it, a statement of the item or items which he declines to approve, together with his reasons therefor, and such item or items shall not take effect unless passed over the Governor's objections as in this section provided. * * *"

3. Arkansas (constitution, art. VI, sec. 17):

"The governor shall have power to disapprove any item or items of any bill making appropriation of money, embracing distinct items; and the part or parts of the bill approved shall be the law, and the item or items of appropriations disapproved shall be void, unless repassed according to the rules and limitations prescribed for the passage of other bills over the executive veto."

4. California (constitution, art. IV, sec. 16):

"* * * If any bill presented to the Governor contains several items of appropriation of money, he may object to one or more items, while approving other portions of the bill. In such case he shall append to the bill at the time of signing it, a statement of the items to which he objects, and the reasons therefor, and the appropriation so objected to shall not take effect unless passed over the Governor's veto, as hereinbefore provided. If the legislature be in session, the Governor shall transmit to the House in which the bill originated a copy of such statement, and the items so objected to shall be separately reconsidered in the same manner as bills which have been disapproved by the Governor."

California (constitution, art. IV, sec. 34):

"* * * In any appropriation bill passed by the legislature, the Governor may reduce or eliminate any one or more items of appropriation of money while approving other portions of the bill, whereupon the effect of such action and the further procedure shall be as provided in section 16 of this article * * *."

5. Colorado (constitution, art. IV, sec. 12):

"The Governor shall have power to disapprove of any item or items of any bill making appropriations of money, embracing distinct items, and the part or parts of the bill approved shall be law, and the item or items disapproved shall be void, unless enacted in manner following: If the general assembly be in session, he shall transmit to the house in which the bill originated a copy of the item or items thereof disapproved, together with his objections thereto, and the items objected to shall be separately reconsidered, and each item shall then take the same course as is prescribed for the passage of bills over the executive veto."

6. Connecticut (constitutional amendments, art. XXXVII):

"The Governor shall have power to disapprove of any item or items of any bill making appropriations of money embracing distinct items while at the same time approving the remainder of the bill, and the part or parts of the bill so approved shall become effective and the item or items of appropriation so disapproved shall not take effect unless the same are separately reconsidered and repassed in accordance with the rules and limitations prescribed for the passage of bills over the executive veto. In all cases in which the Governor shall exercise the right of disapproval hereby conferred he shall append to the bill at the time of signing it a statement of the item or items disapproved, together with his reasons for such disapproval, and transmit the bill and such appended statement to the secretary. If the general assembly be then in session he shall forthwith cause a copy of such statement to be delivered to the house in which the bill originated for reconsideration of the disapproved items in conformity with the rules prescribed for legislative action in respect to bills which have received executive disapproval."

7. Delaware (constitution, art. III, sec. 18):

"* * * The Governor shall have power to disapprove of any item or items of any bill making appropriations of money, embracing distinct items, and the part or parts of the bill approved shall be the law, and the item or items of appropriation disapproved shall be void, unless repassed according to the rules and limitations prescribed for the passage of other bills, over the executive veto. * * *"

8. Florida (constitution, art. IV, sec. 18):

"The Governor shall have power to disapprove of any item or items of any bills making appropriation of money embracing distinct items, and the part or parts of the bill approved shall be the law, and the item or items of appropriations disapproved shall be void, unless repassed according to the rules and limitations prescribed for the passage of other bills over the executive veto."

9. Georgia (constitution, art. V, sec. 1, par. XVI):

"* * * He may approve any appropriation, and disapprove any other appropriation, in the same bill, and the latter shall not be effectual, unless passed two-thirds of each house."

10. Idaho (constitution, art. IV, sec. 11):

"The Governor shall have power to disapprove of any item or items of any bill making appropriations of money embracing distinct items, and the part or parts approved shall become a law and the item or items disapproved shall be void, unless enacted in the manner following: If the legislature be in session, he shall within 5 days transmit to the house within which the bill originated a copy of the item or items thereof disapproved, together with his objections thereto, and the items objected to shall be separately reconsidered, and each item shall then take the same course as is prescribed for the passage of bills over the executive veto."

11. Illinois (constitution, art. V, sec. 16):

"* * * Bills making appropriations of money out of the treasury shall specify the objects and purposes for which the same are made, and appropriate to them, respectively, their several amounts in distinct items and sections, and if the Governor shall not approve any one or more of the items or sections contained in any bill, but shall approve the residue thereof, it shall become a law as to the residue in like manner as if he had signed it.

"The Governor shall then return the bill, with his objections to the items or sections of the same not approved by him, to the house in which the bill shall have originated, which house shall enter te objections at large upon its journal and proceed to reconsider so much of said bill as is not approved by the Governor.

"The same proceedings shall be had in both houses in reconsidering the same as is hereinbefore provided in case of an entire bill returned by the Governor with his objections; and if any item or section of said bill not approved by the Governor shall be passed by two-thirds of the members elected to each of the two houses of the general assembly, it shall become part of said law, notwithstanding the objections of the Governor. * * * "

Indiana: The Governor has no power to veto items.

Iowa: The Governor has no power to veto items.

12. Kansas (constitution, art. II, sec. 14):

"* * * If any bill presented to the Governor contains several items of appropriation of money, he may object to one or more of such items, while approving the other portion of the bill; in such case he shall append to the bill, at the time of signing it, a statement of the item or items to which he objects, and the reasons therefor, and shall transmit such statement, or a copy thereof, to the house of representatives, and any appropriations so objected to shall not take effect unless reconsidered and approved by two-thirds of the members elected to each house, and, if so reconsidered and approved, shall take effect and become a part of the bill, in which case the presiding officers of each house shall certify on such bill such fact of reconsideration and approval."

13. Kentucky (consitution, sec. 88):

"* * * The Governor shall have power to disapprove any part or parts of appropriation bills embracing distinct items, and the part or parts disapproved shall not become a law unless reconsidered and passed, as in case of a bill."

14. Louisiana (constitution, art. V, sec. 16):

"The Governor shall have the power to disapprove of any item or items of any bill making appropriations for money, embracing distinct items, and the part or parts of the bill approved shall be law, and the item or items of appropriation disapproved shall be void, unless repassed according to the rules and limitations prescribed for the passage of other bills over veto."

Maine: The Governor has no power to veto items.

15. Maryland (constitution, art. II, sec. 17):

"* * * The Governor shall have power to disapprove of any item or items of any bills making appropriations of money embracing distinct items, and the part or parts of the bill approved shall be the law, repassed according to the rules or limitations prescribed for the passage of other bills over the executive veto."

16. Massachusetts (constitutional amendments, art. LXIII, sec. 5):

"The Governor may disapprove or reduce items or parts of items in any bill appropriating money. So much of such bill as he approves shall upon his signing the same become law. As to each item disapproved or reduced, he shall transmit to the house in which the bill originated his reason for such disapproval or reduction, and the procedure shall then be the same as in the case of a bill disapproved as a whole. In case he shall fail so to transmit his reasons for such disapproval or reduction within 5 days after the bill shall have been presented to him, such items shall have the force of law unless the general court by adjournment shall prevent such transmission, in which case they shall not be law."

17. Michigan (constitution, art. V, sec. 37):

"The Governor shall have power to disapprove of any item or items of any bill making appropriations of money embracing distinct items; and the part or parts approved shall be the law; and the item or items disapproved shall be void, unless repassed according to the rules and limitations prescribed for the passage of other bills over the executive veto."

18. Minnesota (constitution, art. IV, sec. 11):

"If any bill presented to the Governor contain several items of appropriation of money, he may object to one or more of such items, while approving of the other portion of the bill. In such case he shall append to the bill, at the time of signing it, a statement of the items to which he objects, and the appropriation so objected to shall not take effect. If the legislature be in session, he shall transmit to the House in which the bill originated a copy of such statement, and the items objected to shall be separately reconsidered. If, on reconsideration, one or more of such items be approved by two-thirds of the members elected to each house, the same shall be a part of the law, notwithstanding the objections of the Governor. All the provisions of this section, in relation to bills not approved by the Governor, shall apply in cases in which he shall withhold his approval from any item or items contained in a bill appropriating money."

19. Mississippi (consitution, sec. 73):

"The Governor may veto parts of any appropriation bill, and approve parts of the same, and the portions approved shall be law."

20. Missouri (constitution, art. V, sec. 13):

"* * * If any bill presented to the Governor contain several items of appropriation of money, he may object to one or more items or portions of items while approving other portions of the bill. In such case he shall append to the bill at the time of signing it a statement of the items, or portions of items, to which he objects, and the appropriations, or portions thereof, objected to shall not take effect. If the general assembly be in session, he shall transmit to the house in which the bill originated a copy of such statement, and the items or portions thereof objected to shall be separately reconsidered. If it be not in session, then he shall transmit the same within 30 days to the office of the Secretary of State, with his approval or reasons for disapproval: Provided, however, Nothing herein contained shall be construed as authorizing the Governor to reduce any appropriation for free public-school purposes."

21. Montana (constitution, art. VII, sec. 13):

"The Governor shall have power to disapprove of any item or items of any bill making appropriations of money, embracing distinct items, and the part or parts approved shall become a law, and the item or items disapproved shall be void, unless enacted, in the manner following: If the legislative assembly be in session, he shall within 5 days transmit to the house in which the bill originated a copy of the item or items thereof disapproved, together with his objections thereto, and the items objected to shall be separately reconsidered, and each item shall then take the same course as is prescribed for the passage of bills over the executive veto."

22. Nebraska (consitution, art. IV, sec. 15):

"* * * The Governor may disapprove any item or items of appropriation contained in bills passed by the legislature, and the item or items so disapproved shall be stricken therefrom, unless repassed in the manner herein prescribed in cases of disapproval of bills."

Nevada: The Governor has no power to veto items.

New Hampshire: The Governor has no power to veto items.

23. New Jersey (constitution, art. V, sec. 7):

"* * * If any bill presented to the Governor contains several items of appropriations of money, he may object to one or more of such items while approving of the other portions of the bill. In such case he shall append to the bill, at the time of signing it, a statement of the item to which he objects, and the appropriation so objected to shall not take effect. If the legislature be in session, he shall transmit to the house in which the bill originated a copy of such statement, and the items objected to shall be separately reconsidered. If, on reconsideration, one or more of such items be approved by a majority of the members elected to each house, the same shall be a part of the law, notwithstanding the objections of the Governor. All the provisions of this section in relation to bills not approved by the Governor shall apply to cases in which he shall withhold his approval from any item or items contained in a bill appropriating money."

24. New Mexico (constitution, art. IV, sec. 22):

"* * * The Governor may in like manner approve or disapprove any part or parts, item or items, of any bill appropriating money, and such parts or items approved shall become a law, and such as are disapproved shall be void unless passed over his veto, as herein provided."

25. New York (constitution, art. IV, sec. 9):

"* * * If any bill presented to the Governor contains several items of appropriation of money, he may object to one or more of such items while approving of the other portion of the bill. In such case he shall append to the bill, at the time of signing it, a statement of the items to which he objects; and the appropriation so objected to shall not take effect. If the legislature be in session, he shall transmit to the house in which the bill originated a copy of such statement, and the items objected to shall be separately reconsidered. If, on reconsideration, one or more of such items be approved by two-thirds of the members elected to each house, the same shall be part of the law, notwithstanding the objections of the Governor. All the provisions of this section, in relation to bills not approved by the Governor, shall apply in cases in which he shall withhold his approval from any item or items contained in a bill appropriating money."

New York (constitution, art. IV-A, sec. 3):

"* * * The legislature may not alter an appropriation bill submitted by the Governor except to strike out or reduce items therein, but it may add thereto items of appropriation provided that such additions are stated separately and distinctly from the original items of the bill and refer each to a single object or purpose. None of the restrictions of this provision, however, shall apply to appropriations for the legislature or judiciary. Such a bill when passed by both houses shall be a law immediately without further action by the Governor, except that appropriations for the legislature and judiciary and separate items added to the Governor's bills by the legislature shall be subject to his approval as provided in section 9 of article 4."

North Carolina: The Governor has no power to veto any bill or part of bill.

26. North Dakota (constitution, art. III, sec. 80):

"The Governor shall have power to disapprove of any item or items, or part or parts, of any bill making appropriations of money or property embracing distinct items, and the part or parts of the bill approved shall be the law, and the item or items and part or parts disapproved shall be void, unless enacted in the following manner: If the legislative assembly be in session he shall transmit to the house in which the bill originated a copy of the item or items or part or parts thereof disapproved, together with his objections thereto, and the items or parts objected to shall be separately reconsidered, and each item or part shall then take the same course as is prescribed for the passage of bills over the executive veto."

27. Ohio (constitution, art II, sec. 16):

"* * * The Governor may disapprove any item or items in any bill making an appropriation of money and the item or items so disapproved shall be void unless repassed in the manner herein prescribed for the repassage of a bill."

28. Oklahoma (constitution, art. VI, sec. 12):

"Every bill passed by the legislature, making appropriations of money embracing distinct items, shall, before it becomes a law, be presented to the Governor; if he disapproves the bill, or any item, or appropriation therein contained, he shall communicate such disapproval, with his reasons therefor, to the house in which the bill shall have originated, but all items not disapproved shall have the force and effect of law according to the original provisions of the bill. Any item or items so disapproved shall be void, unless repassed by a two-thirds vote, according to the rules and limitations prescribed in the preceding section in reference to other bills: Provided, That this section shall not relieve emergency bills of the requirement of the three-fourths vote."

29. Oregon (constitution, art. V, sec. 15a):

"The Governor shall have power to veto single items in appropriation bills and any provision in new bills declaring an emergency without thereby affecting any other provision of such bill."

30. Pennsylvania (constitution, art. IV, sec. 16):

"The Governor shall have power to disapprove of any item or items of any bill making appropriations of money, embracing distinct items, and the part or parts of the bill approved shall be the law, and the item or items of appropriations disapproved shall be void unless repassed according to the rules and limitations prescribed for the passage of other bills over the executive veto."

Rhode Island: The Governor has no power to veto items.

31. South Carolina (constitution, art. IV, sec. 23):

"* * * If the Governor shall not approve any one or more of the items or sections contained in any bill, but shall approve of the residue thereof, it shall become a law as to the residue in like manner as if he had signed it. The Governor shall then return the bill with his objections to the items or sections of the same not approved by him to the house, in which the bill originated, which house shall enter the objections at large upon its journal and proceed to reconsider so much of said bill as is not approved by the Governor. The same proceedings shall be had in both houses in reconsidering the same as is provided in case of an entire bill returned by the Governor with his objections; and if any item or section of said bill not approved by the Governor shall be passed by two-thirds of each house of the general assembly, it shall become a part of said law notwithstanding the objections of the Governor. * * *"

32. South Dakota (constitution, art IV, sec. 10):

"The Governor shall have power to disapprove of any item or items of any bill making appropriations of money embracing distinct items, and the part or parts of the bill approved shall be law, and the item or items disapproved shall be void, unless enacted in the following manner: If the legislature be in session, he shall transmit to the house in which the bill originated a copy of the item or items thereof disapproved, together with his objections thereto, and the items objected to shall be separately reconsidered, and each item shall then take the same course as is prescribed for the passage of bills over the executive veto."

Tennessee: The Governor has no power to veto items.

33. Texas (constitution, art, IV, sec. 14):

"* * * If any bill presented to the Governor contains several items of appropriation, he may object to one or more of such items and approve the other portion of the bill. In such case he shall append to the bill, at the time of signing it, a statement of the items to which he objects, and no item so objected to shall take effect. If the legislature be in session he shall transmit to the house in which the bill originated a copy of such statement and the items objected to shall be separately considered. If, on reconsideration, one or more of such items be approved by two-thirds of the members present of each house, the same shall be part of the law, notwithstanding the objections of the Governor. If any such bill containing several items of appropriation, not having been presented to the Governor 10 days (Sundays excepted) prior to adjournment, be in the hands of the Governor at the time of adjournment, he shall have 20 days from such adjournment within which to file objections to any items thereof and make proclamation of the same, and such item or items shall not take effect."

34. Utah (constitution, art. VII, sec. 8):

"* * * If any bill presented to the Governor contains several items of appropriations of money, he may object to one or more such items, while approving other portions of the bill; in such case he shall append to the bill at the time of signing it a statement of the item or items which he declines to approve, together with his reasons therefor, and such item or items shall not take effect unless passed over the Governor's objection as in this section provided."

Vermont: The Governor has no power to veto items.

35. Virginia (constitution, art. V, sec. 76):

"* * * The Governor shall have the power to veto any particular item or items of an appropriation bill, but the veto shall not affect the item or items to which he does not object. The item or items objected to shall not take effect except in the manner heretofore provided in this section as to bills returned to the general assembly without his approval. If he approve the general purpose of any bill, but disapprove any part or parts thereof, he may return it, with recommendations for its amendment to the house in which it originated, whereupon the same proceeding shall be had in both houses upon the bill and his recommendations in relation to its amendment as is above provided in relation to a bill which he shall have returned without his approval, and with his objections thereto; provided, that if after such reconsideration, both houses, by a vote of a majority of the members present in each, shall agree to amend the bill in accordance with his recommendation in relation thereto, or either house by such vote shall fail or refuse to so amend it, then, and in either case the bill shall be again sent to him, and he may act upon it as if it were then before him for the first time. * * *"

36. Washington (constitution, art. III, sec. 12):

"* * * If any bill presented to the Governor contain several sections or items, he may object to one or more sections or items while approving other portions of the bill. In such case he shall append to the bill, at the time of signing it, a statement of the section or sections, item or items, to which he objects and the reasons therefor, and the section or sections, item or items, so objected to, shall not take effect unless passed over the Governor's objections, as hereinbefore provided."

37. West Virginia (constitution, art. VII, sec. 15):

"Every bill passed by the legislature making appropriations of money, embracing distinct items, shall before it becomes a law, be presented to the Governor; if he disapproves the bill, or any item or appropriation therein contained, he shall communicate such disapproval with his reasons therefor to the house in which the bill originated; but all items not disapproved shall have the force and effect of law according to the original provisions of the bill. Any item or items so disapproved shall be void, unless repassed by a majority of each house according to the rules and limitations prescribed in the preceding section in reference to other bills."

38. Wisconsin (constitution, art. V, sec. 10):

"* * * Appropriation bills may be approved in whole or in part by the Governor, and the part approved shall become law, and the part objected to shall be returned in the same manner as provided for other bills. If, after such reconsideration, two-thirds of the members present shall agree to pass the bill, or the part of the bill objected to, it shall be sent, together with the objections, to the other house, by which it shall likewise be reconsidered, and if approved by two-thirds of the members present it shall become a law. * * *"

39. Wyoming (constitution, art. IV, sec. 9):

"The Governor shall have power to disapprove of any item or items or part or parts of any bill making appropriations of money or property embracing distinct items, and the part or parts of the bill approved shall be the law, and the item or items and part or parts disapproved shall be void unless enacted in the following manner: If the legislature be in session he shall transmit to the house in which the bill originated a copy of the item or items or part or parts thereof disapproved, together with his objections thereto, and the items or parts objected to shall be separately reconsidered, and each item or part shall then take the same course as is prescribed for the passage of bills over the executive veto."

It will appear from that statement that there are only nine States that do not have that provision, those being the States of Maine, New Hampshire, Vermont, Rhode Island, Nevada, Tennessee, North Carolina, Iowa, and Indiana. I look upon this matter as one of the most important subjects that Congress could consider. That provision has brought about savings of hundreds of millions of dollars throughout the various States, and I believe it would be many times more important to the Federal Government than it is to the States. In my judgment, Congress should first decide whether or not the House and Senate could agree to the policy of giving the President that authority; and if so, secondly, as to whether or not they want to undertake it by a constitutional amendment, which would possibly require many years before it could become effective, or by a legislative act, which could be passed at this session of Congress and could be determined by the Supreme Court very expeditiously thereafter if the constitutionality of such an act was brought into consideration. I could give extensive references to the recommendations of the various Presidents and the activities of various committees and speeches on the subject, but I deem it would not accomplish anything that would be materially helpful.

If I may be pardoned for a personal reference, my recollection is that the very first bill I passed when I came to Congress in March 1909 was promptly vetoed by President Taft. I spoke to the chairman of the Appropriations Committee, Hon. James A. Tawney, about it, and he said the bill was meritorious and that he would insert it in an appropriation bill. He did so, and President Taft was required to sign that bill containing the identical language that he had vetoed some 10 days before. From that day to this I have been forcibly impressed with the very great importance of this matter. If Congress would adopt this policy, it will very materially aid in balancing the Budget.

Mr. DIXON addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Indiana is recognized.

Mr. DIXON. Mr. President, my distinguished friend from Washington has suggested that we all take a solemn oath to support the Constitution. We do. I took that solemn oath, as my friend from Washington took his solemn oath. And I assure him and every Senator that I will do everything during my time in the Senate to keep that solemn oath.

Now, here is an eight-page document from the Congessional Research Service of the Library of Congress by J. R. Shampansky, legislative attorney, American Law Division, dated October 23, 1981. I am going to read one page as follows:

Although the Constitution does not on its face grant the President an item veto, there was no discussion of the possibility of an item veto at the Constitutional Convention, and the President has apparently never attempted to exercise an item veto (see Item Veto Hearings, supra, at 65 n. 16), it has been suggested that a President might be able to exercise the item veto power without the necessity of either a constitutional amendment or a statutory enactment. See Item Veto Hearings, supra, at 50-51. This view is based on the fact that Art. I, Sec. 7, permits the President to veto a "bill." Although today "omnibus bills" dealing with many unrelated matters are commonplace, it has been said that when the framers of the Constitution used the term "bill," they meant a measure relating to only one individual item. Thus, the argument goes, the framers intended for the President to be able to review each provision of law passed by the Congress, and the President's power to do so should not be restricted merely by Congress' practice of packaging in one bill numerous unrelated items. See Item Veto Hearings, supra. However, the view that the President currently possesses the item veto power apparently has few adherents, and given the fact that no President has ever attempted to exercise such a power, it would seem that the better view is that enabling legislation or a constitutional amendment is required.

The argument that a statutory enactment would be sufficient to grant the President the item veto is based on several provisions of the Constitution. Art. I, Sec. 1, grants all legislative powers to the Congress. Art. I, Sec. 8, Cl. 18, the "necessary and proper clause," grants to the Congress the power "to make all Laws which shall be necessary and proper for carrying into Execution the foregoing Powers, and all other Powers vested by this Constitution in Government of the United States . . ."

So I say to my friends, make any argument you want, but I say the question of law and constitutionality of this item veto amendment is unsettled, and this document speaks to that as eloquently as any Senator ever can.

Mr. BIDEN addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. NICKLES). The Senator from Delaware is recognized.

Mr. BIDEN. Mr. President, with all due respect to those who concluded that to wait to see and review this issue we must have a point of order, I think the discussion we have had thus far is evidence in retrospect that that was not such a good idea.

We found, as the discussion has taken place since the last vote, that there is a Senator, who is for this line-item veto and voted for the motion to table, who is now going to vote for the point of order because he is for the line-item veto but because he thinks a legislative version is unconstitutional.

We have a Senator who voted for the motion to table, who is going to vote for the procedural motion on the Mattingly amendment, who is going to vote against the line-item veto.

You have a Senator speaking now who is not sure whether he likes the line-item veto but is sure that he does not like the idea of deciding whether this amendment is or is not constitutional before we fully debate it.

The problem is we debated around the question of whether or not it was constitutional prior to the last vote. We debated the merits of whether or not it made any sense more than we debated, from what I was able to listen to, the constitutionality. I wonder whether it is possbile—and maybe not—I am not asking unanimous consent for this—for us to get straight to the merits, a vote up and down on the merits and avoid another vote on a precedural matter because although I think it is probably unconstitutional, I believe there is a legitimate point that is distinguishable from that raised by my articulate friend from Arkansas, who said what would it be like if he rose to the floor and asked for the official religion of the United States of America to be Roman Catholicism.

The point is, he might in fact get somebody to vote that way but we all acknowledge that is clearly, patently unconstitutional. I am not sure this is. I think it is.

Now, I voted on tabling, but there has not been nearly enough discussion along the lines that the Senator from Illinois was just pursuing.

I am contemplating the following course of action as far as this Senator goes, either to keep this debate going long enough for us all to do the research to be able to make a sound judgment on the constitutionality question or vote up and down on the issue.

I hate like the devil to be in the spot of voting to say unequivocally that I am absolutely and positively certain that this is unconstitutional and leave it at that, because I am not certain. I have not spent a great deal of time examining the constitutionality of it.

With all due respect to my friend from Georgia, he quoted a Member of Congress from the 1930's talking about a situation different from the one he is now suggesting.

Mr. McCLURE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BIDEN. I yield.

Mr. McCLURE. If I understand the Senator correctly, he is suggesting delaying a vote until he can be absolutely, unequivocally certain.

Mr. BIDEN. No; the Senator is saying delay the vote until we can have an enlightened debate. With all due respect to my colleagues, not many of them know a lot about this.

Mr. McCLURE. That, too, is not a requirement in this body. [Laughter.]

Mr. BIDEN. I understand that. But I should like us at least to be able to debate to the point so that we can deal with the merits of the constitutionality, if that is what we are going to do.

I may be mistaken, but I have heard only one citation on the question of constitutionality raised here, and that was raised by a staffer at the Library of Congress.

Really and truly, I think we are making a mistake here. We are making a mistake by saying with finality what the Chair has said. I have great respect for the Parliamentarian. I have great respect for the ability of the Chair to interpret the Constitution.

Mr. GORTON. He did not interpret.

Mr. BIDEN. Maybe I am wrong. Was not the matter we voted on last time that the Chair declared that this is legislation amending the Constitution.

Mr. GORTON. No.

Mr. MATTINGLY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BIDEN. I yield.

Mr. MATTINGLY. Why does the Senator not ask the Senator from Florida if he is willing to withdraw the point of order, and we will vote up and down on the Mattingly amendment?

Mr. BIDEN. Maybe the Senator from Washington can answer.

Mr. GORTON. The Senator from Delaware may not have been on the floor.

Mr. BIDEN. I was not on the floor.

Mr. GORTON. The Chair declined to rule on the constitutionality of the amendment, on the basis of long-established precedent, and submitted the question to the body.

Mr. BIDEN. With the same result, though. We have to decide, on a single vote, without debate, whether this is or is not constitutional. I am not prepared to say—forget certainty—with any reasonable body of knowledge at my disposal, whether or not it is.

So I suggest that if we can find the Senator from Florida, maybe he will withdraw his point of order and let us vote up and down, because I have a number of questions for the Senator from Georgia.

For example, this is a question I do not ask him to respond to now, unless he is so inclined. The amendment reads:

(a) The President may disapprove any item of appropriation in any Act or joint resolution, except any item of appropriation for the legislative branch or the judicial branch of the government.

Why does that exempt us? I assume it is because the Senator believes separation of powers is important. How is that separation of powers exemption much different from the separation of powers as it relates to appropriations? That is a distinction on which I should like to hear the difference. I am not sure there is a distinction with a difference.

I do not want to belabor the point; but if I am compelled to vote on the constitutionality, which is what I am being asked to vote on here, I am not sure what I am going to do.

Quite frankly, I do not plan on being in this body the rest of my life. There are a lot of people on the other side of the aisle who do not plan for me to be here after next January. When I leave here I have to go back to do the thing I did before—be a lawyer. I value very much my intellectual integrity, and I value very much whether or not I conduct myself in a way that reflects upon a very significant portion of the thing I am supposedly professional at, and that is the law, at the bench and the bar.

I do not like to vote like this on something that has not been aired fully.

Mr. President, I have no desire to keep the floor. I ask the Senator from New Mexico: Is there any possiblity, in his mind, of the point of order being withdrawn and our voting up and down?

Mr. DOMENICI. I do not think so. I have talked with a few Senators, and there are a number who think it is a very pertinent issue, that two-thirds does not equal 50 percent. They take it as a very serious proposition that we should consider legislating a constitutional change. So it was not raised in any manner other than a serious one, and they would like to vote on that.

I suggest to my friend from Delaware that the issue is whether this proposal attempts to change the Constitution by statute. If the Senator is uncertain, it seems to me that he should vote against the point of order and reserve his vote for an up and down vote on the issue.

The way I am going to handle it is that I am clear in my mind that 50 percent does not equal two-thirds, and that is on the override provision. I am not suggesting that that is the right position for everyone, but it makes it clear for me that this is an attempt to legislate a constitutional change. That is the issue. So I say, yes, that is what it is, and I do not know that we are going to clarify that very much with more time.

I have great sympathy for the fact that we did not do this in an orderly manner. There are no legal briefs here. But I think we have heard about as much on it as we are going to hear, and I urge that the Senator let us vote.

There are those who have very difficult explanations, as the Senator has described, and are not able to guess on the vote, based upon the first two votes, but I think that is all right. That has happened a number of times.

The Senator can explain his views, and everyone will know exactly what his vote means. But I think the Senate would like to go ahead and vote on the constitutional issue of legislation attempting to change the Constitution. If the Senator from Florida does not win, we will go to an up and down vote on the substance. I hope the Senator from Delaware can accommodate us. We have been waiting for this a long time and have accommodated a number of Senators.

Mr. BIDEN. I have been here close to 12 years, and on not one occasion in that time have I delayed the Senate. I have spoken at times longer than some of my colleagues wanted to hear me.

I guess we all have to wrestle with our conscience. There is no reflection on anyone who spoke on this, and I can say sincerely that we are not going to get a very scholarly discourse on the constitutionality of this question. Everybody is saying what they think their instinct tells them and how they reach that conclusion. I am not at all certain. I want it to be clear. I do not know how I am going to vote. I have to wrestle with my conscience in the next 3 minutes. I guess that is about all I will have.

If I vote against the point of order, I want to make it clear that I am not voting to say I am certain that this is constitutional. But when I vote, if I vote for the point of order, it seems to me that I find myself in the position of saying that I am pretty well certain that this is unconstitutional. Maybe, for the first time, I should vote "present." I hate to fool around with constitutional issues like this, out of our hip pocket.

I just do not like it. But I understand the dilemma. I understand the nature of the business and the nature of the place. Because of that dilemma, I am voting to uphold the point of order that this amendment, which proposes to give the President line item veto authority, is legislation amending the Constitution.

Two issues have been raised. First is the question as to whether the Congress can legislatively grant line item veto authority to the President. While Congress probably cannot do so, the issue is not entirely clear and cannot be clarified in the short time available today.

However, the second issue is more clear although it has been little debated this afternoon. If Congress could grant line item veto authority through legislation, it could not change the percentage to override such a veto from two-thirds to 50 percent, as this amendment proposes to do. Clearly, therefore, this limited portion of the amendment is unconstitutional. Therefore, I am voting to uphold the point of order on the amendment as a whole.

● Mr. MITCHELL. Mr. President, I will support the point of order raised against consideration of the amendment offered by the Senator from Georgia which would have the effect of altering the Constitution of the United States by legislation.

Article I, Section 7 spells out in detail the President's veto powers and the congressional power to override Presidential vetos. There is absolutely no indication in that section that the Framers contemplated allowing a President to pick and choose which sections of the laws he could approve. Indeed, granting that power in effect usurps the constitutional power of the Congress to enact the laws.

An issue of this gravity ought not be debated as an amendment to this budget bill or to any other legislation. It ought to be the subject of extensive inquiry, both as to its constitutional implications and its practical effects. And the Congress ought to debate whether or not we wish to amend the Constitution in the way properly set forth in the Constitution. We cannot change the Constitution legislatively because we lack the authority to do so.

We have debated other kinds of bills that attempt to make legislative changes in the Constitutionl. We have rejected them, because we lacked the authority to enact them. We should do the same to this proposal.●

SEVERAL SENATORS. Vote.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is, Is the point of order well taken?

On this question, the yeas and nays have been ordered, and the clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk called the roll.

Mr. STEVENS. I announce that the Senator from Florida (Mrs. HAWKINS), the Senator from Nevada (Mr. LAXALT), the Senator from Alaska (Mr. MURKOWSKI), and the Senator from Wyoming (Mr. WALLOP) are necessarily absent.

Mr. CRANSTON. I announce that the Senator from Texas (Mr. BENTSEN), the Senator from Ohio (Mr. GLENN), the Senator from Colorado (Mr. HART), the Senator from South Carolina (Mr. HOLLINGS), the Senator from Arkansas (Mr. PRYOR), and the Senator from Massachusetts (Mr. TSONGAS) are necessarily absent.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Are there any other Senators in the Chamber who desire to vote?

The yeas and nays resulted—yeas 56, nays 34, as follows:

The PRESIDING OFFICER. On this vote there are 56 yeas and 34 nays. The point of order is well taken. The amendment fails.

Mr. DOMENICI. Mr. President, I move to reconsider the vote by which the point of order was well taken.

Mr. BAKER. I move to lay that motion on the table.

The motion to lay on the table was agreed to.

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The bill clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, I have conversed with the minority leader, and with the two managers of the bill. I am happy to say that I believe we can now arrive at a time certain to vote on the Chiles amendment.

ORDER FOR VOTE ON CHILES AMENDMENT ON TUESDAY NEXT AT 3 P.M.

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the vote occur on the Chiles amendment at 3 p.m. on Tuesday next.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection? Without objection, it is so ordered.

ORDER FOR PRO FORMA SESSION TOMORROW AND RECESS UNTIL 10 A.M., TUESDAY, MAY 8, 1984

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, with that nailed down, I am now prepared to say something that I did not want to say. But I have a long, unbroken record of saying things that I did not want to say.

As best I can tell, we are going to be decimated by absentees on Monday to the point where I would recommend against the Senate considering matters of great importance for fear that the outcome might be so unpredictable, or distorted, that it would not be truly representative. Therefore, Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that when the Senate completes its business today it stand in recess until the hour of 9:30 a.m. on tomorrow, at which time the Senate will be convened in pro forma session; and that as soon as it is convened without any business being transacted without any opening prayer, without any intervening business, and without any debate, that the Chair will place the Senate then in recess until the hour of 10 a.m. on Tuesday next.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the request? Without objection, it is so ordered.

CELEBRATION ON TUESDAY OF PRESIDENT TRUMAN'S BIRTHDAY

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, Senators are reminded that also on Tuesday at 10 a.m. there is a centennial celebration of the birth of the former President Harry Truman. But I believe that will not interfere with the convening of the Senate, and the routine business that always occupies the Senate in the beginning hours.

With that arrangement, Mr. President, I also wish to say that there will be no more record votes today.

ROUTINE MORNING BUSINESS

Mr BAKER. Mr. President, unless some Senator is seeking recognition to speak on the bill, I ask unanimous consent that there now be a period for the transaction of routine morning business to extend not later than 6 p.m., in which Senators may speak for 1 minute each, with the exception of the two leaders who shall not be restricted.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, there is a little bit of business that can be transacted by unanimous consent, I believe. While our able assistants are pulling that together, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The bill clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

THE CALENDAR

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, I have a few items in my folder that appear to be approved for action by unanimous consent.

I would inquire of the minority leader if he is in a position to consider the following three items: First, I will propose to indefinitely postpone S. 1979, Calendar Order No. 785; then to pass by unanimous consent H.R. 4176, Calendar Order No. 826; and also to pass House Joint Resolution 537, Calendar Order No. 829.

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, I am happy to say to the distinguished majority leader that those three items are cleared on this side for action.

Mr. BAKER. I thank the minority leader.

ORDER TO INDEFINITELY POSTPONE S. 1979

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that S. 1979 be indefinitely postponed.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

ORDER OF PROCEDURE

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, if the minority leader does not mind, I ask unanimous consent that the two remaining measures, H.R. 4176 and House Joint Resolution 537, be considered en bloc.

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, there is no objection.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

BOUNDARIES OF THE SOUTHERN UTE INDIAN RESERVATION

The bill (H.R. 4176) to confirm the boundaries of the Southern Ute Indian Reservation in the State of Colorado and to define jurisdiction within such reservation, was considered, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

EDWIN B. FORSYTHE NATIONAL WILDLIFE REFUGE

The Senate proceeded to consider House Joint Resolution 537 designating the Brigantine and Barnegat units of the National Wildlife Refuge System as the Edwin B. Forsythe National Wildlife Refuge.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. President, Senators BRADLEY and LAUTENBERG introduced a similar resolution, Senate Joint Resolution 280, in the Senate. For the record, I would like to note that that resolution was mistakenly referred to the Committee on Energy and Natural Resources. It is properly the jurisdiction of the Committee on Environment and Public Works.

Mr. LAUTENBERG. Mr. President, last month, we marked the passing of a respected citizen of New Jersey and valued Member of the Congress, Ed Forsythe. I am pleased that the Senate is taking such prompt action on House Joint Resolution 537, which was approved by the House of Representatives earlier today. The language is very similar to the language of Senate Joint Resolution 280, which I sponsored with my colleague from New Jersey, Senator BRADLEY. The bill would designate the Brigantine and Barnegat Units of the National Wildlife Refuge System as the Edwin B. Forsythe National Wildlife Refuge. This is a fitting memorial to Ed Forsythe, and his contribution to his district, our State, and the public at large.

Ed Forsythe was in the midst of his seventh term as Representative for the 13th and old 6th Districts, when he passed away. The people of Moorestown, in Burlington County, perhaps know him best of all. Born in Pennsylvania, Ed was reared in Burlington County and was a longtime resident of Moorestown. His family owned a dairy farm nearby. He began his political career in Moorestown as a secretary to the board of adjustment. He rose to other local positions and was elected to the State senate in 1963, where he served in leadership positions until his election to the House of Representatives in 1970.

This measure acknowledges Ed Forsythe's contributions to preserving our precious wildlife and natural resources. He was a defender of our coast. He was a leader in the passage of the Endangered Species Act, the Fishery Conservation and Management Act, and the Nongame Wildlife Act. As ranking member of the Merchant Marine and Fisheries Committee, he occupied a valued role in the protection of the State's natural resources. The House resolution was sponsored by Congressman JOHN BREAUX, Ed's colleague in the House Merchant Marine and Fisheries Committee, and was cosponsored by the entire New Jersey delegation in the House as well as many others.

I urge the Senate to adopt the resolution as it was passed in the House today.

The joint resolution (H.J. Res. 537) was ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

The preamble was agreed to.

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, I move to reconsider the vote by which the measures were passed and agreed to.

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, I move to lay that motion on the table. The motion to lay on the table was agreed to.

ORDER OF PROCEDURE

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, the final item, perhaps, is a conference report to accompany S. 64. If the minority leader is prepared to do so, I will ask the Chair to present that matter to the Senate.

IRISH WILDERNESS ACT OF 1984—CONFERENCE REPORT

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, I submit a report of the committee of conference on S. 64 and ask for its immediate consideration.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The report will be stated.

The assistant legislative clerk read as follows:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendment of the House to the bill (S. 64) to establish the Irish Wilderness in Mark Twain National Forest, Missouri having met, after full and free conference, have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses this report, signed by a majority of the conferees.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the Senate will proceed to the consideration of the conference report.

(The conference report is printed in the House proceedings of the RECORD of April 9, 1984.)

Mr. DANFORTH. Mr. President, today is not March 17, but nonetheless, it is a great day for the Irish—the Irish Wilderness, that is.

Since 1973, the Senators from Missouri have been trying to win wilderness designation for this small area in the southern part of our State, bordering the Eleven Point River. It is a place of special beauty, very dear to those in Missouri and throughout the Midwest who want to preserve and protect our rare enclaves of wildness unspoiled by man.

The House has now approved the conference report on S. 64, and we have reached the point of final congressional action. This Senator would like to express his special appreciation to the chairman of the Energy Committee (Mr. MCCLURE) and the chairman of the Subcommittee on Public Lands (Mr. WALLOP) for their enormous patience and perseverence in moving this bill along its tortuous track toward enactment.

Mr. President, I urge adoption of the conference report.

Mr. EAGLETON. Mr. President, I am pleased to support the conference report on the Irish Wilderness, S. 64. It is the culmination of 10 years work to preserve some 16,500 acres of wilderness in southern Missouri. This is the final parcel in Missouri's wilderness system, and has been called the "crown jewel" of the Missouri system.

The conference report is a fair compromise between the House- and Senate-passed bills, and I believe represents an equitable balance between the conservationists and mining interests. The conference report splits the difference of acres deleted from the Senate bill, and provides for 1,020 acres to be left open for mining exploration and mining should lead or other valuable gems be found. I would have liked to have protected all of the 17,000 acres, but I believe it is a fair tradeoff.

I am delighted that after 10 years of congressional work on this legislation that the Senate is now ready to take the final vote on protection for the Irish Wilderness.

This could not have taken place without the tireless efforts of so many throughout the years. I would like to thank my colleague Senator DANFORTH for his work; Senator MCCLURE and Senator WALLOP for their efforts in sheparding the bill through the Energy and Natural Resources Committee. Congressman HAROLD VOLKMER and Congressman JOHN SEIBERLING have also provided invaluable time and leadership on this bill.

I would be remiss if I did not also recognize the valiant efforts of all Missourians, and especially note the leadership of Mr. John Karel, Mr. Greg Iffrig, and Mrs. Dorothy Ellis.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the conference report.

The conference report was agreed to.

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, I move to reconsider the vote by which the conference report was agreed to.

Mr. BYRD. I move to lay that motion on the table.

The motion to lay on the table was agreed to.

ORDER FOR COMMITTEES TO FILE REPORTS ON MONDAY, MAY 7, 1984

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, I have not discussed this with the minority leader, but I think he will not object. I ask unanimous consent that the committees be permitted to file reports on Monday from 9 a.m. to 3 p.m.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

HARRY TRUMAN CENTENNIAL

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, may I say that there will be a centennial celebration of the birth of former President Harry Truman on Tuesday. While there is no provision for a joint session or a joint meeting of the two bodies, there will be an assembly of Members in the Hall of the House of Representatives. Members are urged to attend that ceremony and to assemble here, in the Senate Chamber, so we may proceed together to the House Chamber for that purpose.

Once again, it is not a joint meeting or a joint session, but it appears desirable that those who are going to attend might assemble in this body so we may proceed to the House together instead of separately.

EXECUTIVE CALENDAR

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, I have not conferred with the minority leader about the Executive Calendar. According to our notes, there has been only one item cleared for action at this time. I refer to the nomination of Bruce E. Thompson, Jr., of Maryland, to be Deputy Under Secretary of the Treasury. May I inquire of the minority leader if he is prepared to consider that item at this time?

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, the minority is so prepared.

EXECUTIVE SESSION

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the Senate now proceed into executive session to consider that nomination.

There being no objection, the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business.

DEPARTMENT OF THE TREASURY

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The nomination will be stated.

The bill clerk read the nomination of Bruce E. Thompson, Jr., of Maryland, to be a Deputy Under Secretary of the Treasury.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the nomination is considered and confirmed.

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, I move to reconsider the vote by which the nomination was considered and confirmed.

Mr. BYRD. I move to lay that motion on the table.

The motion to lay on the table was agreed to.

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the President be immediately notified that the Senate has given its consent to this nomination.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

LEGISLATIVE SESSION

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the Senate return to legislative session.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

MESSAGES FROM THE PRESIDENT

Messages from the President of the United States were communicated to the Senate by Mr. Saunders, one of his secretaries.

EXECUTIVE MESSAGES REFERRED

As in executive session, the Acting President pro tempore laid before the Senate messages from the President of the United States submitting sundry nominations which were referred to the appropriate committees.

(The nominations received today are printed at the end of the Senate proceedings.)

ANNUAL REPORT OF THE COMMODITY CREDIT CORPORATION—MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT—PM 133

The PRESIDING OFFICER laid before the Senate the following message from the President of the United States, together with an accompanying report; which was referred to the Committee on Agriculture, Nutrition, and Forestry:

To the Congress of the United States:

Pursuant to the provisions of Section 13, Public Law 806, 80th Congress, I hereby transmit the report of the Commodity Credit Corporation for the fiscal year ended September 30, 1983.

REPORT ON NATIONAL EMERGENCY WITH RESPECT TO IRAN—MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT—PM 134

The PRESIDING OFFICER laid before the Senate the following message from the President of the United States; which was referred to the Committee on Banking, Housing, and Urban Affairs:

To the Congress of the United States:

Pursuant to Section 204(c) of the International Emergency Economic Powers Act (IEEPA), 50 U.S.C. Section 1703(c), I hereby report to the Congress with respect to developments between my last report of November 4, 1983, and mid-April 1984, concerning the national emergency with respect to Iran that was declared in Executive Order No. 12170 of November 14, 1979.

1. The Iran-United States Claims Tribunal, established at The Hague pursuant to the Claims Settlement Agreement of January 19, 1981, continues to make progress in arbitrating the claims of U.S. nationals against Iran. Since my last report, the Tribunal has rendered 36 more decisions for a total of 118 final decisions. Eighty-five of these decisions have been awards in favor of American claimants. Sixty of these were awards on agreed terms, authorizing and approving payment of settlements negotiated by the parties and 25 were adjudicated. Total payments to successful American claimants from the Security Account stood at over $193.1 million, as of March 31, 1984. Of the remaining 33 decisions, 16 dismissed claims for lack of jurisdiction, 3 partially dismissed claims for lack of jurisdiction, 11 dismissed claims on the merits, two approved withdrawal of a claim and one was an award in favor of the Government of Iran. As of March 31, the Tribunal had held 143 prehearing conferences and 88 hearings on the merits and had scheduled another 19 perhearings and 17 hearings through the end of September.

2. The Department of State continues to coordinate the efforts of the concerned government agencies in presenting U.S. claims against Iran as well as U.S. responses to claims brought by Iran. The Department continues to devote a great deal of time to responding to cases brought by Iran under Articles II(3) and VI(4) of the Claims Settlement Agreement, which establish Tribunal jurisdiction over questions of interpretation and implementation of the Algiers Accords. Since my last report, the Tribunal has issued an award in favor of the United States in one of these cases, holding that it had no jurisdiction over Iran's standby letter of credit claims except as counterclaims to claims brought on the underlying contract. The Full Tribunal has also determined that it does have jurisdiction over claims by individuals possessing both U.S. and Iranian nationality, as well as claims by nonprofit organizations. In both instances, the Tribunal's decisions largely accorded with the position taken by the United States. Although the United States has filed replies in all of the interpretive cases, Iran has failed to do so and most of the hearings scheduled for the past six months have been cancelled.

3. Since my last report, a few government-to-government claims based on contracts for the provision of goods or services have been resolved. The United States withdrew three claims following the receipt of payment from Iran for each claim. In addition, the Tribunal dismissed on jurisdictional grounds one claim filed by Iran and one claim filed by the United States, stating that neither was based on contract. It also issued an award in favor of Iran in one claim arising from monies deposited by the Iranian Department of the Environment with the Environmental Protection Agency. In all three claims, the Tribunal based its decision solely on the pleadings. It will most likely continue this practice with most of the remaining official claims.

4. Over the last six months, the Tribunal has continued to make progress in arbitrating the claims of U.S. nationals for $250,000 or more. More than 25 percent of these claims have been disposed of through adjudication, settlement, or voluntary withdrawal, leaving 381 claims on the docket. The Tribunal has rendered a number of significant decisions for American claimants. It has held that expropriation may be either de facto or de jure and that compensation for expropriated property must be prompt, adequate and effective. It has also decided that noncontractual Iranian counterclaims based on taxes allegedly owed by the U.S. claimant are outside its jurisdiction. As I reported in my last report, the Tribunal has requested Iran to stay court proceedings in Iran against at least eight U.S. nationals who have filed claims at the Tribunal on similar issues, but to date Iran has not complied with these requests.

5. In December 1983, the Tribunal adopted a test case approach for arbitrating claims for less than $250,000 which, as a result of withdrawals, terminations, and settlements, now number 2,706. (The procedure to be used was described in my last report.) Two additional legal officers have joined the Tribunal's staff to work exclusively on these claims. The Tribunal has selected 18 test cases and has begun to set deadlines for Iran's Statements of Defense and, in some cases, has requested Supplemental Statements of Claim from the United States. In March 1984, the Tribunal selected an additional 50 claims at random for which the United States has been requested to file Supplemental Statements of Claim. The Department of State is accordingly in the process of preparing the factual and legal argumentation for all of these claims.

6. In the last six months, there have also been some changes in the composition of the Tribunal. Richard M. Mosk, one of the three U.S. arbitrators, resigned effective January 15, 1984, and Charles N. Brower has replaced him. Mr. Brower, who had previously been named a substitute arbitrator, is a well-known international lawyer who has served as a senior member of the Office of the Legal Adviser of the Department of State. Mr. Mosk is now acting as a substitute arbitrator. In addition, Carl F. Salans and William H. Levit, Jr. have been appointed substitute U.S. arbitrators. Mr. Salans, a member of the law firm of Salans Hertzfeld Heilbronn Beardsley & van Riel in Paris, France, has an extensive background in international adjudication, arbitration and negotiation. Mr. Levit, an experienced litigator, is a senior partner in the law firm of Godfrey & Kahn, Milwaukee, Wisconsin.

7. The January 19, 1981, agreements with Iran also provided for direct negotiations between U.S. banks and Bank Markazi Iran concerning the payment of nonsyndicated debt claims of U.S. banks against Iran from the $1.418 billion escrow account presently held by the Bank of England. Since my last report, only one additional settlement has been reached. The Bank of America received $472 million in settlement of its claim, of which $289.1 million was subsequently paid to Iran, primarily for interest on Iran's domestic deposits with the bank. Thus, as of March 31, 1984, there have been 25 bank settlements, totaling approximately $1.4 billion. Iran has received $616 million in settlement of its claims against the banks. About 24 bank claims remain outstanding.

8. On December 22, 1983, the Department of the Treasury amended Section 535.504 of the Iranian Assets Control Regulations to continue in effect indefinitely the prohibition of that section on any final judgment or order by a U.S. court disposing of any interest of Iran in any standby letter of credit, performance bond or similar obligation. The prohibition was promulgated to facilitate the ongoing implementation of the Algiers Accords and, especially, to allow the resolution before the Iran-United States Claims Tribunal of the many claims and issues pending before it involving letters of credit. The prohibition was extended indefinitely because it is not possible to predict how much time will be required in order to resolve these claims.

9. Although the Tribunal has made some progress over the past six months in arbitrating the claims before it, significant American interests remain unresolved. Iran has challenged the validity of four more of the Tribunal's awards in favor of U.S. claimants in the District Court of The Hague and has attempted to delay the arbitral process through repeated requests for extensions and failure to appear at Tribunal proceedings.

10. Financial and diplomatic aspects of the relationship with Iran continue to present an unusual challenge to the national security and foreign policy of the United States. I shall continue to exercise the powers at my disposal to deal with these problems and will continue to report periodically to the Congress on significant developments.

RONALD REAGAN.

THE WHITE HOUSE, May 3, 1984.

MESSAGES FROM THE HOUSE

At 10:52 a.m., a message from the House of Representatives, delivered by Mr. Berry, one of its reading clerks, announced that the House has passed the following bill, without amendment:

S. 1212. An act for the relief of 16 employees of the Charleston Naval Shipyard.

At 1:07 p.m., a message from the House of Representatives, delivered by Mr. Berry, one of its reading clerks, announced that the House agrees to the amendment of the Senate to the amendment of the House to the text of the bill (S. 597) to convey certain lands to Show Low, Ariz.; and that the House recedes from its amendment to the title of the bill.

The message also announced that the House agrees to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendment of the House to the bill (S. 64) to establish the Irish Wilderness in Mark Twain National Forest, Missouri.

The message further announced that the House insists upon its amendment to the bill (S. 38) entitled the "Longshoremen's and Harbor Workers' Compensation Act disagreed to by the Senate; it agrees to the conference asked by the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and appoints Mr. PERKINS, Mr. CLAY, Mr. MILLER of California, Mr. KILDEE, Mr. MARTINEZ, Mr. OWENS, Mr. HARRISON, Mrs. BURTON of California, Mr. ERLENBORN, Mr. PETRI, Mr. PACKARD, and Mr. MCCAIN as managers of the conference on the part of the House.

The message also announced that the House has passed the following bills, in which it requests the concurrence of the Senate:

H.R. 7. An act to make permanent certain of the authorizations of appropriations under the National School Lunch Act and the Child Nutrition Act of 1963;

H.R. 4263. An act to designate certain lands in the Cherokee National Forest, Tennessee, as wilderness areas, and to allow management of certain lands for uses other than wilderness; and

H.R. 5041. An act to promote research and development, encourage innovation, and make necessary and appropriate amendments to the antitrust laws.

ENROLLED BILL AND JOINT RESOLUTIONS SIGNED

The message further announced that the Speaker has signed the following enrolled bill and joint resolutions:

H.R. 2733. An act to extend and improve the existing program of research, development, and demonstration in the production and manufacture of guayule rubber, and to broaden such program to include other critical agricultural materials;

S.J. Res. 232. Joint resolution to authorize and request the President to designate the month of May 1984 as "National Physical Fitness and Sports Month"; and

H.J. Res. 478. Joint resolution designating the week of April 29 through May 5, 1984, as "National Week of the Ocean".

The enrolled bill and joint resolutions were subsequently signed by the President pro tempore (Mr. THURMOND).

At 5:49 p.m., a message from the House of Representatives, delivered by Mr. Berry, one of its reading clerks, announced that the House has passed the following joint resolutions, without amendment:

S.J. Res. 220. Joint resolution to designate the week of May 20, 1984, through May 26, 1984, as "National Arts With the Handicapped Week"; and

S.J. Res. 244. Joint resolution designating the week beginning on May 6, 1984, as "National Asthma and Allergy Awareness Week".

The message also announced that the House has passed the following bills, in which it requests the concurrence of the Senate:

H.R. 5100. An act authorizing appropriations to the Executive Director, United States Holocaust Memorial Council, for services necessary to perform the functions of the United States Holocaust Memorial Council;

H.R. 5172. An act to authorize appropriations to the Secretary of Commerce for the programs of the National Bureau of Standards for fiscal years 1984 and 1985, and for related purposes;

H.R. 5287. An act to amend title III of the Higher Education Act of 1965 to permit additional funds to be used to continue awards under certain multiyear grants.

The message further announced that the House has agreed to the following concurrent resolution, in which it requests the concurrence of the Senate:

H. Con. Res. 295. Concurrent resolution to permit the 1984 Olympic torch relay to be run through the United States Capitol Grounds.

MEASURES REFERRED

The following bills were read the first and second times by unanimous consent, and referred as indicated:

H.R. 7. An act to make permanent certain of the authorizations of appropriations under the National School Lunch Act and the Child Nutrition Act of 1963; to the Committee on Agriculture, Nutrition, and Forestry.

H.R. 4263. An act to designate certain lands in the Cherokee National Forest, Tennessee, as wilderness areas, and to allow management of certain lands for uses other than wilderness; to the Committee on Agriculture, Nutrition, and Forestry.

The following concurrent resolution was read, and referred as indicated:

H. Con. Res. 295. Concurrent resolution to permit the 1984 Olympic torch relay to be run through the United States Capitol Grounds; to the Committee on Rules and Administration.

MEASURE PLACED ON THE CALENDAR

Under the authority of the order of the Senate of May 2, 1984, the following bill was read the first and second times by unanimous consent, and placed on the calendar by unanimous consent:

H.R. 5287. An act to amend title III of the Higher Education Act of 1965 to permit additional funds to be used to continue awards under certain multiyear grants.

ENROLLED JOINT RESOLUTION PRESENTED

The Secretary announced that on today, May 3, 1984, he presented to the President of the United States the following joint resolution:

S.J. Res. 232. Joint resolution to authorize and request the President to designate the month of May 1984 as "National Physical Fitness and Sports Month".

EXECUTIVE AND OTHER COMMUNICATIONS

The following communications were laid before the Senate, together with accompanying papers, reports, and documents, which were referred as indicated:

EC-3152. A communication from the Chairman of the Nuclear Regulatory Commission, transmitting, pursuant to law, a report on abnormal occurrences at licensed nuclear plants for the third calendar quarter of 1983; to the Committee on Environment and Public Works.

EC-3153. A communication from the Secretary of the Interior and the Secretary of Commerce, jointly transmitting a report on the activities of the two Departments with respect to the Emergency Striped Bass Research Study during 1982 and 1983; to the Committee on Environment and Public Works.

EC-3154. A communication from the Chairman of the United States International Trade Commission, transmitting a draft of proposed legislation to provide authorization of appropriations for the United States International Trade Commission for fiscal year 1986; to the Committee on Finance.

EC-3155. A communication from the Secretary of Labor, transmitting, pursuant to law, a quarterly report on the expenditures and need for worker adjustment assistance training funds under the Trade Act of 1974; to the Committee on Finance.

EC-3156. PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS

The following petitions and memorials were laid before the Senate and were referred or ordered to lie on the table as indicated:

POM-630. A concurrent resolution adopted by the Iowa Bankers Association of Iowa concerning the distressed economic problems experienced by some of Iowa's farmers; to the Committee on Agriculture, Nutrition, and Forestry.

POM-631. A concurrent resolution adopted by the Legislature of the State of Iowa; to the Committee on Agriculture, Nutrition, and Forestry.

"SENATE CONCURRENT RESOLUTION No. 111

"Whereas, the state of Iowa, one of the major agricultural states in the United States, is suffering from a financial crisis in agriculture that affects not only the economic health of this state, but also the economic health of the midwestern and national economies, due to forces beyond the power of the state to control or abrogate; and

"Whereas, the viability of Iowa agriculture rests upon the 115,000 farms in this state, and a percentage of these farms have been beset by circumstances beyond their control including sustained high interest rates, declining land values which have eroded farm equity, commodity prices below the cost of production, and successive years of weather-related problems; and

"Whereas, a survey of farmers and financial institutions in Iowa conducted by the Iowa Department of Agriculture indicates that forty percent of the farms with land and operational loans have a debt-to-asset ratio of 41.7 percent when the state average is 29.5 percent, as compared to a state average of 14.3 percent in 1977, and that possibly ten percent of the farms in Iowa will not survive, resulting in the loss of 11,000 farms and 60,000 farm residents; and

"Whereas, the need for additional credit and refinancing for farmers through federally and state-chartered financial institutions has been exhausted, and the state government's budget reflects the fact that eight out of ten jobs in Iowa depend on the agricultural economy, leaving the state with insufficient resources to address this problem at a time when spring planting is only a few weeks away; and

"Whereas, there are federal emergency assistance programs available, that with proper and immediate modification, will allow those farms with the greatest need to qualify for additional and necessary assistance; now therefore,

"Be it resolved by the Senate, the House concurring. That the Seventieth General Assembly requests the following actions be immediately taken by the federal government to assist the state in providing this emergency assistance:

"1. Modify the Farmers Home Administration Emergency Loan Program for the 1983 drought disaster to include the following:

"a. Allow farmers with negative cash flows but sound equity positions and reasonable prospects of success to participate.

"b. Use 1982 price levels in the calculation of the loss and valuation of equity for collateral.

"c. Waive the 30 percent minimum loss criteria so that more farmers would have the opportunity to obtain some funding for 1984 at advantageous rates.

"d. Extend the sign-up period for an additional 60 to 90 days.

"2. Make additional credit available through the Farmers Home Administration under the low resource category to farmers with negative cash flows but with prospects of survival, especially when the interest rate savings will return their operation to a profitable basis.

"3. Allow deferral of the repayment for the advanced 1983 deficiency payment due in 1984 for at least one year.

"4. Modify the emergency feed grain program to make higher grades of corn available at lower costs, and lower the 30 percent loss criteria to expand the eligibility of livestock producers so that government corn can be utilized and at the same time improve 1984 farm profitability.

"5. Mandate the Small Business Administration to increase the number of loans accepted under disaster applications from agricultural businesses.

"6. Mandate the Internal Revenue Service to allow farmers the opportunity to sell their accumulated capital losses or investment tax credits to outside investors, thus encouraging investment in agriculture at a time when it is critical that new funds be found.

"7. Include grass and hay crops in the Federal Crop Insurance Program.

"8. Lower Federal Crop Insurance premiums for those farms which qualify for emergency disaster assistance.

"9. Pay the deficiency payments due for the 1984 feed grain program in advance.

"10. Allow grazing or baling of diverted acres under the 1984 Farm Program.

"11. Increase funding for the study of alternative uses for corn and soybeans; and

"Be it further resolved, That a copy of this resolution be transmitted to the President of the United States, the Vice President of the United States, the United States Secretary of Agriculture, and each member of the Iowa Congressional delegation."

POM-632. A resolution adopted by the Town of Provincetown, Massachusetts opposing the use of United States tax dollars for any type of military aid to any government of Central America, or for any overt or covert military activity aimed at destabilizing the government of any Central American nation; to the Committee on Appropriations.

POM-633. A resolution adopted by the Committee of the Township of Green, New Jersey relating to cable television; to the Committee on Commerce, Science, and Transportation.

POM-634. A resolution adopted by the City Council of Florissant, Missouri relating to the Cable Telecommunications Act; to the Committee on Commerce, Science, and Transportation.

POM-635. A concurrent resolution adopted by the Legislature of the State of Kansas; to the Committee on Commerce, Science, and Transportation.

"SENATE CONCURRENT RESOLUTION No. 1658

"Whereas, Federal law and regulation permits the formulation of discriminatory freight contracts involving agricultural commodities which unduly favor certain shippers; and

"Whereas, These discriminatory freight contracts generally have been offered to large shippers while small shippers are offered contracts that are not nearly as economical or advantageous; and

"Whereas, This discriminatory practice has placed so large a burden on small shippers trying to remain competitive in the marketplace, that they may be forced out of the shipping business; and

"Whereas, The Staggers Rail Act of 1980 (P.L. 96-448) and the discriminatory freight contracts that have been formulated thereunder have caused rural communities to lose rail service altogether due to the abandonment of rail branch lines; and

"Whereas, In addition, these discriminatory contracts have greatly increased the transportation of agricultural commodities to the large shippers on our highways which places a large burden on the states and their citizens to keep the highways in good condition; and

"Whereas, The Staggers Rail Act of 1980 has allowed the ICC to approve unreasonable high rates on captive coal traffic; and

"Whereas, These discriminatory contracts violate the concept of a competitive economy by providing a chosen few with noncompetitive advantages: Now, therefore,

"Be it resolved by the Senate of the State of Kansas, the House of Representatives concurring therein: That we memorialize the President and Congress to amend the Staggers Rail Act of 1980 as follows:

"(1) Require the full disclosure of all economic terms of rail contracts involving agricultural commodities;

"(2) apply a standard of reasonableness to market dominance by a rail carrier so that rail rates may be challenged as unreasonable at some level;

"(3) require mandatory joint-line rates and routes between rail carriers whose lines intersect and join;

"(4) require adequate notice of rail rate changes;

"(5) protest against discriminatory pricing and promote competitive, effective and economical transportation services by and between all modes;

"(6) establish new procedures permitting entry of additional rail carriers onto lines dominated by a single carrier;

"(7) grant agricultural shippers the right to reciprocal switching at reasonable cost to protect competition in all markets where more than one carrier is operating;

"(8) establish a national system of compensation and use that fairly and equitably treats both carrier-owned and shipper-owned and leased rail cars;

"(9) deny the ICC authority to exempt grain and oilseeds from rail regulation;

"(10) require that before an agricultural branch line may be abandoned the railroad must first prove to the ICC that the rate of return on investment on that branch line is less than the overall rate of return on investment of the entire railroad company as determined in the latest ICC's revenue adequacy determinations;

"(11) direct the ICC to interpret the Staggers Rail Act of 1980 in a manner which will be more receptive to the regulation of rates of captive coal shippers which was originally intended by Congress; and

"Be it further resolved: That the Secretary of State be directed to send enrolled copies of this resolution to the President of the United States Senate, the Speaker of the United States House of Representatives and each member of the Kansas Congressional Delegation."

POM-636. A joint resolution adopted by the Legislature of the State of Idaho; to the Committee on Energy and Natural Resources.

"HOUSE JOINT MEMORIAL No. 11

"We, your Memorialists, the House of Representatives and the Senate of the State of Idaho assembled in the Second Regular Session of the Forty-seventh Idaho Legislature, do hereby respectfully represent that:

"Whereas, the latest U.S. Department of Interior Northern Rocky Mountain Wolf (Canis lupus irremotus) Recovery 'Technical Review Draft' identifies as 'The Idaho Recovery Area' the Selway Bitterroot, River of No Return, Sawtooth and the Gospel Hump wilderness areas totaling about 3.75 million acres as well as about 3 million acres of U.S. Forest Service lands now managed as multiple use; and

"Whereas, the Northern Rocky Mountain Wolf Recovery Draft Management guidelines call for extreme curtailment of multiple use activities on those lands incorporated into any wolf recovery plan; and

"Whereas, the vast majority of testimony given at public hearings held in Idaho in regard to a wolf recovery project as well as comments submitted by the public on the Northern Rocky Mountain Wolf Recovery Plan overwhelmingly oppose any wolf recovery plan on lands now managed for multiple use and, indeed, to the entire Northern Rocky Mountain Wolf Recovery Plan itself; and

"Whereas, the environmental conditions that existed a century ago that were conducive to wolf habitat no longer exist today, particularly on lands now managed for multiple use; and

"Whereas, the Minnesota Wolf Recovery Plan has shown that the State has no effective control measures once the wolf population is restored: now, therefore,

"Be it resolved by the members of the Second Regular Session of the Forty-seventh Idaho Legislature, the House of Representatives and the Senate concurring therein, That the United States Department of Interior Fish and Wildlife Service is hereby urged to terminate any program to reestablish wolf populations in the State of Idaho that would deny Idahoans their historic rights and privileges on federal lands now managed as multiple use.

"Be it further resolved: That the Chief Clerk of the House of Representatives be, and she is hereby authorized and directed to forward copies of this Memorial to President Ronald Reagan, Secretary of the Interior William Clark, Secretary of Agriculture John R. Block, the President of the Senate and the Speaker of the House of Representatives of the United States in Congress assembled, the Chairman of the Senate Energy and Natural Resources Committee, the Chairman of the House Interior and Insular Affairs Committee, the congressional delegation representing the State of Idaho in the Congress of the United States, and the Governors of the western states."

POM-637. A resolution adopted by the Senate of the State of Hawaii; to the Committee on Energy and Natural Resources.

"SENATE RESOLUTION No. 128

"Whereas, the State of Hawaii is dependent on imported oil for approximately 90 per cent of its energy requirements and the development of alternative energy sources is a high priority in the State's efforts to increase energy self-sufficiency and to stimulate economic development; and

"Whereas, the BioEnergy Development Corp., a wholly owned subsidiary of C. Brewer and Co., since 1978 has had a cooperative agreement with the United States Department of Energy and later a subcontract with Martin Marietta Energy Systems, Inc., to demonstrate the technical and economic feasibility of developing eucalyptus plantations for energy production in Hawaii; and

"Whereas, the project has received $2.3 million in federal funds through March 1984 and C. Brewer and Co. has contributed resources totalling $630,625; and

"Whereas, the project is unique in the United States because it involves a very short crop rotation time of 6 years in contrast to other tree crops with rotation periods of several decades, and extensive experimentation is being conducted to determine the optimum cultivation and operation practices necessary for commercialization; and

"Whereas, an assessment after the first five years of the project found that '. . . production of biomass for fuel in short rotation eucalyptus planatations on existing land can have returns competitive with alternative land uses'; and

"Whereas, a crucial point has been reached in the project as the first crop is ready for harvest; however, additional funds are needed to verify harvesting costs and to determine further the economic feasibility of the concept; and

"Whereas, BioEnergy Development Corp. has requested a five-year extension of its subcontract with Martin Marietta Energy Systems, Inc., and $314,150 in funds for the year June 1, 1984 to May 31, 1985, and extension of the subcontract and continued funding would result in the greatest possible benefit from the eucalyptus tree demonstration project; now, therefore,

"Be it resolved by the Senate of the Twelfth Legislature of the State of Hawaii, Regular Session of 1984, That this body expresses its enthusiastic support of BioEnergy Development Corp.'s eucalyptus tree farm demonstration project as an important effort in alternative energy resource development in Hawaii and the nation; and

"Be it further resolved, That this body urges the United States Department of Energy and Martin Marietta Energy Systems, Inc., to provide additional funding to the BioEnergy Development Corp.'s eucalyptus tree farm project on the island of Hawaii, in order to allow continuation of the research and development efforts of six years so that results of the demonstration can benefit other biomass development efforts in the nation; and

"Be it further resolved, That certified copies of this Resolution be transmitted to the Secretary of the United States Department of Energy, the Chief Executive Officer of Martin Marietta Energy Systems, Inc., the Manager of BioEnergy Development Corp., the President of the United States Senate, the Speaker of the United States House of Representatives, the Chairpersons of the Senate Energy and Natural Resources Committee and the House Energy and Commerce Committee, and the members of Hawaii's congressional delegation."

"SENATE CONCURRENT RESOLUTION No. 1644

"Whereas, The United States Army Corps of Engineers has acquired over 340,000 acres of land pursuant to the Federal Flood Control Act of 1941, as amended; and

"Whereas, The United States Army Corps of Engineers has licensed over 106,000 acres of land it has acquired pursuant to the Federal Flood Control Act of 1941, as amended, to the Kansas fish and game commission; and

"Whereas, Upon acquisition of such land by the United States Army Corps of Engineers, such land is removed from the property tax rolls resulting in substantial loss of ad valorem property tax revenues to the local taxing units in which such land is located; and

"Whereas, The Federal Flood Control Act provides the 75% of all revenues derived from the land under the management of the United States Army Corps of Engineers be paid to the local taxing units in which such land is located as payment toward lost tax revenues from such land after it is removed from the tax rolls when acquired for flood control projects; and

"Whereas, Upon licensing of flood control land to the Kansas fish and game commission, payments to the local taxing units by the United States Army Corps of Engineers cease; and

"Whereas, The present licenses between the United States Army Corps of Engineers and the Kansas fish and game commission required that revenues derived from the land licensed to and under the management of the Kansas fish and game commission be expended on the flood control project of the licensed area, thereby prohibiting any payment to compensate the local taxing units for lost property tax revenues: Now, therefore,

"Be it resolved by the Senate of the State of Kansas, the House of Representatives concurring therein: That we urge the President and Congress to amend the procedures by which the United States Army Corps of Engineers licenses land to the Kansas fish and game commission to allow the commission to pay to the local taxing units in which flood control land is located a portion of the revenues derived from the land under the management of the Kansas fish and game commission to compensate the local taxing units for lost property tax revenues; and

"Be it further resolved: That the Secretary of State be directed to send enrolled copies of this resolution to the President of the United States, the President of the United States Senate, the Speaker of the United States House of Representatives, Senator Robert Dole, Senator Nancy Kassebaum, Representative Pat Roberts, Representative Jim Slattery, Representative Larry Winn, Representative Dan Glickman and Representative Bob Whittaker."

POM-639. A resolution adopted by the House of Representatives of the Commonwealth of Massachusetts; to the Committee on Finance.

"RESOLUTIONS

"Whereas, the introduction of industrial robots in the United States workplace is occurring without public policies in place to protect American business industry and American workers; and

"Whereas, certain studies indicate that 1.4 American jobs are displaced for every one job created by industrial robots; and

"Whereas, the Office of Technology Assessment (OTA) of the Congress of the United States convened an "exploratory workshop on the social impacts of robotics" in 1981; and

"Whereas, said OTA workshop noted that robots are being produced at a rate of about 1,500 per year, with predictions that this will probably increase to between 20,000 and 60,000 robots per year by the year 1990; and

"Whereas, the OTA identified major users of industrial robots, or planned major users, to include the domestic auto makers and large manufacturers such as General Electric Company; and

"Whereas, there are no national policies in place to help retrain workers displaced by industrial robots, to create public incentives for development of alternate technology systems designed around human beings, to create public incentives to help domestic employers compete fairly with foreign competitors who are more advanced in the use of robotics; and

"Whereas, there are no national policies in place to finance retraining of workers and public incentives for business and industry; and

"Whereas, a transaction tax on foreign and domestic made robots may be deemed to be in the public interest; therefore be it

"Resolved, That the Massachusetts House of Representatives hereby urges the United States House of Representatives and the United States Senate to move expeditiously to develop a national policy to protect American employers and American workers by providing retraining for displaced workers affording public incentives for alternate technology systems for displaced businesses and industries, and by determining the most appropriate tax policies to achieve protection of American businesses, industries and workers displaced by robotics; and be it further

"Resolved, That a copy of these resolutions be forwarded by the clerk of the House of Representatives to the Presiding Officers of both Houses of the United States Congress and the Members thereof from this commonwealth."

POM-640. Recommendations and resolution adopted by the North Atlantic Assembly at their 29th annual session; to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

POM-641. A resolution adopted by the Western States Land Commissioners Association concerning issues which affect significantly the land resources of the West; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

POM-642. A joint resolution adopted by the General Assembly of the State of Colorado; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

"HOUSE JOINT RESOLUTION No. 1021

"Whereas, Between 1960 and 1975 more than three million American soldiers, sailors, airmen, and marines served their country in Southeast Asia; and

"Whereas, The great majority of such veterans were neither professional soldiers nor volunteers but merely young men called by this country to do their duty; and

"Whereas, Unlike the honored veterans of past wars, the Vietnam veterans returned to indifference, embarrassment, and even hostility; and

"Whereas, A nation ambivalent about the war in which its young men fought and died has gradually increased its recognition and has recently honored the Vietnam veterans for their sacrifice by the dedication of the Vietnam Veterans Memorial in Washington, D.C., in November, 1982; and

"Whereas, The debt owed the Vietnam veterans by their country derives not from the success of its policies but from the nobility of their sacrifice; and

"Whereas, The deeds and actions of these Americans need to be remembered so that all present and future generations may recall their sacrifices; and

"Whereas, The Congress of the United States has declared May 7, 1975, as the termination date of United States involvement in Vietnam; now, therefore;

"Be it resolved by the House of Representatives of the Fifty-fourth General Assembly of the State of Colorado, the Senate concurring herein: That May 7 shall be designated Vietnam Veterans' Recognition Day to honor those who served their country bravely and honorably in Southeast Asia.

"Be it further resolved, That a copy of this Resolution be transmitted to the President of the United States, the Congress of the United States, and the Veterans Administration."

POM-643. A resolution adopted by the Senate of the State of Michigan; to the Committee on Labor and Human Resources.

"SENATE RESOLUTION No. 149

"Whereas, There currently exists on the part of the United States government a desperate need to accelerate its commitment and attention to programs and services for the prevention, treatment, and cure of arthritis and other musculoskeletal disorders. Regarded as the most widespread of diseases afflicting Americans, arthritis debilitates nearly one out of every seven of our countrymen; and

"Whereas, Presently, the federal government arthritis programs are grouped with several unrelated diseases in the National Institutes of Arthritis, Diabetes, Digestive and Kidney Diseases. However, the prevalence of arthritis and related diseases among Americans, and its financial, social, and personal toll, make it imperative that a separate institute be established to concentrate solely on this problem; and

"Whereas, During the Ninety-seventh Congress, both the House of Representatives and the Senate passed separate legislation, supported by the Arthritis Foundation, which contained provisions to create an Arthritis Institute. However, time expired before a single bill could be passed by both houses. Under the proposed legislation, the new institute would conduct, assist, and foster research coordination within the institute and among other research programs in the National Institutes of Health and elsewhere. Moreover, it would operate an information clearinghouse and administer programs of research training in the international exchange of experts. Furthermore, the creation of an Arthritis Institute would result in major advances in the prevention, treatment, and cure of this disease. Certainly, the great human and economic benefit that this institute would offer to the citizens of our nation make it incumbent upon the members of the Michigan Senate to call on the Congress of the United States to adopt legislation establishing such an institute; now, therefore, be it

"Resolved by the Senate, That the members of this legislative body memorialize the Congress of the United States to adopt legislation establishing an Arthritis Institute within the National Institutes of Health; and be it further"

Fred William Alvarez, of New Mexico, to be a Member of the Equal Employment Opportunity Commission for the term expiring July 1, 1988.

(The above nomination was reported from the Committee on Labor and Human Resources with the recommendation that it be confirmed, subject to the nominee's commitment to respond to requests to appear and testify before any duly constituted committee of the Senate.)

By Mr. Tower, from the Committee on Armed Services:

Mr. TOWER. Mr. President, from the Committee on Armed Services, I report favorably the following nominations: Gen. John W. Vessey, Jr., to be appointed to serve for a second term as the Chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff, Lt. Gen. James A. Abrahamson, U.S. Air Force, to be reassigned in the grade of lieutenant general, and Lt. Gen. William I. Rolya, U.S. Army, (age 56) to be placed on the retired list. I ask that these names be placed on the Executive Calendar.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. TOWER. Mr. President, in addition, in the Army there are 10 permanent promotions to the grade of lieutenant colonel and below (list begins with Pamela K. Burns), in the Army there are 978 appointments to the grade of second lieutenant (list begins with Troy A. Aarthun), in the Naval Reserve there are 454 permanent promotions to the grade of captain (list begins with Edward Ronald Abel), in the Naval Reserve there are 25 permanent appointments to the grade of ensign and below (list begins with Richard P. Anderson), and in the Marine Corps there are 166 permanent appointments to the grade of second lieutenant (list begins with Daniel J. Adams). Since these names have already appeared in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD and to save the expense of printing again, I ask unanimous consent that they be ordered to lie on the Secretary's desk for the information of any Senator.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

(The nominations ordered to lie on the Secretary's desk were printed in the RECORD of April 24, 1984, at the end of the Senate proceedings.)

INTRODUCTION OF BILLS AND JOINT RESOLUTIONS

The following bills and joint resolutions were introduced, read the first and second time by unanimous consent, and referred as indicated:

By Mr. DOMENICI:

S. 2627. A bill to establish a system of natural resources research institutes within the States of the United States-Mexico border region; to the Committee on Labor and Human Resources.

By Mr. DENTON:

S. 2628. A bill to authorize appropriations for title X of the Public Health Service Act; to the Committee on Labor and Human Resources.

By Mr. COHEN (for himself, Mr. TSONGAS, Mr. HATFIELD, Mr. BUMPERS, Mr. CRANSTON, Mr. HART, Mr. PELL, and Mr. SARBANES):

S. 2629. A bill to amend the Energy Conservation in Existing Buildings Act of 1976 to provide for the weatherization of the remaining eligible low income dwelling units throughout the United States, to create additional employment in weatherization related industries, and for other purposes; to the Committee on Labor and Human Resources.

STATEMENTS ON INTRODUCED BILLS AND JOINT RESOLUTIONS

By Mr. DOMENICI:

S. 2627. A bill to establish a system of natrual resources research institutes within the States of the United States-Mexico border region; to the Committee on Labor and Human Resources.

BORDER STATES NATURAL RESOURCES RESEARCH ACT OF 1984

Mr. DOMENICI. Mr. President, today I an introducing legislation to support and continue research into the wise management, use, and development of natural resources in the United States-Mexico border region. I am prompted to introduce this legislation because of the extreme pressures that are presently, and will be in the future, placed on this rapidly growing and developing region.

In the United States, the Sunbelt of the Southwest has grown at extraordinary rates, and all projections point to continued substantial growth. On the Mexican side of the border, a national population growth rate of 3.2 percent per year is projected, which translates into a doubling of the national population every 20 years.

This population growth on both sides of the border will place tremendous pressures on the natural resources of the area—including water, land, and air resources. Coupled with the demands of the burgeoning population will be continued development of the substantial energy reserves in the Colorado River Basin. Further development will place additional demands on the limited water resources which will directly affect water users downstream from the development.

Water quality, as well as quantity, is a critical concern of the border region. Recent media attention has focused on the pollution traveling from Mexico to southern California in the New River. This pollution threatens public health in California. Contaminated water of the San Pedro River is traveling from Mexico into Arizona. That pollution threatens agricultural lands and crops, and residents are concerned about possible adverse health effects.

Air resources are similarly threatened. For example, NO_x emissions are significant in the border region. In fact, one study estimates that those border emissions represent 37.7 percent of the national emissions of nitrogen oxide. Additional growth and development will simply place an even further strain on air resources of the region.

Therefore, I am introducing legislation to establish a system of Border Natural Resources Research Institutes within the institutions of higher education of the four border States of Arizona, California, New Mexico, and Texas. The institutes would devote research efforts into developing strategies to effectively manage and develop the resources of the border region. They are eligible for grants from the Department of Education to support such research. The legislation authorizes $1,200,000 for fiscal year 1985, $1,600,000 for fiscal year 1986, and $2,000,000 for fiscal year 1987 for grants, and appropriated funds must be awarded equally among each of the four border States.

Mr. President, this is a modest program, but one that is essential for one of the most rapidly growing areas of the country. The legislation envisions research into problems that presently exist in the area, but also affords us the opportunity to address and avoid problems that could arise in the future because of the demands placed on the area. I believe that this is an exceedingly important program, and urge its adoption.

I ask unanimous consent that the text of this legislation be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the bill was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

S. 2627

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That this Act may be cited as the "Border States Natural Resources Research Act of 1984".

SEC. 2. (a) The Congress finds that—

(1) natural resources in the United States-Mexico border region constitute a far-reaching asset of immense significance to the United States;

(2) it is in the national interest of the United States to develop the skilled manpower (including scientists, engineers and technicians) and the knowledge necessary for the prudent utilization and management of these resources; and

(3) the wise management of the border natural resources can substantially benefit the United States and people of the region by providing greater economic opportunities, including expanded employment and commerce, and the enjoyment and use of these resources.

(b) It is, therefore, the purpose of this Act to establish a system of border States natural resources research institutes to—

(1) stimulate, sponsor and assist present research programs on management and utilization of natural resources in the United States-Mexico border region; and

(2) train specialists in natural resources in the United States-Mexico border region.

DEFINITIONS

SEC. 3. For the purpose of this Act:

(1) The term "border State" means the States of Arizona, California, New Mexico and Texas.

(2) The term "institute" means a natural resources institute, center, or other equivalent division of an institution of higher education.

(3) The term "institution of higher education" has the same meaning given such term by section 1201(a) of the Higher Education Act of 1965.

(4) The term "natural resources" means physical, chemical, geological and biological resources.

(5) The term "natural resources research" includes scientific, engineering, legal, social, political and economic studies relating to the management, use, development, recovery and control of the natural resources in the United States-Mexico border region.

(6) The term "Secretary" means the Secretary of Education.

GRANTS AUTHORIZED

SEC. 4. (a)(1) The Secretary is authorized, in accordance with the provisions of this Act, to make grants to one or more institutions of higher education to establish and support border natural resources research institutes in each border State.

(2) In order to receive assistance under this Act an institution of higher education must—

(A) be located in a border State, and

(B) have a competent and qualified natural resources institute.

(b)(1) There are authorized to be appropriated $1,200,000 for fiscal year 1985; $1,600,000 for fiscal year 1986; and $2,000,000 for fiscal year 1987 to carry out the provisions of this Act.

(2) The Secretary shall distribute amounts appropriated under paragraph (1) of this subsection in each fiscal year equally among the border States.

USES OF FUNDS

SEC. 5. (a)(1) Grants under this Act shall be used to initiate and support natural resources research programs and provide for the training of specialists of border States natural resources problems.

(2) Such research may include—

(A) examination of aspects of water resources, land resources, air resources, and other border natural resources problems; and

(B) information dissemination activities (including identifying, assembling, interpreting and publishing the results of research deemed potentially significant for the solution of border States natural resources problems); providing means for improved communication reggarding such research results (including prototype operations); and ascertaining the existing and potential effectiveness of such research for aiding in the solution of practical problems (taking into account the varying conditions and needs of the respective border States and the research projects being conducted by agencies of the Federal and State governments in border States, the agricultural experiment stations, and others).

(b) Funds paid to an institution of higher education for use by an institute may be used for any allowable costs within the meaning of the Federal procurement regulations that establish principles for determining costs applicable to research and development under grants and contracts with educational institutions (41 CFR 1-15.3), including future amendments to such regulations.

APPLICATIONS

SEC. 6. (a) Each institution of higher education located in a border State desiring to receive assistance under this Act shall submit an application to the Secretary at such time and in such manner and containing or accompanied by such information as the Secretary may reasonably require. Each such application shall—

(1) describe the activities of the institution of higher education for which assistance is sought;

(2) describe the programs and activities for which assistance is sought;

(3) designate an officer of the institution of higher education as the officer responsible for the administration of the program assembled under this Act;

(4) provide such fiscal control and funds accounting procedures as may be necessary to assure the proper disbursal of and accounting for Federal funds paid under this Act;

(5) provide assurances that the institution of higher education will prepare and submit an annual report to the Secretary on or before the first day of September of each year, on work accomplished and that status of project underway, together with a detailed statement of the amounts received under this Act during the preceding fiscal year, and of its disbursement; and

(6) such other assurances as the Secretary may reasonably require.

(b) The Secretary shall approve an application from each institution of higher education which meets the requirements of subsection (a) of this section.

COOPERATIVE RESEARCH

SEC. 7. Each institution of higher education receiving assistance under this Act, shall, to the extent practicable, plan and conduct programs of each institute receiving assistance under this Act in cooperation with other agencies which may contribute to the solution of the border States natural resources problems. Funds made available under this Act may be used for paying the necessary expenses of planning, coordinating and conducting such cooperative research.

PAYMENTS

SEC. 8. From allocations made pursuant to section 4(b)(2), the Secretary shall pay to the institutions of higher education located in each border State the cost of applications approved under section 6.

ADMINISTRATION

SEC. 9. The Secretary shall furnish such advice and assistance as will best promote the purposes of this Act, and encourage and assist in the establishment and maintenance of cooperation among institutions of higher education located in the border States receiving assistance under this Act and other research organizations located in border States.

By Mr. COHEN (for himself, Mr. TSONGAS, Mr. HATFIELD, Mr. BUMPERS, Mr. CRANSTON, Mr. HART, Mr. PELL, and Mr. SARBANES):

S. 2629. A bill to amend the Energy Conservation in Existing Buildings Act of 1976 to provide for the weatherization of the remaining eligible low-income dwelling units throughout the United States, to create additional employment in weatherization-related industries, and for other purposes; to the Committee on Labor and Human Resources.

WEATHERIZATION AMENDMENTS OF 1984

● Mr. COHEN. Mr. President, the weatherization of older, drafty, and poorly insulated homes is crucial to the ability of low-income, elderly, and unemployed individuals who, out of economic necessity, want to reduce their home energy costs. In addition, weatherization is one of the most cost-effective ways we can reduce our national and regional dependence on costly imported oil.

For these reasons, I am sponsoring legislation reauthorizing the weatherization program and setting up a 10-year, $13 billion program aimed at weatherizing an estimated 13 million homes now eligible and in need of such assistance.

Through this legislation, additional jobs will be created and further energy savings will be achieved, enhancing significantly the long-term security of the United States. An important need on the part of the elderly, low-income, and unemployed will also be met through the weatherization program.

As a Senator from a cold-weather State, I have long been sensitive to the severe personal hardship increases in home energy prices have had on many households over the past several years. The cost of residential fuel oil has tripled from the 1976 average price of 40.6 cents a gallon to the present average price of $1.19 per gallon. Just when the cost of home heating oil began to stabilize, the price of natural gas began to soar.

This past winter in Maine again demonstrated the vulnerability of certain segments of our population to rapid increases in energy prices. In a 6-week period between mid-December and the beginning of February, prices rose an average of 18.5 cents a gallon for heating oil, and, in some areas of the State, they rose by 25 cents.

A recent study published by the National Consumer Law Center concludes that low-income, elderly, and unemployed residents of Maine pay a proportionally greater amount of their income for energy purposes than do residents of other States. Fully 71 percent of monthly income is spent by some poorer residents of Maine on their winter energy costs. That figure assumes added significance when one considers the low and often limited incomes on which these individuals depend. This study is the latest evidence validating the need for an expended weatherization assistance program.

It is with concern for such affected individuals and families that supporters of the Federal weatherization program seek to extend it for another 10 years, demonstrating the Federal commitment to this program and aiming to achieve the goal of improving the energy efficiency of the remaining 13 million eligible households in America.

The key provisions of this legislation are the following:

First, the establishment of a 10-year goal for the weatherization of all eligible units. To reach this goal, $500 million is authorized in fiscal year 1985, $850 million in fiscal year 1986, $1.15 billion in fiscal year 1987, and $1.5 billion in each of the next 7 fiscal years;

Second, strengthened language to insure that adequate funds are used for evaluation, monitoring, and information transfer, with the goals of identifying the costs of weatherization and the amount of energy that can be saved, identifying ways to cut program costs and enhance energy savings, and developing recommendations for program improvements; and Third, the earmarking of $40 million for a 2-year low-income rental housing weatherization pilot program. Grant candidates would submit proposed housing projects to DOE, which would award grants on a competitive basis after review by a public advisory committee. The results of the pilot would then be circulated to all low-income weatherization program officers for their information and possible emulation.

I believe these provisions of the bill will result in a strengthened Federal weatherization program, increased availability and dissemination of important program-related information, and a more cost-effective energy savings program.

The Federal weatherization program has resulted in the weatherization of over 1 million homes since the program's inception in 1977, contributing energy savings of 15 to 30 percent for enrolled households.

Much work remains to be done if we are to achieve the twin objectives of reduced dependence on imported sources of energy and increased energy savings for those who can least afford the costs of heating or cooling a home.

The Federal weatherization program is an extremely valuable one and its reauthorization deserves the attention of the Senate this year.●

Mr. CRANSTON. Mr. President, I am delighted to join in cosponsoring S. 2629, the Weatherization Amendments of 1984.

The development of programs designed to meet the weatherization needs of low-income persons in this country has long been an area of special concern for me. In 1974, I coauthored legislation creating in the Economic Opportunity Act of 1964, a special program for "emergency energy conservation services." This became the sole Federal authority for low-income energy aid at that time. In 1975, as a member of the Banking Committee, I authored in the Senate the Residential Insulation Assistance Act of 1975, which was ultimately enacted as the Energy Conservation in Existing Buildings Act of 1976, title IV-A of the Energy Conservation and Production Act (Public Law 94-385). This measure authorized the Federal Energy Administration to establish the national weatherization assistance program for low-income households, the program which is being extended and expanded in the legislation being introduced today. This weatherization program, operated by the Department of Energy—DOE—since the old Federal Energy Administration was incorporated into the new DOE, is the sole Federal categorical grant program for weatherization assistance. A similar program in the Community Services Administration was phased out in 1978. The authorization for appropriations for this DOE weatherization program was extended by the National Energy Conservation Policy Act of 1978 (Public Law 95-619) and the Energy Security Act of 1980 (Public Law 96-294). Appropriations for this program are currently authorized through fiscal year 1984 under the Omnibus Reconciliation Act of 1981 (Public Law 95-35).

The low-income weatherization assistance program provides grants to States, which work through local governments, community action agencies, and nonprofit organizations, to weatherize the homes of low-income persons. Weatherization funds are used to purchase materials for insulating homes, as well as for associated labor costs. Currently, up to $1,600 may be spent in areas of high labor costs—such as many areas of California—on a single household for weatherization materials and labor. The measure we are introducing today would raise that ceiling on expenses to $2,000.

Mr. President, recipients of weatherization grants from States are directed to give priority to households with older Americans or disabled persons. Other eligible individuals include those with incomes at or below 125 percent of poverty guidelines issued by the Department of Health and Human Services—households with a member who received benefits under the aid to families with dependent children or supplemental security income programs within the previous year, and recipients of State and local assistance programs.

Mr. President, approximately 1 million eligible homes have been weatherized since the implementation of DOE's weatherization program. According to the House Committee on Energy and Commerce, it is estimated that there are 13 million more eligible units that are still in need of weatherization. The legislation we are introducing today has an ambitious goal: to weatherize the remaining 13 million units over the next 10 years.

NEED FOR WEATHERIZATION OF REMAINING UNITS

Mr. President, no segment of society has been more profoundly affected by the high energy costs of the last decade than low-income families. The high fuel bills which plagued the entire Nation have demanded a disproportionate share—sometimes ranging up to 40 percent—of a low-income family's income. Although frequently in need of substanital weatherization efforts because of their older, energy inefficient housing, low-income families are the least able to afford the initial expense of weatherizing their homes. These families face the frustrating cycle of high fuel bills year after year because they lack the means to make their homes more energy efficient.

Weatherization of low-income persons' homes is clearly a way of breaking this catch-22 cycle of recurrent, overwhelming fuel costs. For example, a 1981 study by the Consumer Energy Council found that weatherization resulted in an average savings of 27 percent in the fuel bills of low-income persons. In some cases, modifications costing only $500 made to existing energy equipment may result in a 20- to 25-percent savings in fuel costs for these households.

In addition, the benefits of weatherizing the 13 million remaining eligible units are not limited to the cost-savings that would accrue to low-income households. The Federal Government is currently spending almost $2 billion annually to help low-income families pay for energy costs through the low-income home energy assistance program—a program I strongly support. But many of the recipients of this assistance are the same individuals whose homes are eligible for weatherization. A one-time expenditure for weatherization of these homes is a cost-effective measure that would decrease both the demand for energy in the short and the long term and the consequent need for Federal assistance in paying the energy bills.

Finally, weatherization of the homes of eligible low-income Americans not only will assist these individuals and families in coping with high energy costs, but will help reduce the overall national demand for energy.

In short, committing ourselves to the weatherization of the remaining 13 million eligible units occupied by low-income families would be sound fiscal and social policy and an integral part of a comprehensive plan for attaining a more energy independent America.

DESCRIPTION OF LEGISLATION

Mr. President, as I have indicated, the legislation we are introducing today is aimed at expanding and extending the existing weatherization program in order to weatherize the remaining eligible units in the next 10 years. To accomplish this goal, the measure would authorize appropriations of $500 million in fiscal year 1985 with increases in authorization levels in the subsequent 9 years. The authorization levels represent a significant increase over the fiscal year 1984 authorization of $399 million—under which actual appropriations were $190 million—but they are increases which are fully justifiable given the long-term savings that will result from decreased demand for fuel and for low-income home energy assistance as the homes are made more energy efficient.

An important provision of the bill requires the Secretary of DOE to develop a plan for implementation of the 10-year weatherization program and to report to Congress every 2 years on the progress being made under this measure. This would provide Congress the opportunity to evaluate on a regular basis the operation of the program. In addition, it would provide incentives to States that perform well under the program by setting aside 10 percent of the annual appropriation for a special performance fund to be distributed by DOE on the basis of the States' performance in weatherizing homes in the previous years. It would also earmark up to $40 million for a demonstration project concerning the weatherization of rental units.

Mr. President, the weatherization program expansion contemplated by this legislation is ambitious, but it represents a challenge which our Nation must address adequately in the years ahead. We have the opportunity to begin an aggressive campaign to alleviate the heavy fuel bills that claim a disproportionate share of millions of low-income Americans' income. This is a campaign that is in our national interest to undertake. It is one which I support wholeheartedly as an investment in the long-term needs of our Nation.

I urge all of my colleagues to join with us in support of this important legislation.

By Mr. BYRD (for Mr. HART) (for himself, Mr. HATFIELD, Mr. CRANSTON, Mr. PELL, Mr. TSONGAS, Mr. LEVIN, Mr. SARBANES, and Mr. COHEN):

S. 2630. A bill to amend the Solar Energy and Energy Conservation Bank Act to authorize appropriations for the provision of financial assistance through fiscal year 1990 and to provide financial assistance to builders of highly energy efficient buildings, and for other purposes; to the Committee on Banking, Housing, and Urban Affairs.

SOLAR ENERGY AND ENERGY CONSERVATION BANK REAUTHORIZATION ACT OF 1984

● Mr. HART. Mr. President, I am introducing today, together with Senators MARK O. HATFIELD, ALAN CRANSTON, CLAIBORNE PELL, PAUL E. TSONGAS, CARL LEVIN, PAUL S. SARBANES, and WILLIAM S. COHEN, legislation to reauthorize and expand the Solar Energy and Energy Conservation Bank.

Our bill will authorize appropriations for the Solar Bank, as it is commonly known, at levels totaling nearly $5 billion over the 6 fiscal years 1985 through 1990. The legislation also makes an important expansion in the mission of the Bank, authorizing it to provide assistance to homebuilders constructing "super-insulated" houses—residential buildings incorporating state-of-the-art thermal energy efficiency features which, at an extra construction cost of only about 3 to 5 percent, can reduce the energy needed for home heating and cooling by as much as 90 percent.

This legislation is part of the Energy Efficient America Act, a package of four bills being introduced today in both the Senate and the House of Representatives, with bipartisan support. This package of bills represents the most important effort in recent years to put America on a new energy course, toward a new energy future in which we have become highly efficient in our use of energy. Achieving this new future will help all in our country in many important ways; becoming wiser and more careful in our use of energy will let us overcome the personal hardship and economic stranglehold of high energy, reduce unemployment as people without jobs go to work retrofitting existing homes with energy conservation measures and renewable energy systems, and become more secure as we reduce our dangerous dependence on unreliable supplies of foreign oil.

The Solar Energy and Energy Conservation Bank Reauthorization Act of 1984 would resurrect the best part of the Energy Security Act of 1980—title V of that act, which initially created the Solar Bank. That title was a bold and innovative effort to improve residential energy efficiency, and to expand the use of nonpolluting, renewable energy resources in residences, by using and supplementing existing market mechanisms so they are available to low-income and middle class Americans. The Bank subsidizes loans made by private financial institutions, States, and local governments for the installation of energy conserving improvements or renewable energy systems in residences, and to a limited extent makes grants for energy conservation retrofits. The amount of Federal assistance depends on the income of the homeowner or tenant making the energy investment, varying in amounts designed to insure the Federal funds are carefully targeted to make it possible for people to improve their residential energy efficiency who otherwise could not afford to do so. Because the Solar Bank's funding is used primarily for subsidizing loans, three non-Federal dollars are "leveraged" for every dollar spent for the Bank. This makes the Solar Bank one of the most highly cost-effective ways to use Federal funds to achieve greater energy efficiency.

The Congress initially intended the Solar Bank to be one of our country's foremost energy programs, authorizing a level of expenditures that was to reach more than $1 billion in fiscal year 1983. Tragically, however, the Bank became one of the major targets of President Reagan's assault on the domestic budget. The President has repeatedly tried to eliminate all funding for the Solar Bank, and indeed refused to even start up the Bank until ordered to do so by a Federal court. In the face of this strong administration opposition, the Congress has provided only minimal funding for the Bank, totaling about $60 million over the past 3 years.

Just as there was good reason in 1980 to establish a Solar Bank with the resources necessary to accomplish its purpose, so, too, there is good reason in 1984 to fully fund the Bank. Our legislation would do so, by authorizing appropriations of $300 million in fiscal year 1985, $450 million in fiscal year 1986, $650 million in fiscal year 1987, $925 million in fiscal year 1988, and $1.275 billion in each of fiscal year 1989 and fiscal year 1990. The need for this level of funding is compelling, for three reasons.

First, the Solar Bank is one of our best weapons against the high costs of energy used in our homes. All of us who pay today's fuel bills know how much they have soared in recent years. The burden of these bills hurts all of us, but the low-income and middle-class families who will be helped by the Solar Bank are hit especially hard. At the lowest end of the income scale, families pay as much as one-quarter of their total income on home heating and cooling, and during the winter months in Northern States the fuel bills often exceed monthly income. As a result, we have a new national crisis of people being forced to go without heat. Millions of families each year have their utility service cut off because they are unable to pay their bills. Most arrange to be reconnected, but the burden of the high bills threatens to condemn them to permanent poverty. Middle-class Americans, while more able to pay their bills, still must forego other goods and services because of their increased fuel costs.

The only long-term solution to high fuel costs is to reduce the amount of fuel needed to heat and cool our homes. Fortunately, very substantial improvements in thermal energy efficiency are possible. Experts tell us we can reduce by 50 percent, or more, the amount of energy needed to keep our existing housing stock comfortably warm in the winter and cool in the summer. Also, renewable energy systems can be retrofitted in residences to use the free energy of the sun and the wind to supply much of our heating and cooling needs. Taking either, or both, steps can make substantial reductions in the amount of expensive fossil-fuel energy a family needs.

The one major obstacle to achieving this greater energy efficiency is the often-high original investment needed to improve a building's thermal efficiency or to install a new renewable energy system. It is this obstacle which the Solar Bank is designed to overcome, by providing the marginal funding necessary to enable low and moderate-income families to borrow money for residential energy improvements. At the level of funding authorized in our bill, 11.7 million American families—1 out of every 7 in the country—will be able to improve their homes to reduce their energy consumption. A very conservative estimate of the total savings to these families—an estimate using current fuel costs—suggests they will save about $70 billion because of their lower fuel bills over the next two decades.

The second compelling reason to expand the Solar Bank is to create jobs and economic growth. The Solar Bank is not only a good energy conservation program, it is a good jobs program. Funding the Bank at the level authorized in our bill would create 240,000 new work years of employment as people are hired to install energy conservation and renewable energy systems, and to supply materials for those operations. This is a ratio of direct job creation 50 percent better per dollar than traditional public works programs. And many of these jobs will be precisely the kind our country most needs: Entry-level construction jobs, in which such unemployed people as minority teenagers, of whom half are unemployed, can learn construction job skills that can be used in other jobs. But this is only the beginning of the economic benefits of the Solar Bank program. Conventional analyses show that each new job that is created ends up creating another job as the first salary is spent and respent in the community. Using this conventional multiplier, the level of funding authorized in our bill would create an additional 240,000 jobs, for a total of nearly half a million. But this program will set in motion another kind of multiplier, as the consumer savings from the lower fuel bills gets spent or invested elsewhere. Since other goods and services are much more labor-intensive than energy, this shift in consumer spending will create substantial additional economic growth, representing an additional 2.6 million work years of employment over the next two decades.

The third, final, and most compelling reason for fully funding the Solar Bank is to reduce our reliance on insecure supplies of foreign oil. This is the primary purpose stated by the Congress for the creation of the Solar Bank. And that purpose is just as important today as it was in 1980. Despite the temporary surplus in the world oil market, there are several ominous signs indicating the continued dangers posed by our energy dependence. Domestic oil production is likely to fall shortly, as the Prudhoe Bay field is exhausted, unless another major reserve is discovered to replace it. Additional domestic discoveries are likely to be inadequate, because half the oil and natural gas industry's drilling rigs are inactive because of unfavorable economic conditions in that industry. The level of our imports of foreign oil has stopped its decline, and has now increased to 30 percent above last year's level. And, most disturbingly, a major war is now being waged in the Persian Gulf, with oil tankers getting set afire, and the world waiting daily for the half-expected news that Iran has blocked the Strait of Hormuz to the oil traffic that supplies one-sixth of the Western World's oil supply. Clearly, this is a time to renew our efforts to achieve energy security, not abandon those efforts.

The Solar Bank can play a major role in our energy security program. As the Congress stated when establishing the Bank, "It is the purpose of this subtitle to encourage energy conservation and the use of solar energy, and thereby reduce the Nation's dependence on foreign sources of energy supplies." If funded at the levels authorized in our bill, the Solar Bank will be able to achieve that purpose well enough to save the equivalent of more than 1 billion barrels of oil over the next 20 years. This could reduce by more than one-half the amount of oil we import from the Persian Gulf, greatly improving our Nation's economic and national security.

For all these reasons, I commend this legislation to the attention of my colleagues, and urge them to join Senator HATFIELD, myself, and others in pushing for its prompt enactment.●

● Mr. HATFIELD. Mr. President, I am pleased to join with my colleague from Colorado today in sponsoring legislation amending the Solar Energy and Energy Conservation Bank Act.

This bill extends the authorization for the Bank for 6 additional years beyond 1984 at funding levels which should be adequate to weatherize and equip homes with renewable energy devices at a more accelerated pace than is the case today. This proposal also improves the existing law by raising the energy efficiency standards for new home construction, provides secondary financing for energy conservation loans, and allows lenders, not now eligible to loan funds, to come under the program.

The Solar Energy and Energy Conservation Bank was created in 1980 to provide low-interest funds to middle- and moderate-income homeowners for energy conservation and renewable energy investments. The program was also designed to provide loan funds for small commercial and agricultural buildings. The Solar Energy and Energy Conservation Bank makes payments to local financial institutions which in turn provide funds, at low interest rates, for the programs described above.

Unfortunately, the Bank has not functioned as was envisioned by Congress in 1980. Forty-eight States and territories have signed up for the program and $20 million has been appropriated for the current fiscal year. However, the Bank itself has not been supported by the personnel operating the program and only through court order has the Bank been able to implement regulations and begin making funds available to the States and territories.

The proposal I am cosponsoring today reaffirms the congressional intent demonstrated in 1980. The provisions of this bill, as described earlier, will authorize funds at levels which will begin the process of equipping homes and small commercial and agricultural buildings with renewable energy systems and energy conservation measures.

Mr. President, I have always believed, and rightfully so, that energy conservation should be treated as an energy resource, thus diminishing the need for future conventional energy sources. This bill will help us attain that goal. The Solar Energy and Energy Conservation Bank is a key part of our commitment to energy security today, and in the future. I hope the Senate will move quickly to enact this important piece of legislation, and I encourage my colleagues to give it their full support.●

Mr. CRANSTON. Mr. President, I am delighted to cosponsor S. 2630.

In 1980 Congress established the Solar and Conservation Bank to provide loans at subsidized interest rates for conservation and renewable energy improvements on residential, agricultural and small commercial buildings. We knew then, as we know now, that the marketplace alone does not encourage energy efficiency improvements and innovation quickly enough. High market interest rates and the front-end costs of this equipment prevent most middle- and moderate-income Americans from buying it to save energy. Financed by the Government and administered through private institutions, the Bank was created as an innovative way of encouraging energy efficiency improvements among those Americans who could not qualify for low-income weatherization assistance and for whom energy tax breaks were not adequate incentive.

Unfortunately, the Reagan administration has never permitted the Bank to function properly. The administration has impounded its funds, transferred its personnel, and unsuccessfully tried to write it out of the budget. The funds Congress has been able to reinstate constitute only a small fraction of the funds originally authorized in 1980.

The Solar and Conservation Bank Act Amendments of 1984 would reauthorize the Bank through 1990 and establish funding levels sufficient to allow the Bank to function as Congress intended. This bill would also spur innovation by providing builders with incentives to construct superinsulated, energy-efficient buildings.

By Mr. CRANSTON (for himself, Mr. HATFIELD, Mr. METZENBAUM, Mr. HART, Mr. PELL, Mr. SARBANES, Mr. TSONGAS, and Mr. COHEN):

S. 2631. A bill to amend the Energy Policy and Conservation Act to improve the administration of the Federal energy conservation program for consumer products, to enhance consumer information programs to encourage the purchase of more energy efficient appliances, and to implement efficiency standards for furnaces, central air-conditioners, and water heaters; to the Committee on Energy and Natural Resources.

CONSUMER PRODUCTS ENERGY EFFICIENCY AMENDMENTS OF 1984

Mr. CRANSTON. Mr. President, today, I am pleased to introduce S. 2631, the Consumer Products Energy Efficiency Amendments of 1984, a bill to promote the use and continued improvement of energy efficient appliances. One-third of the energy used in our homes operates electrical appliances. Congress supported Federal programs to improve consumer appliance efficiency since 1975. And legislation mandating national appliance efficiency standards was first adopted late in 1978, after the Iranian oil crisis began.

When Congress acted, several States—including my own State of California—had already enacted fairly tough appliance efficiency standards, forcing manufacturers who chose to do business in the lucrative California market to produce more efficient appliances. Firms like Amana responded with significant energy efficiency improvements in their refrigerators, freezers, and in room air-conditioners.

By making these standards—for refrigerators alone—national, we could save enough electricity to eliminate the need to build 15 new nuclear powerplants, at a cost of more than $45 billion, according to the Lawrence Berkeley Laboratory.

If the 16 million refrigerators and freezers in use just in California in 1982 were all exchanged for high-efficiency models the State's electric consumption would decline an estimated 5 percent, about 1,700 megawatts, the equivalent of the output of two new nuclear plants. The new appliances would cost about $750 million—some of which people would spend routinely for appliance replacement.

Moreover, Mr. President, the alternative of building the two nuclear plants would cost upward of $6 billion—more than six times as much—and would produce radioactive waste and other problems.

Congress mandated national appliance efficiency standards for each of 13 major household appliances in the National Energy Conservation and Policy Act, enacted in November 1978, requiring regulations implementing national standards by December 1980.

When adopted by the Secretary of Energy, these regulations would preempt existing State standards.

Even though the national standards were expected to be less stringent than California standards already in place, the Nation would still gain from adoption of national standards which would become progressively stricter.

And, at the same time and thereafter, I fought to make sure that adoption of the Federal statute did not preempt the existing State standards before the Federal standards took effect.

Despite the clear congressional mandate, the Carter administration left office without adopting appliance efficiency standards, and DOE under the current administration has purported to meet the requirement for efficiency standards by adopting a standard that says no standards are necessary.

In terms of encouraging increased efficiency these standards are meaningless, if not counterproductive. Meanwhile, to avoid preemption by this nonstandard, States such as California, New York, Florida, and Kansas, among others that have their own standards, must petition the administration for exemption.

Mr. President, the energy savings we can realize from effective standards are considerable. By the turn of century, California alone expects to save energy equivalent to 21¼ million barrels of oil each year from residential and commercial appliance efficiency standards.

The Department of Energy, currently relying on its philosophical biases rather than facts, believes that consumers will purchase energy-efficient appliances in response to market signals as energy prices rise in times of energy shortage.

But there is an increasing pile of evidence that things simply do not work that way. Consumers can only buy what they are offered.

Market forces do not work for several reasons:

First, because the connection between rising fuel or crude oil prices and consumers using appliances operated by electricity coming from a regulated utility is too indirect.

Second, because 80 percent of the major residential appliances are not bought by those who ultimately use them, but by builders, apartment house owners, and others.

Third, because even though a consumer will realize economic savings over the life of an energy-efficient appliance greater than the increased cost of the appliance, few consumers are able to calculate the life-cycle cost savings of energy efficiency, and the information to do so is often not available.

Finally, energy prices do not rise in constant trend lines. They fluctuate. And the results will be disastrous if we wait until the next energy crisis to begin to produce energy efficient appliances.

DOE's analysis is refuted by the evidence that—despite the dramatic increase in energy prices over the last decade—the average efficiency of major household appliances has remained virtually constant since 1973 nationally.

The improvements that have occurred have all occurred as a result of the State standards now in place.

Moreover, DOE's policy of neglect is not without malignant consequences. The alternative to energy efficiency is the nightmare DOE currently projects: Hundreds of new central powerplants will be needed to accommodate increased demand for electricity, costing utility ratepayers—by DOE's own estimates—upward of $1.8 trillion dollars. These costs will take an increased share of all consumers personal disposable income and will severely handicap the ability of American industry to compete effectively on a world market.

And the environmental consequences will be catastrophic.

The Consumer Products Energy Efficiency Amendments of 1984 is straightforward. While leaving DOE great flexibility in implementing standards, it prevents the Department from indefinite delay in promoting efficiency. The bill makes four basic changes to strengthen current law.

First, it requires the Department of Energy within 180 days of enactment to establish interim standards no less stringent than the 1980 median efficiency for central air-conditioners, furnaces, and water heaters. These three appliances consume the lion's share of home energy use and have shown little efficiency improvement over the last 9 years. This provision would get rid of the biggest energy guzzlers from the market without unduly burdening manufacturers.

Second, the bill would improve product labeling to enable consumers to make informed energy decisions when purchasing new appliances. It calls on DOE to make available consumer buying guides indicating product energy efficiency and projected annual operating costs. The guide would also contain a simple worksheet allowing consumers to calculate the life-cycle costs of each appliance. Further, this bill would require manufacturers to advertise the efficiency ratings of their products.

Third, the bill prohibits automatic preemption of State standards when the Federal Government fails to enact national standards. National standards would preempt State standards only when DOE establishes Federal standards, and even then States could petition for more stringent standards on a case-by-case basis, if such standards would not unduly encumber interstate trade.

Fourth, the bill would require the Department of Energy to encourage continuous appliance efficiency even if the Secretary finds that no standards are necessary. The act would require DOE to propose efficiency targets for appliances in the absence of standards, and, if expected improvements failed to materialize, require a rulemaking procedure to reconsider whether minimum standards are necessary.

Mr. President, we can no longer afford to waste energy. The experience of my own State of California, which established phased-in standards back in 1976 and which is currently fighting to maintain those standards, has been overwhelmingly positive. Manufacturers have been able to meet the standards without undue hardship, and consumers, utilities, industry, and the environment have all benefited. The California Energy Commission estimates efficiency standards have already reduced the utility bills of Californians by $1 billion. By 1987 California's standards will have saved enough energy to enable utilities to forgo building one large, 1,750 megawatt powerplant.

Increased use of efficient products would save consumers billions of dollars, ease utility load management problems, especially during peak periods, enable society to avoid construction of large, expensive powerplants holding down future energy costs and freeing capital for other purposes, cut our dependence on foreign oil, and significantly reduce the severe and growing environmental impacts of increased reliance on fossil fuels.

We have the technology available now to provide for our energy needs without endangering our environment. We owe the American people the effort to focus on preventing future energy crises instead of just managing them.

By Mr. METZENBAUM (for himself, Mr. HATFIELD, Mr. CRANSTON, Mr. PELL, Mr. TSONGAS, Mr. HART, and Mr. SARBANES):

S. 2632. A bill to amend the Energy Policy and Conservation Act to improve consumer information and fuel efficiency with respect to passenger automobiles, light trucks, and tires, to amend the Internal Revenue Code of 1954 to impose a tax on noncomplying manufacturers (in lieu of penalty), and for other purposes; to the Committee on Finance.

AUTO EFFICIENCY STANDARDS

Mr. CRANSTON. Mr. President, I am happy to be an original cosponsor of S. 2632. The gains in auto efficiency over the past decade are perhaps the most successful conservation achievements to emerge from the energy crises of the 1970's. When corporate auto efficiency averages level off next year at 27.5 mpg, the cars Americans drive will be almost twice as efficient as those of a decade ago. But improvement will continue only so long as Federal standards and competitive pressures require new fuel efficiency improvements from manufacturers.

We must continue to make cars and light trucks more fuel efficient. The transportation sector by far the most vulnerable portion of society to disruptions of foreign oil supplies is also least able to utilize alternative fuels.

By the end of the century, I believe all the oil we import will be used exclusively in the transportation sector. To relieve our foreign oil dependence we must keep improving the fuel efficiency of our motor vehicles. This bill will continue progress in auto and light truck efficiency improvements.

Foreign manufacturers have already demonstrated five-passenger automobiles which average over 60 mpg on the highway. The technology exists today to make our cars and trucks more efficient. This bill sets new future efficiency targets to spur auto efficiency. It establishes a corporate average fuel efficiency rating of 45 mpg by 1995, and a light truck average of 35 mpg. It would also improve the accuracy of auto efficiency labeling and institute tire efficiency labeling, and encourage States to restructure vehicle registration fees and excise taxes to reward fuel efficiency.

It makes no sense to allow fuel efficiency standards to lapse. Failure to make progress now will only insure that in the future American automakers will once again find themselves unable to compete with foreign manufacturers.

By Mr. BRADLEY (for himself, Mr. CHAFEE, Mr. MOYNIHAN, Mr. PELL, and Mr. TSONGAS):

S. 2633. A bill to amend the Fish and Wildlife Coordination Act so as to authorize the Environmental Protection Agency to conduct a study for the purpose of determining the extent of contamination of certain fish and whether such contamination creates a threat to public health; to the Committee on Environment and Public Works.

STUDY OF THE CONTAMINATION OF CERTAIN FISH

Mr. BRADLEY. Mr. President, we know that PCB's are harmful to the public health. PCB's can cause cancer and can induce genetic defects as well. There is also evidence that some species of Atlantic coastal fish are contaminated with PCB's. Yet, there is no coordinated public policy to guide State fisheries administrators on how to respond to PCB contamination of fish. If the State administrators simply forbid the consumption of these fish without proper analysis, they could damage an important industry and cut off a significant source of food when that might not be appropriate. What we need is a reliable appraisal of the extent of the PCB contamination so that health officials can calculate the danger to which people are being exposed, so that they can assess the threat to public health. Today I am introducing a bill to collect the missing data.

Since 1981, the New Jersey Department of Environmental Protection (DEP) has analyzed fish caught in New Jersey coastal waters. DEP found that five species of fish were contaminated by PCB's, which are known to cause cancer, at levels comparable to the proposed U.S. Food and Drug Administration tolerance. The five species are striped bass, bluefish, white perch, white catfish, and American eel. In upper New York Bay and tributary waters, two species of fish, striped bass and American eel, showed average levels above the existing FDA tolerance. In March 1983, New Jersey prohibited the commercial sale of affected fish taken in upper New York Bay and its tributaries.

For the five species of fish that showed lower PCB levels in coastal waters, New Jersey advised limitations on consumption and recommended cooking methods that reduce human absorption of PCB's. New Jersey DEP also recommended that pregnant women, nursing mothers, women of childbearing age, and young children should abstain from eating the affected species of fish.

This problem is not confined to New Jersey. In November 1983, the Massachusetts Department of Public Health issued recommendations on the consumption of bluefish based on its own data. The department recommended cooking methods to minimize absorption of PCB's and recommended abstention by women who are breastfeeding, pregnant, or considering becoming pregnant.

Bluefish are migratory; they move up the Atlantic coast each spring and return to southern waters in the fall. Because of this migration, it is likely that bluefish taken in other coastal waters may also be contaminated with PCB's. But most State health departments lack the funds or commitment to sample and analyze fish. Thus, people in other States may also be exposed to PCB's because their State health departments have not investigated the problem.

Other problems beset State officials who seek to evaluate whether a health hazard exists:

Different investigators who study PCB contamination in fish use different procedures to prepare and analyze them. This makes it difficult to compare results.

State officials would also benefit from uniform guidelines for the regulation of fish consumption.

It is clear that Federal action is needed to provide for:

Analysis of fish from the coastal waters of other States that may be affected.

Development of uniform sampling and analysis procedures to allow easier comparison and interpretation of contamination data.

When there is such a disparity among the States on a matter of public health their citizens suffer. They suffer lower levels of protection. And related businesses in more vigilent States suffer economic losses. New Jersey party and charter boat fishermen have lost business when the New Jersey Department of Environmental Protection issued its warnings. Our fishing industry is a responsible one and they are willing to accept this sacrifice if it is necessary to protect public health. But they are frustrated that neighboring States have issued no warnings when those same migratory fish do not observe State boundaries.

The bill I am introducing authorizes the Environmental Protection Agency (EPA) to conduct an interagency effort to accomplish two purposes:

First, it provides for collection and analysis of fish from Atlantic coastal waters in sufficient numbers to determine PCB levels. We will then be able to assess the public risk and know whether the problem is coastwise, or whether it only affects specific, limited areas.

Second, uniform sampling and analysis procedures will be developed so that we can accurately assess public exposure to PCB contamination.

I anticipate the program can be carried out for approximately $900,000.

EPA is authorized to enlist the help of the National Marine Fisheries Service, the Food and Drug Administration, the States, and other agencies with jurisdiction over this problem.

EPA is also encouraged to incorporate efforts by individual State environmental or fisheries agencies in the planning, conduct, and evaluation of this program.

EPA is given 2 years to complete this study and submit its report to Congress with any recommendations for further action. This report will also contain the comments and recommendations of NOAA, FDA, and the States.

It is important for us to find out whether PCB contamination is a real threat to public health. This study will tell us. And if it is a threat, the study will give data on which to base rational regulatory measures. I hope that my colleagues will join me in its support.

Mr. President, I now ask unanimous consent that the text of the bill be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the bill was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

S. 2633

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the Fish and Wildlife Coordination Act, as amended (16 U.S.C. 661), is amended by inserting immediately after section 5A the following new section:

"SEC. 5B. (a) The Environmental Protection Agency is directed to conduct a study to identify and measure residues of various toxic contaminants in estuarine and marine fish species along the Atlantic coast to determine whether contamination by polychlorinated biphenyls (PCB's) or other toxicants constitute a public health hazard, and if so, the extent of such contamination and hazard.

"(b) In carrying out such study, the Environmental Protection Agency shall have authority to utilize the facilities, equipment, and personnel of the United States Fish and Wildlife Service, the National Marine Fisheries Service and Federal Food and Drug Administration, and the States, with the consent of such Service, Administration or State, on a reimbursable basis.

"(c) On or before the expiration of the twenty-four month period following the date of the enactment of this section, the Environmental Protection Agency shall report the results of its study, together with its comments and recommendations, together with the comments and recommendations of the US FWS, National Marine Fisheries Service, the Federal Food and Drug Administration and the States, if any, to the Congress.

"(d) For the purpose of carrying out the provisions of this section, there is authorized to be appropriated to the Environmental Protection Agency for Fiscal Year 1985 and 1986 such sums as may be necessary to remain available until expended.".

Mr. MOYNIHAN. Mr. President, I am pleased to join the Senator from New Jersey (Mr. BRADLEY) in proposing a bill to reduce the potentially serious hazards from polychlorinated biphenyls, commonly known as PCB's, in fish. The problem crosses State boundaries and requires the coordinated attention of Federal environmental agencies.

PCB's constitute a group of chemicals used by a variety of industries, especially by the electrical industry as an insulating fluid. Three characteristics of PCB's cause considerable concern. First, some scientific evidence indicates that PCB's are toxic and carcinogenic. Second, unlike biodegradable materials, they are persistent in the environment. Finally, PCB's have a chemical affinity for fats and therefore appear in high concentrations in the fatty tissues of fish.

New York's Hudson River contains in its sediments one of the world's largest reservoirs of PCB's. Many species of fish commonly contain PCB concentrations far in excess of the acceptable limits established by the Food and Drug Administration. As a result, New York has banned all fishing in the upper Hudson and most commercial fishing in the lower Hudson.

In 1980, I secured passage of an amendment to the Clean Water Act providing Federal funds to reduce the contamination of the river. The dredging project has yet to be implemented, but progress toward this goal has been made.

Yet the problem extends far beyond one river. Species such as the striped bass spend part of the year in the Hudson, the Chesapeake Bay, and other estuaries, where they can absorb or ingest PCB's. During other seasons, they migrate along the Atlantic coast. Furthermore, runoff and the disposal of dredged materials adds PCB's to coastal waters. As a result, fish taken from a large geographic area are liable to be contaminated.

We are asking the Environmental Protection Agency to cooperate with the U.S. Fish and Wildlife Service, the National Marine Fisheries Service, and the Food and Drug Administration in a scientific study of the extent of toxic contamination in Atlantic coast fish. Such a study will indicate the geographic extent of the problem and the risk to public health. It will also aid the establishment of uniform methods of sampling and chemical analysis. The bill deserves each Senator's support.

Mr. TSONGAS. Mr. President, I am pleased to join with senior Senator from New Jersey (Senator BRADLEY) in introducing S. 2633. This legislation mandates that the Environmental Protection Agency, in coordination with other Federal and State agencies, perform a sampling of coastal fish to determine the levels and extent of chemical contamination. This bill will promote and insure uniformity in testing and analysis methodologies in order to place individual State findings in perspective.

Massachusetts has long treasured its connection to the sea, both for its beauty and for its bountiful provision of seafood. Along with our neighboring coastal States, however, we have at times used our technologies toward achievement of economic advancements without recognition of the burden these technologies may place upon this invaluable resource. Scientists from eastern seaboard States, including Massachusetts and New Jersey, have detected potentially harmful chemicals such as polychlorinated biphenyls (PCB's) in fish and other species in our coastal waters. Since many of the fish species found to contain contaminants are mobile, such as bluefish, a coastwide effort is necessary to determine the extent and severity of chemical contamination. Unfortunately, States have differing abilities and commitments to investigation of this problem. In addition, States and Federal agencies use diverse methods of sampling and data analysis, making comparison of technical data and results difficult. For these reasons, I believe that the Federal Government must work with all of the affected States in performing a coastwide assesment of the potential public health risks from the existing levels of chemical contamination in ocean species. In this way, the Government can safeguard both the public health and the viability of the fishing industry.

Within 2 years of the bill's enactment, EPA, assisting agencies, and States are required to issue a report presenting the results of this study. This report would also offer recommendations to Congress concerning the implications of its findings for individual States.

Such a uniform approach is necessary to protect seafood consumers from excessive levels of potentially harmful chemicals. It also protects crucial recreational and commercial fisheries from unnecessary hardships resulting from inaccurate and alarmist assessments of the potential for hazards from uncertain levels of chemicals such as PCB's.

Mr. President, I urge my colleagues to support this modest but important legislation, for the sake of protecting our Nation's public health and the fishing industries of the Nation's eastern seaboard.

By Mr. KENNEDY (for himself, Mr. HATFIELD, Mr. CRANSTON, Mr. DURENBERGER, Mr. EAGLETON, Mr. STAFFORD, and Mr. MITCHELL):

S. 2634. A bill to provide for a mutual and verifiable moratorium on the testing and deployment of new nuclear ballistic missiles and antisatellite weapons and the testing of nuclear warheads; to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

ARMS RACE MORITORIUM ACT

Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, today Senators HATFIELD, CRANSTON, DURENBERGER, EAGLETON, STAFFORD, MITCHELL, and I are introducing the Arms Race Moratorium Act. Each of us is also a principal sponsor of the nuclear weapons freeze resolution in the Senate. Our proposal today is intended to buy the time we need to achieve a freeze.

The United States and the Soviet Union are entering a dangerous new phase of the arms race. Both superpowers are preparing to deploy more accurate and more devastating nuclear weapons that will increase the risk of nuclear war.

Even more dangerous is the fact that both superpowers are launching a new arms race into space with unforeseeable consequences. If these new developments continue unchecked, we will soon cross a threshold into a future in which both nations could conceivably launch a successful first-strike attack. Clearly, immediate measures by both the United States and the Soviet Union are needed to prevent a destabilizing new escalation of the arms race.

The Arms Race Moratorium Act calls upon the President to initiate a bilateral and verifiable moratorium with the Soviet Union on the testing and deployment of new nuclear ballistic missiles and antisatellite weapons, and on the testing of nuclear warheads. The moratorium is intended to prevent technological modernization from carrying the United States and the Soviet Union over the first-strike threshold into the land of nuclear no return. By providing a negotiator's pause, the moratorium will also allow both nations to pursue meaningful reductions in existing arsenals. The moratorium can be easily and quickly implemented, because the United States has the independent means adequately to verify Soviet compliance, without onsite inspection or any other action by the Soviets.

If the President declines to issue a call for a moratorium and if the Government of the Soviet Union announces that it is willing to halt the testing and deployment of these weapons, this act would then suspend funds for the testing and deployment of these weapons. The Government of the Soviet Union will have 90 days after the enactment of the bill to communicate to the Government of the United States that it intends to implement such a moratorium. If the Soviet Union makes such a commitment, funding will be suspended for all programs covered by the moratorium beginning at the end of the 90-day period.

Under this bilateral moratorium, the United States will halt the flight testing and deployment of the MX missile, the Trident II missile, and other new nuclear ballistic missiles that might be planned. The Soviet Union will halt the flight testing and deployment of the SSX-24, SSX-25, SSNX-23 and other new nuclear missiles it also might have planned. Both countries will halt the testing and deployment of antisatellite weapons capable of hitting targets in space. Both countries will also halt further underground testing of nuclear explosive devices.

If at any time during the moratorium the President certifies that the Soviet Union is violating its terms by testing or deploying these weapons, then funding for U.S. testing and deployment will be immediately resumed. This bill will not require trusting the Soviet Union to adhere to the moratorium. The programs that it covers are now being monitored by both nations with high confidence. Rather we will be testing Soviet willingness to slow down the arms race and to pursue deep reductions in the nuclear arsenals of both sides.

There in an inherent risk in any specific arms control proposal, but there is far greater risk in doing nothing at all.

This bilateral moratorium will prevent new technologies from igniting a qualitatively new and different arms race. If this legislation is enacted, essential equivalence between the United States and the Soviet Union will be maintained, while the development of dangerous new weapons on both sides will be curtailed.

The testing and deployment of a new generation of first strike, nuclear war-fighting weapons with pinpoint accuracy, higher speed, and depressed trajectories will be halted.

United States and Soviet antisatellite programs that take the arms race into outer space will be stopped. Satellites are essential to nuclear balance. They are the heart of our early warning system to detect the launching of enemy missiles. Since the United States has just begun to test its antisatellite weapon, and since the existing Soviet antisatellite weapon is severely limited in its capability, a mutual halt on Asat testing and deployment will stop this destabilizing arms race in its infancy.

By halting nuclear testing, the act will also prevent new and more deadly weapons and warhead technology.

If the new technologies now being developed and tested were deployed they could fundamentally undermine mutual deterrence which has thus far prevented either nation from launching a nuclear attack against the other. The development of first-strike capabilities on both sides will completely undermine deterrence by placing the nuclear arsenals of both nations on a hair trigger. Contrary to what the Reagan administration argues, building a U.S. nuclear war-fighting capability will not enhance deterrence by intimidating the Soviets. It only makes it more likely that the Soviets will be driven to use nuclear weapons first in a crisis.

And, contrary to what the President would have us believe the next war will not be settled by a single duel between Luke Skywalker and Darth Vader. It will not be a simple battle between a good and an evil empire that is confined to outer space. This war, if it happens, will not be limited to the two superpowers or even the Northern Hemisphere. It will not be a winnable war, and there may not even be survivors.

Indeed, the recent scientific discovery of the nuclear winter now points overwhelmingly to this stark truth: A third world war will be the last world war because it will be a war against the world itself.

Many diplomats and scholars say that the relationship between the United States and the Soviet Union is the worst that it has been since the Cuban missile crisis. This downward spiral in United States-Soviet relations gives every regional conflict the potential for a United States-Soviet nuclear showdown.

The nuclear threat sets before us a basic choice. The question is not whether nuclear weapons will cease multiplying and then be reduced. Someday they almost surely will be. The choice is not whether but when? Not if but how? By rational agreement or by the most irrational act of violence in human history?

Another round in the arms race is already moving off the drawing boards and into action. Congress should take a stand now, before it is too late. The only sane choice is to continue the peaceful battle for nuclear arms control—for a freeze and then reductions—until it is won.

It is the height of human folly for the President to preach peace in Peking while preparing for nuclear war with Moscow. If the Reagan administration cannot show restraint, Congress can. If the Reagan administration cannot initiate an end to the arms race, Congress can. And the moratorium is the way to do it.

This bill is no substitute for negotiated arms control agreements. But at a time when neither the Reagan administration nor the Soviets are willing to negotiate, this is a practical step toward a safer world.

There are obvious precedents for our action. In 1963, President Kennedy initiated a U.S. moratorium on the atmospheric testing of nuclear warheads. This action led to the expeditious and successful negotiation of the 1963 Limited Test Ban Treaty with the Soviet Union. It is now time for the President—or Congress—to take an equally innovative, timely, and courageous step.

The Arms Race Moratorium Act will provide a guarantee against continued failure of Presidential initiative for arms control. We introduce this Arms Race Moratorium Act as a first step toward the achievement of bilateral and verifiable arms control agreements that alone can steer the superpowers—and our planet—toward the path of lasting peace.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the test of the bill and a set of questions and answers on it may be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the material was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

S. 2634

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled,

SHORT TITLE

SECTION 1. This Act may be cited as the "Arms Race Moratorium Act".

FINDINGS

SEC. 2. The Congress finds and declares that—

(1) the arms race is entering a dangerous new phase that increases the risk of a nuclear holocaust that would be humanity's final war;

(2) immediate action must be taken by the United States and the Soviet Union to halt the flight testing and deployment of new nuclear ballistic missiles and anti-satellite weapons and the testing of nuclear warheads;

(3) the flight testing and deployment of new nuclear ballistic missiles and anti-satellite weapons and the explosive testing of nuclear devices by the Soviet Union are adequately verifiable by the United States through the use of existing national technical means;

(4) a United States-Soviet Union moratorium on the flight testing and deployment of new nuclear ballistic missiles and anti-satellite weapons and the testing of nuclear warheads is not an end in itself but rather is a means to prevent new destabilizing technologies from further complicating future negotiations to reduce the risk of nuclear war; and

(5) while the President is constitutionally empowered to make international agreements with foreign nations, the responsibility to provide for the public welfare through the allocation or withholding of public revenues resides with the Congress.

BILATERAL MORATORIUM

SEC. 3. (a) It is the sense of Congress that the President should immediately communicate to the Government of the Soviet Union the willingness of the United States to enter into a mutual United States-Soviet Union moratorium on the flight testing and the deployment of new ballistic missiles and anti-satellite weapons and the testing of nuclear warheads.

(b)(1) If within 90 days of the date of the enactment of this Act the President has not made a communication to the Soviet Union described in subsection (a) and if within that 90-day period the Government of the Soviet Union communicates to the President that, effective at the end of such 90-day period, it will observe a mutual United States-Soviet Union moratorium on the flight testing and deployment of new ballistic missiles, the flight testing against objects in space and the deployment of anti-satellite weapons, and the testing of nuclear warheads, then after the end of such 90-day period no funds may be obligated or expended by the United States for the flight testing or the deployment of new ballistic missiles, the flight testing against objects in space or the deployment of anti-satellite weapons, or the testing of nuclear warheads.

(2) If the President certifies to Congress at any time after the beginning of the moratorium that the Soviet Union has conducted a test or deployed a missile or anti-satellite weapon or tested a nuclear warhead inconsistent with the moratorium, then funds may be obligated or expended by the United States for such testing and deployment. As part of any such certification, the President shall submit to Congress an unclassified report summarizing the basis for the certification and a classified report describing in detail the activities of the Soviet Union that are the basis for the certification.

(3) One year after the moratorium described in paragraph 1 enters into force and annually thereafter, the President shall report to the Congress:

(a) on the progress being made by the United States in negotiating nuclear arms control agreements with the Soviet Union; and

(b) on whether the President believes that continuation of the moratorium is in the best national security interests of the United States.

If the President states in any such annual report that he believes that continuation of the moratorium is not in the best national security interests of the United States, then the Congress may enact a joint resolution which terminates the moratorium and permits funds to be used for the testing and deployment described in paragraph (1).

(c) For purposes of this Act:

(1) The term "new ballistic missile" means any ballistic missile (including any modification of an existing missile type that increases its throw-weight or number of reentry vehicles) with a range exceeding 600 kilometers that was not flight-tested by the United States or the Soviet Union before August 1, 1982.

(2) The term "anti-satellite weapon" means any interceptor vehicle intended for and capable of damaging an object in space.

(c) The term "testing of nuclear warheads" means the detonation of any nuclear explosive device."

QUESTIONS AND ANSWERS CONCERNING THE "ARMS RACE MORATORIUM ACT"

(1) Why a moratorium now? Why not now? The burden of proof properly belongs with those who argue that the current nuclear arsenals numbering in the tens of thousands of weapons are somehow insufficient to deter a nuclear war. The burden of proof rests on those who maintain that a costly race to develop new nuclear warfighting capabilities will improve rather than threaten our security.

The case for a moratorium rests on the wholly defensible proposition that it is better to seek agreement with the Soviet Union on what we might jointly avoid doing before lunging into a race to construct a whole new generation of nuclear weapons systems, with all the heightened political tension, economic burden, and renewed fears of surprise attack that inevitably accompany a stepped-up arms race.

Both the Soviet Union and the United States are gearing up to squander hundreds of billions of dollars and rubles over the next decade to develop and deploy a new generation of more accurate weapons and more efficient nuclear warheads, all the better to intimidate each other with the threat of "limited" and "protracted" nuclear wars. Before agreeing to fund this dangerous and unwinnable race for "nuclear war-fighting capability," which the current Administration now wants to extend into space, the Congress should at least afford the American people the opportunity to test the Soviet Union's willingness to avoid such a fruitless competition through arms control.

(2) What does the moratorium cover? Since the moratorium is bilateral, both Soviet and American weapon systems are involved, but only certain testing and deployment activities which are currently being monitored with adequate confidence by National Technical Means are covered by the moratorium. The following activities on both sides are included:

The flight-testing and deployment of ballistic missiles (including modifications to existing missile types which increase throw-weight or number of reentry vehicles) with a range exceeding 600 kilometers which were not flight tested by the United States or the Soviet Union before August 1, 1982.

The flight-testing and deployment of "exoatmospheric" interceptor vehicles intended for and capable of damaging an object in space.

The detonation of any nuclear explosive device.

(3) Which current nuclear missile programs on both sides would be affected?

On the Soviet side: the SS-X-24 and SS-X-25 ICBMs; the SS-NX-23 SLBM, and any other new medium- to long-range ballistic missile the Soviet Union might be planning.

On the U.S. side: the MX ICBM; Trident II SLBM, and any other new medium- to long-range ballistic missile the United States might be planning.

(4) Which current ASAT and ABM programs would be affected? Any ASAT or ABM program involving the flight-testing of an interceptor vehicle against a target object in space would be affected by the moratorium, which would suspend such testing.

On the Soviet side, this would involve testing of the F-LV/SS-9 orbital ASAT and the Galosh ABM system against target objects in space.

On the U.S. side, this would involve testing of the Prototype Miniature Air-Launched System (PMALS) and its derivatives, and the Homing Overlay Experiment (HOE) interceptor and its derivatives, against target objects in space. Both of these programs involve the testing of a miniature homing vehicle (MHV) type warhead, and have no current equivalent on the Soviet side.

(5) Which current nuclear warhead programs would be affected? Any nuclear warhead program involving the underground detonation of a nuclear device would be affected by the moratorium, which would suspend such testing. In particular, the current administration's effort to gain the technological edge over the Soviets by developing and testing a so-called "third-generation" of "directed energy" nuclear devices—such as Livermore Laboratory's "Excalibur" nuclear bomb-pumped X-ray laser—would be suspended by such a moratorium while U.S. and Soviet negotiators completed the pending draft treaty for a Comprehensive Test Ban.

Experts involved in such negotiations in prior administrations estimate that CTB negotiations could be wrapped-up with only six months to a year of additional effort, and that current national technical means of verification would be adequate to safeguard U.S. national security for at least this interim period while additional verification provisions are negotiated.

(6) Doesn't Congressional action to facilitate a bilateral moratorium impinge on the Constitutional powers of the President? Not at all. The President is exclusively empowered to negotiate treaties. The power to declare war, and the power to appropriate the funds necessary to prepare for war, are solely the province of the Congress, and the Congress may attach whatever conditions it deems necessary when it authorizes these preparations. Surely, if the Congress is vested with the power to fund war preparations, it is also vested with the power to specify those conditions under which it is willing not to fund them. The President, of course, would retain his right to veto any act of Congress, thereby requiring passage by a two-thirds majority of both houses before the "Arms Race Moratorium Act" could become law.

(7) Could this moratorium be adequately verified? Yes. The United States intelligence community is already conducting extensive monitoring of the Soviet activities included in this moratorium. Provisions defining and limiting the deployment of new intercontinental ballistic missiles are part of the unratified SALT II agreement now being adhered to, and monitored intensively, by both sides. Unlike SALT II, which permits modifications of existing missiles to vary by as much as 5 percent from their predecessors in length, diameter, launch-weight, and throw-weight before they are regarded as "new," under the proposed moratorium any modification that would increase throw-weight, or number of reentry vehicles would be considered inconsistent with the mutual suspension of flight tests of new ballistic missiles. Thus the Soviets could not continue testing of the SS-25 mobile ICBM, as they are now doing, by claiming that changes in its key parameters do not exceed permitted variances from the older SS-13. Under the moratorium, the only "SS-13s" the Soviet Union would be permitted to test would be those produced and deployed in the late 1960's, long before the August 1, 1982 cutoff date contained in the moratorium. Clearly, fifteen years later, that is not the same missile they are testing today.

Despite the irresponsible statements of certain administration officials regarding the impossibility of an ASAT ban that would be adequately verifiable, most technical experts agree that a ban on the testing of rocket-boosted ASAT interceptors against target objects in space can be verified by National Technical Means.

A moratorium on the testing of nuclear warheads can be reliably monitored by long-range seismic methods down to explosions in the 2 to 5 kiloton range. Ambiguity surrounding seismic events with magnitudes corresponding to tests below this threshold would be diminished somewhat by other means of monitoring Soviet activity, such as communications activity emanating from the test site area, and stepped-up overhead photo-reconnaissance of likely test areas. The remaining uncertainty would be tolerable for several years, but would need to be reduced, and would be reduced, by installation of the regional "remote on-site" seismic monitoring networks called for in the draft Comprehensive Test Ban Treaty.

In general, because the threat to American security from some undetected "residual" Soviet weapons capability accumulates slowly, requiring several or many years before it could pose a serious threat to our national security, the standard of adequacy for verification of a moratorium can be somewhat less demanding than the standard one would want to apply to a negotiated agreement intended to last a decade or more. The proposed moratorium is intended to facilitate—not substitute for—carefully designed arms control agreements.

(8) What happens to the funding for weapons systems covered by the proposed moratorium? The authorization and appropriation of funds for the research, development, testing evaluation, procurement, deployment, operations, and maintenance of any military system would not be constrained by the provisions of the "Arms Race Moratorium Act." After enactment of this bill, and pending a new arms control agreement codifying the terms of the moratorium, Congress could elect to set aside funds for continuing weapons programs in the designated categories, but the contractual obligation or expenditure of funds by a government agency to test and deploy these weapons would be suspended for the duration of the moratorium.

Under the proposed moratorium, research and development activities which do not involve the observable field-testing of missiles or warheads would not be affected. For example, the United States could continue to obligate and expend funds for the engineering development of a small ICBM, such as Midgetman, but could not proceed to flight-testing or deployment of such a missile while the moratorium remained in force.

Similarly, the reliability of the current stockpile of nuclear weapons could continue to be checked by detonating the high explosive implosion device with instruments replacing the fissile material—thereby avoiding a nuclear explosion which would contravene the moratorium—and by thorough inspection and testing of its non-nuclear component parts.

(9) What if the Soviet cheat on the terms of the moratorium? Would this bill tie the hands of the Congress or the President? Not at all. If at any time during the moratorium the President certifies to Congress that the Soviet Union is conducting tests or deploying weapons which are inconsistent the moratorium, then the "fence" restraining the obligation and expenditure of previously appropriated funds for those designated activities would be automatically lifted. As part of any such certification, the President must substantiate his finding with a detailed report describing the activities of the Soviet Union that are the basis for the certification.

(10) What if the Soviets did not cheat in any major way that we could detect, but merely chiseled in a systematic way over a longer period while stringing out negotiations for enhanced verification procedures which would allow us to detect such "low-level cheating."? This possibility is fully provided for in the bill. At the end of each year that the moratorium remains in force, the President is required to report to Congress on the progress, or lack thereof, in arms control negotiations with the Soviet Union, and on whether continuation of the moratorium is in the best national security interests of the United States. If the President requests cancellation of the moratorium at that time on grounds other than evidence of Soviet cheating—such as lack of progress in arms control or the need to modernize the U.S. nuclear deterrent—and the Congress indicates by enactment of a Joint Resolution that is concurs with the President, then the moratorium would be terminated.

● Mr. DURENBERGER. Mr. President, I am pleased to join Senators HATFIELD, KENNEDY, STAFFORD, and CRANSTON in introducing the Arms Race Moratorium Act, which is popularly known as the "Quick Freeze." I believe that this measure, if it is enacted and if it is successfully pursued in Geneva, will provide for a major increase in the security of the United States.

I am sure that a number of my colleagues are curious about my cosponsorship of this measure. After all, I spoke out against the original Kennedy-Hatfield freeze resolution at the time it was first introduced, and I later voted to table consideration of that amendment. I continue to believe that the freeze resolution will not assist in the deadly serious business of pursuing successful and meaningful arms agreements. Why, then, would I cosponsor this act? Briefly, because the Arms Race Moratorium Act is a comparatively simple summary statement of views which I have repeatedly enunciated both in my voting record and in my statements.

The Arms Race Moratorium Act addresses itself to the urgent and pressing problem of weaponry which is the most destabilizing—rapid and accurate ballistic missiles which can threaten a first strike; antisatellite weaponry; and new developments in nuclear warheads. In other words, the quick freeze recognizes that the most important goal of arms negotiations is to foster crisis stability by distinguishing between weaponry which is needed for a secure second-strike deterrent and weaponry which raises the prospect of a first strike.

As has repeatedly been pointed out by critics of the freeze, ranging from the New York Times to Congressman LES ASPIN, the issue in arms control is not just whether there are too many nuclear weapons. There are. The issue instead is how to reduce the chances of war by focusing on those weapons which are most likely to be used in a crisis. In other words, the problem in arms negotiations is to focus on qualitative as well as quantitative measures of stable and sufficient deterrence.

The quick freeze—which is a bill with the binding force of law, and not a sense of Congress resolution like the freeze—creates the impetus for a mutual moratorium between the Soviet Union and the United States on three dangerous thrusts of the arms race: the flight testing and deployment of new ballistic missiles like the MX or the SS-X-24; the flight testing and deployment of antisatellite systems which could blind a country and deprive it of the confidence needed to withhold a nuclear strike as long as possible; and the testing of new nuclear weapons which are the basic factor in the arms race.

As a member of the Senate Intelligence Committee, I am confident that we can adequately monitor and verify compliance with these provisions, for the focus of the quick freeze is on readily observable phenomena like flight-testing and deployment, not on research and development.

Just as important, there are clear provisions in the bill for safeguards in the event that the Soviets should violate the moratorium. Moreover, the initial period of the moratorium is limited to 1 year, after which the President may recommend to Congress that it be continued in full, continued in part, or canceled. This means that, should we wish to deploy the single-warhead Midgetman missile which is an important step toward de-MIRVing our deterrent and adding to crisis stability, we can do so. The Midgetman missile is still in the early stages of development, so a 1-year moratorium will not preclude its deployment if such a move were to be in our interest. The same applies, of course, to the Trident II missile, which many people believe is, on balance, an improvement in our overall force posture.

It should be clear, in other words, that the Arms Race Moratorium Act stands in distinct contrast to the original freeze resolution. It is binding law rather than hortatory language. It is focused and specific rather than sweeping and potentially vague. It is fully verifiable. And it is—or it can be, if properly used—fully complementary to the broader thrust of the START negotiations.

Fundamentally, I had—and continue to have—three objections to the Kennedy-Hatfield freeze resolution, in contrast to the Arms Race Moratorium Act. First, the freeze resolution will stall rather than enhance an agreement. Second, it will disrupt relations with our allies. Third, it will increase rather than freeze or decrease the tendency toward greater and greater reliance on counterforce weaponry.

The original freeze resolution, which threw the problem of definition and duration into the laps of United States and Soviet negotiators, was fundamentally a change in the "rules of the road" which have been worked out over many years in United States-Soviet negotiations. From the SALT I accord through the last round of the START negotiations, arms control has been focused on distinguishing between stabilizing second-strike weaponry and destabilizing first-strike weaponry. So radical approach as was suggested by the freeze would require a total redefinition of arms control, and the result would be delay—delay during which the arms race goes forward.

The quick freeze, by contrast, is fully consonant with both traditional and emerging definitions of arms control. In particular, by putting a moratorium on the deployment of new and highly MIRV'ed ICBM's, the quick freeze supports rather than undercuts the logic of the build-down approach which originated here in Congress and was later adopted by the administration. To this day, I find it impossible to square the build-down, which I support, with the MX, which I do not. The entire thrust of the build-down is to provide a self-policing incentive against the deployment of MIRV'ed systems. To argue that the MX should be the political quid pro quo for adoption of the build-down is to overlook the compelling logic behind the initiative. So when the quick freeze anticipates a moratorium on the MX, it both sustains the position I have held over time and bolsters the logic of the build-down.

But the American strategic nuclear arsenal is designed to do more than deter a direct attack on the United States alone. It is designed to extend deterrence to our treaty allies, and in so doing, to reassure them that they are secure. One of the little-recognized benefits of this posture of extended deterrence is that it helps dampen incentive for an arms race among European or other nations. In other words, extended deterrence is one of the costs we pay for nonproliferation.

That is why it is so crucial that our arms negotiations take into full account the views and concerns of our allies. We are not in this alone, and we do little to provide the reassurance needed to hold the alliance together if we act unilaterally on matters which directly affect the European members of NATO. Unilateralism is not just arrogant. It is disruptive and potentially destabilizing as well.

So a major concern I had with the original freeze resolution was that it clearly was intended to halt the deployment of the long-range theater nuclear forces now being used to replace existing weaponry in Europe. The Pershing II and ground-launched cruise missiles are not simply American weapons being gratuitously emplaced in foreign soil. They are NATO weapons designed to bolster deterrence by enhancing the survivability of the theater nuclear forces. The decision to develop and deploy them was taken by the entire NATO alliance, and it was made contingent on Soviet unwillingness to address the urgent problems raised by the SS-20 and comparable systems which are being deployed at an unprecedented rate.

Even though the freeze resolution is not binding, it is clear that it contemplates a freeze on the NATO weapons. As such, it signals unilateralism to the NATO alliance. And as such, it cannot gain my support.

But the quick freeze, by contrast, focuses on those weapons which are both most destabilizing and solely under U.S. control. I continue to believe that the MX missile or the SS-X-23 and SS-X-24 are far more destablizing than the ground-launched cruise missile, which is deployed far to the rear in order to avoid preemption, which is slow in its flight time, and which carries only one warhead per missile. Since the quick freeze deals with the real problems in arms control, it is a vast improvement over the original freeze in the area of allied relations as well as the area of negotiability.

Finally, an unintended consequence of the original freeze, if it were fully implemented as written, would be an increase rather than a decrease in the first-strike potential of the nuclear forces deployed by the United States and the Soviet Union. That is because the original freeze resolution, by focusing on all nuclear weapons and delivery vehicles, would preclude modernization of our manned bomber force. Again, as is the case with the rules of the road and with the issue of NATO weaponry, the fundamental failing of the original freeze resolution is that it does not distinguish among various categories of nuclear forces. The quick freeze avoids that pitfall.

There is general agreement among the arms control community that, until we can obtain full disarmament, such nuclear forces as are held by each side in the United States-Soviet arms race should be unambiguously second-strike in nature. In other words, they should be "slow to anger": able to avoid preemption through such devices as basing; capable of recall after launch; and slow enough to avoid any suggestion of a surprise attack. The manned bomber force alone is uniquely suited to this role.

It is not fully understood just how fragile our existing fleet of B-52's really is. The last plane rolled off the production line in 1962. Although every plane in the force has undergone extensive rehabilitation and updating, only so much can be done. The airframe was not designed for the low-level flight profile which the plane has flown for nearly a quarter century. Engines are wearing out and spare parts are no longer produced. On any given day, large numbers of B-52's are deadlined for overhaul, and even those on full alert are often incapable of taking off on time.

In short, it is overwhelmingly clear that if the United States does not soon begin to replace the B-52's with another plane—whether a B-1 such as I support along with freeze advocates like Senator CRANSTON or the advanced technology bomber known as "Stealth"—we will soon have no bombers at all. Aside from the fact that this will move us away from the safety of the Triad which we have deployed for years, it will mean that such nuclear forces as we deploy will be based on ballistic missiles, whether land-based or submarine-based. Consequently, if we were to freeze our arsenal so as to preclude the adoption of a new bomber, we would actually decrease rather than bolster crisis stability. The quick freeze, with its focus on ballistic missiles, does not fall into this trap.

One final point should be stressed about the quick freeze. As I argued 2 years ago, the quickest way to put a meaningful brake on the arms race is to ratify the existing threshold test ban treaties and to pursue a comprehensive test ban treaty. New developments in warhead design are truly menacing. Only a test ban can insure that they are not later deployed. With its emphasis on a moratorium on nuclear warhead testing, the quick freeze will put a halt to some of the most disturbing developments on the horizon.

Mr. President, it bears emphasis that this act was authored with the assistance of many people, including the leadership of the National Freeze Campaign. There was a time, not long ago, when the patriotism of many people in the freeze movement and in related organizations was called into question by some people in public life. Such imputations rightly angered the vast majority of Americans. The fact that the leadership of the freeze campaign has demonstrated its willingness to learn from others while teaching others speaks legions about the integrity and patriotism of these dedicated Americans, who share with all of us the desire for a safer world.

Mr. President, as my remarks have made clear, I strongly believe that the Arms Race Moratorium Act represents a significant approach to arms control and a distinct improvement over the original freeze resolution. I urge my colleagues to study this bill carefully, and I hope that the Senate will have the chance at the earliest possible opportunity to debate and pass this important measure.●

● Mr. MITCHELL. Mr. President, today I am joining with several of my colleagues in sponsoring important arms control legislation. The Arms

Race Moratorium Act. I urge all Senators to examine this legislation closely, to evaluate it in the context of the present state or arms control negotiations and to give it their active support.

Though authored by Senators HATFIELD and KENNEDY—who originated the nuclear freeze resolution—the Arms Race Moratorium Act, differs considerably from the freeze resolution. The freeze would place the Congress on record in support of an arms control negotiating approach.

The Arms Race Moratorium Act goes a step further in proposing a way in which the ultimate objective of the freeze resolution may be achieved. It should be considered in concert with the earlier resolution. They are complementary.

Arms control negotiations on nuclear weapons are now at a standstill. In the absence of progress in these talks, both the United States and the Soviet Union are moving ahead with their nuclear weapons development efforts and are entering a new phase of potentially deadly competition.

The Reagan administration is planning to substantially increase the number of its nuclear warheads and is vigorously preparing for the flight testing and the development of the MX missile. In addition, it is organizing a massive effort to establish superiority in space-based antisatellite weapons.

For its part, the U.S.S.R. is developing several new intercontinental ballistic missiles a new submarine missile and its own inventory of antisatellite systems.

In the absence of effective arms controls, both the United States and the U.S.S.R. perceive a national security need not to be left behind as the other moves ahead. These perceptions are as dangerous as they are easy to understand. Unless each nation' perception is changed—unless both are convinced that a nuclear weapons freeze will not alter the existing balance of nuclear war power—the superpower arsenals will continue to grow. In the process, what stability exists will erode while the stakes in the nuclear weapons game will increase.

The bill we are offering today is innovative. It proposes that the United States ask the Soviet Union to forego the kinds of development I have mentioned. In return for a moratorium agreement by the Soviets, the United States would reciprocate.

If the U.S.S.R. agrees within 90 days of passage of this bill and our President refuses to direct a reciprocal U.S. moratorium, the bill provides that Congress would suspend funds for the testing and development of new ballistic missiles and antisatellite weapons and the testing of new warheads.

In early January, President Reagan said of nuclear arms control: "Now is the time to move from words to deeds." That is precisely what the Arms Race Moratorium Act proposes to do.

Some will suggest that this bill is heavy-handed, that it involves the legislative branch too directly in international negotiations, that it is drastic. Such suggestions undoubtedly will be made by the same people who oppose the nuclear freeze resolution, which they claim to be simplistic, lacking in substance and ultimately ineffective.

There is a message here.

If the President is truly committed to action on arms control and if he really believes that "now is the time to move from words to deeds," he will not reject the bill we propose today. Instead, he and his national security advisors will work with us in a cooperative way to reopen the nuclear arms control dialog with the Soviet Union and to insure that something meaningful comes of it. I, for one, would welcome such cooperation between the President and Congress. I would do so because, in my opinion, the need to put a halt to the nuclear arms race is the most serious issue facing our people.

A key consideration in all arms control discussions is verification. Those of us who offer this bill believe that the United States possesses the means by which it can verify a Soviet decision to halt the development, testing and deployment of new weapons. If we did not believe this, we would not be presenting the bill today nor would we have included in it a provision which permits immediate funding of U.S. weapons efforts if the President determines that the Soviets have breached the moratorium agreement.

In July 1945, in the darkness of an early morning, the first atomic bomb was exploded. That explosion, which ushered in the atomic age, was one of the great turning points in human history.

For the first time since the dawn of civilization, man acquired the power to destroy life on Earth.

Over a century age, the German diplomat, Baron von Clausewitz, advanced the idea of war as an extension of diplomacy. He said that "War is a political act, . . . a continuation of political relations, a carrying out of the same (policy) by other means."

That maxim is accepted and acted upon by governments today, as it was then. There has been no decrease in the willingness of nations to resort to armed force when political means fail. We need look only to Afghanistan, to Southeast Asia, to Central America, to the Middle East for recent examples of this unfortunate reality.

But there is a major difference between the time in which von Clausewitz lived and the time in which we live. Wars have always injured and killed human beings. Wars have cost nations their treasuries. Wars strengthened the hatreds and deepened the divisions between people.

But until very recently no country, no person, had the power to annihilate an entire nation, even the world as we know it. That is something man can do today.

That destructive power makes von Clausewitz's formulation of war as an arm of diplomacy dangerous and irrelevant.

Most scientists agree that it would take at most a few hundred nuclear weapons to totally destroy either the United States or the Soviet Union. We and our allies now possess over 30,000 nuclear warheads. The Soviet Union and its allies possess over 20,000.

As these figures make clear nuclear war would not be just another conflict. It prevents for the first time the prospect of the ultimate holocaust. Nuclear war, accordingly, is not and cannot be acceptable. Most importantly it is not inevitable.

The fundamental illogic of an unrestrained nuclear arms race has not escaped the American people, who are saying, ever more clearly, that enough is enough. And they are right.

I believe in a strong America. Plainly, American military strength plays an important role in deterring aggression. But maintaining, even improving our strength, is not inconsistent with reaching fair, balanced, verifiable agreements with the Soviet Union to halt the increase in nuclear weapons and bring about a reduction of such weapons.

Not long ago, George Kennan, former U.S. Ambassador to Russia and a lifelong student of relations between these two nations put it well when he said:

> At the end of our present path of unlimited confrontation lies no visible destination but failure and horror. What is needed is only the will, the courage, the boldness, the affirmation of life, to declare our independence of nuclear danger, and to turn our minds and hearts to better things.

Mr. President, the bill we introduce today is a sound proposal which I commend to my colleagues and our President. I look forward to working with the other sponsors of the bill in an effort to secure its passage.●

By Mr. STAFFORD:

S. 2635. A bill to authorize appropriations for the Public Buildings Service of the General Services Administration for fiscal year 1985; to the Committee on Environment and Public Works.

PUBLIC BUILDINGS AUTHORIZATION ACT OF 1984

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. President, the Committee on Environment and Public Works—in addition to its better-known jurisdictions in clean air, clean water, highways, and waterways—is responsible for the activities of the Public Buildings Service of the General Services Administration. In recent years, public buildings has been a full committee responsibility which I have shared with my friend from West Virginia, JENNINGS RANDOLPH, and which has also attracted the particular interest and attention of Senator MOYNIHAN and Senator SIMPSON. Each has been most attentive and made substantial contributions to our effort, with other Members, to define Federal buildings policy and to guide GSA to effective implementation of a national building program—as currently embodied in S. 452.

Pursuant to the policies first established by our committee in 1979, and consistent with S. 2080, S. 533, and S. 452, each of which were adopted in the Senate by large majorities, our committee has each year since 1979 recommended to the Senate an annual authorization bill for the agency.

Most recently, the committee scheduled a hearing on the 1985 authorizations for the Public Buildings Service—which will be our fifth such authorization—being held today. The proposal that has been developed follows very closely, and is substantially identical to, the agency's program as contained in the President's budget.

This authorization, like the fiscal 1985 authorization for other programs within the jurisdiction of the committee, must be reported to the Senate by May 15 if it is not to be subject to a waiver under the budget reform act. In order to fulfill that requirement, the committee is scheduled to meet in business session on Tuesday and on Thursday of next week to complete action on the various authorizations, including that for the Public Buildings Service.

So that Members of the Senate, affected agencies, and the public may be informed, and in order to place it formally before the committee prior to markup, the proposed fiscal year 1985 authorization for the Public Buildings Service as it has been prepared and submitted to Members should be a matter of record. For these reasons, I send to the desk the bill drafted prior to the hearing which proposes fiscal 1985 authorizations for the Public Buildings Service.

Mr. President, while this annual exercise provides an opportunity for a rather cursory examination of the intentions of the Public Buildings Service, I do not wish to imply it completes our oversight or permits a thorough examination of the operations of the agency. The Public Buildings Service is currently making several changes in policy, is reexamining existing programs, and is continually confronted with decisions of significant importance—not only on specific projects but also in carrying out Federal building policy. The committee continues its interest in these policies and decisions, and will continue to follow them closely with the assistance of staff and through additional meetings and public hearings as necessary.

Mr. President, I ask that the text of the bill be printed at this point in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the text of the bill was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That this Act may be cited as the "Public Buildings Authorization Act of 1984."

SEC. 2. No appropriation, including any appropriation from the fund established pursuant to section 210(f) of the Federal Property and Administrative Service Act of 1949, shall be made by Congress or obligated by the Administrator unless it has been authorized by Congress in accordance with this Act.

SEC. 3. (a) No public building construction, renovation, repair, or alteration shall be commenced unless an appropriation has first been made in the same fiscal year for which such appropriation has first been made in the same fiscal year for which such appropriation is authorized and for the estimated cost of completion of such construction, renovation, repair, or alteration.

(b) Beginning in fiscal year 1986, no lease shall be entered into unless the authority to enter into contracts has first been made for the maximum cost of such lease over the entire term in such amounts as are specified in annual appropriations Acts and in the fiscal year for which such lease is authorized.

SEC. 4. There is hereby authorized to be appropriated for fiscal year 1985 not to exceed in the aggregate the amount of $2,227,802,000 from revenues and collections deposited into the fund pursuant to section 210(f) of the Federal Property and Administrative Services Act of 1949, as amended (40 U.S.C. 490(f)), for the real property management and related activities of the Public Buildings Service of which:

(a) Not to exceed $91,877,000 shall be available for fiscal year 1985 as follows:

(1) For construction of public buildings (including funds for sites and expenses) at the following locations and maximum construction costs:

District of Columbia, Old Post Office (Internal Revenue Service Courtyard)	$2,000,000
Texas, El Paso, Border Station	6,893,000

Virginia, Arlington, Pentagon	4,602,000

(2) $140,805,000 for renovations and repairs of public buildings at project costs of less than $1,000,000 including the public buildings at the following locations and maximum project costs:

Iowa, Sioux City, Post Office Courthouse	$809,000
Missouri, Kansas City, 1500 E. Bannister Road	907,000
Texas, Fort Worth, Warehouse #5	710,000

(3) $9,000,000 for alterations of leased buildings, the maximum cost for a single building being less than $250,000.

(c) Notwithstanding the provisions of section 3(a) of this Act, not to exceed $53,572,000 shall be available for design and construction services.

(d) Not to exceed $865,000,000 shall be available for fiscal year 1985 as follows:

(1) $25,700,000 for rental increases due to lease expirations and for expansion space, and

(2) $839,300,000 for payments in fiscal year 1985 to provide for space under lease prior to fiscal year 1985, including increases in operating costs and taxes.

(e) Not to exceed $694,998,000 shall be available for fiscal year 1985 real property operations.

(f) Not to exceed $117,040,000 shall be available for fiscal year 1985 program direction.

(g) Not to exceed $178,911,000 shall be available for fiscal year 1985 for payment of principal, interest, taxes, and any other obligation for public buildings acquired by purchase contract.

SEC. 5. (a) Funds appropriated under section 4 of the Act for construction, renovation, repair, or alteration shall remain available for obligation and expenditure without regard to fiscal year limitations: Provided, That construction, renovation, repair or alteration has commenced in the same fiscal year which funds are made available.

(b) Commencement of design using funds authorized pursuant to section 4(c) of this Act for projects authorized by sections 4(a) and 4(b) shall be regarded as complying with the provisions of subsection (a) of this section.

SEC. 6. Ten per centum of the funds made available pursuant to this Act to the Public Buildings Service for renovation, alteration, and repair of public buildings and for payment of leases on buildings shall be available for repair or alteration projects and leases, respectively, not otherwise authorized by this Act, if the Administrator certifies that the space to be repaired, altered, or leased resulted from emergency building conditions or changing or additional programs of Federal agencies. Funds for such projects may not be obligated until thirty days after the submission by the Administrator of an explanatory statement to the Committee on Environment and Public Works of the Senate and the Committee on Public Works and Transportation of the House of Representatives. The explanatory statement shall, among other things, include a statement of the reasons why such project or lease cannot be deferred for authorization in the next succeeding fiscal year.

By Mr. SASSER (for himself, Mr. PELL, Mr. NUNN, Mr. MATHIAS, Mr. SARBANES, Mr. LEVIN, Mr. PRYOR, Mr. BINGAMAN, and Mr. BUMPERS):

S. 2636. A bill to require the Administrator of General Services to notify State and local governments and agencies thereof prior to the disposal of surplus real property; to the Committee on Governmental Affairs.

REAL PROPERTY DISPOSAL POLICY ACT OF 1984

● Mr. SASSER. Mr. President, I rise to introduce, for myself and Senators PELL, NUNN, MATHIAS, SARBANES, LEVIN, PRYOR, BINGAMAN, and BUMPERS, S. 2636, legislation to clarify and amend procedures to be followed by the General Services Administration in the disposal of surplus Federal real property. The main purpose of this measure is to strengthen notice and comment procedures to be followed by GSA when State or local governments or their instrumentalities are eligible to acquire such property to use for schools, hospitals, airports, parks, or similar public uses.

This measure builds upon Senator PELL's approach in S. 102 to opening up the process for the conveyance of parks and recreational areas. I would like to note the invaluable work that Senator PELL did in this area. It has been very helpful to me to work with him in drafting the bill I introduce today.

I also note the legislative work of Senator BUMPERS in S. 891 to encourage the transfer of Federal properties, particularly those managed by the Bureau of Land Management, to State and local governments to be used for parks and other public purposes. I am pleased that he joins me in cosponsoring S. 2636.

I think it is important to state that the provisions of my bill are designed to make sure State and local governments are notified that they have an opportunity to obtain property declared surplus to the needs of the Federal Government—when such property is needed for specific public purpose. It is certainly not my intention to stop appropriate marketing of Federal surplus property to the private sector. In fact, many local governments are very eager to work with the General Services Administration in promoting auctions of surplus property in their jurisdictions. Commercial sales to the private sector are often of great benefit to local communities because they add property to the local tax rolls. Private ownership of such real estate increases opportunities for industrial development and the creation of jobs. For that reason, I know that local and State governments are willing and valuable partners with the Federal Government in carrying forward appropriate property sales.

However, I am among many Members of Congress who have been very concerned about the recent decline in Federal real property conveyances for the public benefit. The transfer of surplus real property to State and local government for use for educational and public health purposes, for parks and historical markers, for recreation and wildlife refuges, and for public airports has been backed repeatedly by Congress in law. With unanimous consent, I request that an appendix citing these laws be printed in the RECORD at this point.

There being no objection, the appendix was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

APPENDIX "A"

LAWS AUTHORIZING DISPOSAL OF SURPLUS REAL PROPERTY TO LOCAL GOVERNMENTS AND INSTITUTIONS

Historic Monument.—Section 203(k)(3) of the Federal Property and Administrative Services Act of 1949, as amended (40 U.S.C. 484(k)(3)) authorizes conveyance to any State, political subdivision, instrumentalities thereof, or municipality, of all the right, title, and interest of the United States in and to any surplus real and related personal property which in the determination of the Secretary of the Interior is suitable and desirable for use as an historic monument for the benefit of the public. Conveyances of property for historic monument purposes under this authority shall be made without monetary consideration to the United States: Provided, that no property shall be determined under this authority to be suitable or desirable for use as an historic monument except in conformity with the recommendation of the Advisory Board on National Parks, Historic Sites, Buildings and Monuments established by section 3 of the Act of Congress approved August 21, 1935 (49 Stat. 666) and only so much of any such property shall be so determined to be suitable or desirable for such use as is necessary for the preservation and proper observation of its historic features. Property conveyed for historic monument purposes may under certain circumstances be used for revenue-producing activities to support the historic monument. Deeds conveying any surplus real property disposed of under this authority shall provide that the property shall be used and maintained for the purposes for which it was conveyed in perpetuity and may contain such additional terms, reservations, restrictions, and conditions as may be determined by the Administrator to be necessary to safeguard the interest of the United States.

Public Parks and Public Recreational Areas.—Section 203(k)(2) of the Federal Property and Administrative Services Act of 1949, as amended (40 U.S.C. 484(k)(2)), authorizes the Administrator of General Services, in his discretion, to assign to the Secretary of the Interior for disposal, such surplus property, including buildings, fixtures, and equipment situated thereon, as is recommended by the Secretary of the Interior as being needed for use as a public park or recreation area. The Act authorizes the Secretary to sell or lease such properties to any State, political subdivision, instrumentalities thereof, or municipality, and to fix the sale or lease value of the property to be disposed of, taking into consideration any benefit which has accrued or may accrue to the United States from the use of such property by any such State, political subdivision, instrumentality, or municipality.

Deeds conveying any surplus real property disposed of under this authority provide that the property shall be used and maintained for the purpose for which it was conveyed in perpetuity and may contain such additional terms, reservations, restrictions, and conditions as may be determined by the Secretary of the Interior to be necessary to safeguard the interest of the United States.

Public Airports.—Section 13(g) of the Surplus Property Act of 1944 (50 U.S.C. App. 1622(g)), which is continued in effect by section 602(a) of the Federal Property and Administrative Services Act of 1949 and amended by Public Law 311, 81st Congress (50 U.S.C. App. 1622(a)-(c)), authorizes the conveyance or disposal of all right, title, and interest of the United States in and to any surplus real property or personal property (exclusive of property the highest and best use of which is determined by the Administrator to be industrial) to any State, political subdivision, municipality or tax-supported institution without monetary consideration to the United States. Such property must be determined by the Secretary, Department of Transportation to be suitable, essential, or desirable for development, improvement, operation, or maintenance of a public airport as defined in the Federal Airport Act, as amended (49 U.S.C. 1101), or reasonably necessary to fulfill the immediate and foreseeable future requirements of the grantee for development, improvement, operation, or maintenance of a public airport, including property needed to develop sources of revenue from non-aviation businesses at a public airport. This section provides specific terms, conditions, reservations, and restrictions upon which such conveyances or disposals may be made.

Health or Educational Use.—Section 203(k)(1) of the Federal Property and Administrative Services Act of 1949, as amended (40 U.S.C. 484(k)(1)), authorizes the Administrator of General Services, in his discretion, to assign to the Secretary of Health, Education, and Welfare for disposal such surplus real property, including buildings, fixtures, and equipment situated thereon, as is recommended by the Secretary of Health, Education, and Welfare as being needed for school, classroom, or other educational uses, or for use in the protection of public health, including research. The Act authorizes the Secretary to sell or lease such properties to States or their political subdivisions and instrumentalities, and tax-supported medical and educational institutions, non-profit educational institutions, hospitals, or other similar institutions not operated for profit which have been held exempt from taxation under section 501(c)(3) of the Internal Revenue Code of 1954, and to fix the sale of lease value of the property to be disposed of taking into consideration any benefit which has accrued or may accrue to the United States from the use of the property by any such State, political subdivision, instrumentality, or institution. The principal restrictive provision in the instrument of conveyance requires the property to be used continuously for a specified period for the specific purpose stated in the application for the property made to the Department of Health, Education, and Welfare.

Wildlife Conservation.—Public Law 537, 80th Congress (16 U.S.C. 667b-d) provides that, upon request, real property which is under the jurisdiction or control of a Federal agency and no longer required by such agency (1) can be utilized for wildlife conservation purposes by the agency of the State exercising administration over the wildlife resources of the State wherein the real property lies or by the Secretary of the Interior; and (2) is valuable for use for any such purpose, and which, in the determination of the Administrator of General Services, is available for such use may, notwithstanding any other provisions of law, be transferred without reimbursement or transfer of funds (with or without improvements as determined by said Administrator) by the Federal agency having jurisdiction or control of the property to (a) such State agency if the management thereof for the conservation of wildlife relates to other than migratory birds, or (b) to the Secretary of the Interior if the real property has particular value in carrying out the national migratory bird management program. Any such transfer to other than the United States shall be subject to the reservation by the United States of all oil, gas, and mineral rights, and to the condition that the property shall continue to be used for wildlife conservation or other of the above-stated purposes and in the event it is no longer used for such purposes or in the event it is needed for national defense purposes title thereto shall revert to the United States.

Negotiated Sales to Public Agencies (without use restrictions).—The Federal Property and Administrative Services Act of 1949, as amended (40 U.S.C. 484(e)(3)(H)) authorizes the negotiated sale of surplus real property, subject to obtaining such competition as is feasible under the circumstances to States, Territories, possessions, political subdivisions thereof, or tax-supported agencies therein, provided the estimated fair market value of the property and other satisfactory terms of disposal are obtained by negotiation. Deeds conveying surplus real property under this section contain no restriction on the use of properties conveyed. In accordance with further provisions of the section, an explanatory statement of the circumstances of each disposal by negotiation is prepared and submitted to the appropriate committees of Congress in advance of each disposal when the property involved has a fair market value in excess of $1,000.

Other Specific Uses.—For other laws authorizing disposition of property under GSA's control, including excess and surplus property, see:

Federal aid and other highways—(23 U.S.C. 107 and 317).

Widening of public highways, streets, or alleys—(40 U.S.C. 345(c).

Power transmission lines needful for or adaptable to the requirements of a public power project—(50 U.S.C. App. 1622(d)).

Mr. SASSER. Mr. President, with such extensive legislative backing, it is no wonder that for 32 years, intergovernmental transfers of property for the public benefit were commonplace. More than 3,000 such properties were conveyed for the public benefit between 1949 and 1982.

In 1982, though, the Reagan administration decided that such transfers of surplus real property should be brought to a virtual halt—so that more of these properties could be sold commercially to help retire the national debt. Early projections by the administration raised the expectation that $1.2 billion could be raised in 1983 through land sales. However, this optimistic projection was soon revised to $646 million by the General Services Administration. The actual sales contracts for 1983 were just $190 million. Some reports place cash receipts for the year at as little as $35 million.

At a time when the administration policies are adding to the debt at an unprecedented rate of $200 billion per year—contributing the small amount of money actually brought in by real property sales sounds a little like trying to drain the ocean with a teacup. While the goal seemed worthy, the realities of the situation have made the land sales program fall far short of realization of the objective of reducing the debt.

On the other hand, the benefit of the use of suitable properties for hospitals, schools, parks, and colleges can not be measured in dollars and cents. Ask the little league team about the value of the public park where the baseball diamond is located. Or question the young mother in rural community about the worth of the health clinic where she takes her baby for pediatric care. Or quiz the elderly widower about the price tag he would place on the senior citizen center where he meets friends and learns useful skills. Each will tell you that properties put to such public uses are priceless.

In 1980, there were 110 properties transferred to other levels of government to be used for the public benefit. In fiscal 1983, there were only 30 such conveyances. For the same period of time, sales jumped from 196 in 1980 to 396 in 1983. This rapid decline in conveyances for the public benefit I find a source of concern. With unanimous consent, I ask that a table showing the decline in intergovernmental donations of property and the accompanying increase in sales be printed in the RECORD at this point.

There being no objection, the table was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

PUBLIC BENEFIT PROGRAMS DISCOUNT CONVEYANCES—PARCELS DONATED

Total	306	301	195	426	1,228

Note.—For fiscal year 1984 the General Services Administration estimated that it would sell 557 parcels and make 18 public benefits conveyances.

Mr. SASSER. Mr. President, the pattern of conveyances for the public benefit to other levels of government has been drastically altered by the General Services Administration operating under Executive Order 12348 issued by President Reagan on February 25, 1982. Very little property is conveyed at discounted or no cost. If State or local governments are to acquire Federal property, they must be prepared to compete with the commercial sector in paying fair market value.

According to a report (H.R. 98-576) issued in 1983 by the House Government Operations Committee, the General Services Administration circulated internal memoranda in March of 1982 instructing its regional offices to first determine a given property's "highest and best use" independently and then either decide that the property should be sold or recommend it to GSA's Washington Office as suitable for public benefit conveyance. The term "highest and best use" is real estate terminology that refers exclusively to commercial value.

This procedure departs from the prior practice of GSA of giving program agencies such as Health and Human Services or Education the opportunity to comment—along with local interests—on the public benefit potential of surplus Federal property. And non-Federal public agencies are no longer afforded a reasonable—and early—opportunity to apply for surplus property in which they may be interested.

The General Services Administration, rather than HHS or Education, determines whether a property has merit for educational or health purposes. And most of those that are recommended for public purposes require reimbursement to the Federal Government at full market value.

I feel that this policy discourages the Federal Government from recognizing the many legitimate situations that still exist where the conveyance of real property to benefit the public is in the national interest. Since this real estate has already been paid for by the taxpayers, it seems unfair to ask that it be paid for again. The public benefit is the same whether the property is administered by the National, State or local government.

I should mention here that the procedures followed for the evaluation of property for park or recreational use differ from those used in assessments for other public purposes. Section 303(c) of Public Law 95-625 requires procedures to be established to give the Department of the Interior "full and early opportunity" to comment on potential park uses of surplus Federal property. However, this 1978 statute was not implemented until September of 1983—and then it was at the insistence of a House Government Operations Subcommittee. The procedures set forth by GSA, the Office of Management and Budget and the Department of the Interior allow Interior to comment on the park and recreational values of property during the review by GSA. These comments can then be considered by GSA in making the highest and best use determination for the property.

The procedures followed by the General Services Administration are particularly important since GSA now has the full responsibility for decisions concerning ths potential public benefit of property under consideration for disposal. I ask that the February 6, 1984, letter of John Svahn, Chairman of the Federal Property Review Board, notifying GSA that the Board will no longer review such decisions, be printed in the RECORD at this point.

There being no objection, the letter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

THE WHITE HOUSE,
Washington, D.C., February 6, 1984.

Hon. GERALD P. CARMEN,
Administrator, General Services Administration, Washington, D.C.

DEAR MR. CARMEN: In accordance with agreed upon procedures, you have asked the Property Review Board for advice concerning proposed public benefit discount conveyances in advance of acting on such requests.

On April 6, 1982, the Board provided you with policy guidance criteria for the granting of public benefit discount conveyances. Over the past eighteen months the proposed public benefit discount conveyances which you have submitted to the Board for policy advice have demonstrated that those guidelines are clear and have been effectively applied by the General Services Administration. As you know, the Board has concurred in every proposal for a public benefit discount conveyances which was referred to it.

Further, notwithstanding the Board's advice, since statutorily you retain discretion in decisions concerning such applications, it is clear that further participation by the Board in this process is unnecessary and duplicative of the efforts of the General Services Administration.

Accordingly, it is no longer necessary for you to solicit the Board's advice prior to acting on requests for public benefit discount conveyances.

Sincerely,

JOHN A. SVAHN,
Chairman, Property Review Board.

Mr. SASSER. Mr. President, there have been several cases in my State of Tennessee where worthy requests for conveyances—or for the retention of property by the Federal Government—have been held hostage to the push at GSA to meet sales quotas. One that I would like to highlight here is the situation at Oak Ridge. I believe it demonstrates that the current emphasis on commercial sale of Federal property has created an atmosphere were important considerations other than economics are ignored.

The General Services Administration sought to sell 12.5 acres of land in front of the Federal Building at Oak Ridge, Tenn. The city government—and the citizens of Oak Ridge—protested the sale strongly. People in the Oak Ridge community felt that the land had historical value and that the open space provided by this "lawn" in front of the Federal Building was needed in the congested city setting. So, before the sale by GSA could take place, the city government rezoned the property so that its use would continue to be appropriate to community needs.

The General Services Administration went ahead with the auction—but the bid offered was much lower than anticipated. As a result, GSA withdrew the property from the commercial market.

On September 26, 1983, the General Services Administration requested the Department of Justice to bring suit on behalf of the United States against the city of Oak Ridge. The GSA proposed that Justice seek a declaratory judgment or writ of mandamus by which the reclassification of this parcel of land from "Office" to "Residential, Open Space and Reserved" would be declared unconstitutional.

I think this action by GSA—especially if Justice agrees to the suit—sets a dangerous precedent for the future in GSA's management of Federal property in local jurisdictions. It is possible that local governments will no longer have any voice in the disposal of Federal property in their jurisdictions. However, I do not believe that is what the Congress intended in enacting the detailed procedures for working with local governments when disposals are contemplated under the Federal Property and Administration Services Act.

Both the National Association of Counties and the National League of Cities have adopted policy statements urging that the established program of discounted transfers of surplus Federal property be continued. With unanimous consent, I request that these policy statements be inserted in the RECORD at this point.

There being no objection, the statements were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

NATIONAL MUNICIPAL POLICY—1983

F. Federal Surplus Property.—The federal government holds title to many land parcels and properties, some unused and some underused, in localities across the nation. Authority in law exists for these properties that are in excess of federal agencies' needs to be made available to local governments at reasonable cost for the purpose of providing low and moderate income housing and related public, commercial, or industrial facilities. We urge the federal Executive Branch to use these authorities vigorously and sensitively: agencies should reassess their needs for unused or underused properties, especially those located in cities that have shortages of land for development, and should list such properties for disposal by the General Services Administration: GSA should facilitate the transfer of otherwise unneeded properties; and HUD should use assertively its authority to reduce the cost of the property and otherwise assist local governments to develop appropriate projects.

RESOLUTION ON FEDERAL LAND SALES

Whereas, both the Administration and Congress are proposing initiatives to sell federal lands to help reduce the federal deficit; and

Whereas, the President has already created a Property Review Board within the Executive Branch to carry out this initiative, i.e., the development and review of federal real property policies, including disposal; and

Whereas, both Congress and the Administration recommend the elimination of the no-cost discounted conveyances of federal lands to local governments for public purposes, and selling all federal lands at fair market value; and

Whereas, State and local governments are most attuned and sensitive to the long-term land use needs of the public within their various jurisdictions, to the extent that these needs relate to the use of surplus federal lands; and therefore, State and local government input in the selection and disposition of unencumbered surplus federal lands by the Federal Property Review Board would effectively implement the desired policy; and

Whereas, elevating to the status of legislative policy the thirty-three-year federal practice of offering to the State and local governments surplus federal lands at no cost or with a public benefit discount would also enable these governments to meet the long-term social and economic land use needs of the public in a manner consistent with the desired policy;

Now therefore be it resolved, That the National Association of Counties requests that the President create an advisory board of local officials to work with the Property Review Board; and

Be it further resolved, That the Administration insure local involvement in every step of the federal property disposal process because the Property Review Board will need information as to how its policies and activities will affect the economic and social fabric of impacted communities; and

Be it further resolved, That Property Review Board decisions be consistent with local land use planning and zoning; and

Be it further resolved, That the National Association of Counties opposes proposals to eliminate no-cost and discounted conveyances of federal lands to local governments for public purposes because such results could seriously impede county ability to acquire land for public purpose activities; if such lands go only to the highest bidder such an outcome might not serve the public interest; and important public values could be lost; and

Be it further resolved, That the National Association of Counties strongly urges Congress to adopt legislation mandating no-cost and discounted conveyances of unencumbered surplus federal lands to state and local governments; the right of first refusal on their part regarding such conveyances; and participatory input by these governments in the selection and disposition of surplus federal lands by the Property Review Board to ensure their use and management in a manner consistent with the aforementioned policy.

Mr. SASSER. Mr. President, in light of this situation, I am today introducing legislation to:

Require GSA to give reasonable notice to States and local governments when they are entitled to receive property under the Federal Property and Administrative Services Act;

Make it incumbent on GSA to file a statement prior to the disposal of property worth over $50,000. The statement must be sent to the appropriate committees of Congress 30 days in advance of the disposal action. And other Federal agencies and the levels of Government must also receive a copy; and Require GSA to certify to Congress that the disposal action under consideration is consistent with the purposes of the law.

It is my intention that this measure will reaffirm the policy already set by Congress that, in appropriate situations, intergovernmental conveyances of property to benefit the public are in the national interest.

With unanimous consent, I ask that my bill, S. 2636, be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the bill was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That this Act may be cited as the "Real Property Disposal Policy Act of 1984".

SEC. 2. The Congress finds and declares that—

(1) the Federal Government owns many surplus real properties in State and local jurisdictions across the Nation, and many of these properties have not been used by the Federal Government;

(2) legal authority exists for the disposal of surplus real property to a State or local government at reasonable or no cost when such property can be used for the benefit of the public;

(3) the current policies of the General Services Administration discourage transfers of property to State and local governments, and such policies are inconsistent with the Federal Property and Administrative Services Act of 1949; and

(4) State and local jurisdictions in which surplus real properties are located should be given sufficient notice when the Administrator of General Services considers the disposal of such properties and an adequate opportunity to incorporate such properties into the zoning and land use plans of such jurisdictions.

PROCEDURES FOR THE DISPOSAL OF SURPLUS REAL PROPERTY

SEC. 3. Section 203(a) of the Federal Property and Administrative Services Act of 1949 is amended by inserting "(1)" before "Except" and by adding at the end thereof the following new paragraphs:

"(2) Notwithstanding any other provision of this Act whenever the Administrator considers—

"(A) disposing of any surplus real property for or on behalf of any executive agency, or

"(B) authorizing any executive agency to dispose of any surplus real property, the Administrator shall, prior to offering such property for disposal or authorizing such agency to dispose of such property, give reasonable notice of, and an opportunity to comment on, the disposal of such property to any State, political subdivision, agency, or instrumentality of a State, municipality, educational institution, medical institution, hospital, or other institution, which may be eligible to receive such property under subsection (e)(3)(H) or subsection (k) of this section.

"(3) At least 30 days before the disposal, by the Administrator or any executive agency, of any surplus real property which has a fair market value in excess of $50,000 and to which paragraph (2) applies, the Administrator shall prepare and transmit to the appropriate committees of Congress, appropriate executive agencies, and the governing body responsible for zoning or land-use planning of the locality in which such property is located, a statement—

"(A) describing the surplus real property intended for disposal and the method intended to be used in such disposal;

"(B) summarizing any comments made by a State, political subdivision, agency, instrumentality, institution, or hospital under paragraph (2);

"(C) explaining the basis for any determination of the Administrator or an executive agency to dispose of such property; and

"(D) certifying that the disposal of such property in the manner determined by the Administrator or the executive agency is consistent with the purposes of this section and is in the best interests of the United States.".●

● Mr. PELL. Mr. President, I am pleased to join with Senator SASSER in introducing the Real Property Disposal Policy Act. As one who has been long concerned with the current administration's efforts to auction off large blocks of surplus Federal lands, I believe this bill is well designed to protect the interests of State and local governments—as well as taxpayers—in preserving surplus land that is really best suited for park and outdoor recreation, and not private development.

This problem first surfaced in my own State of Rhode Island, where the Government sought to sell, for private development, several parcels of unneeded Federal land in the midst of the beautiful Narragansett Bay Islands Park. The proposed commercial sale of these scenic resources aroused great concern and opposition within my State. I joined with other members of our congressional delegation in an effort that ultimately persuaded the Property Review Board and the General Services Administration to turn these beautiful properties back to the State of Rhode Island for park use. In the midst of the problem, I introduced—with the support of 14 other Senators—S. 102, legislation that is similar in approach to the legislation Senator SASSER is introducing today. Both bills emphasize the fundamental importance of first notification to the States and local governments when Government property in their jurisdiction is declared surplus, and second, maximizing opportunities for State and local government to obtain unneeded Federal property, at little or no cost, for public benefit purposes. I welcome Senator SASSER's legislation as a companion to my own bill and look forward to working with him in presenting these bills to the Governmental Affairs Committee.

I believe we all want to see a continuation of the park and outdoor recreation programs that enrich the quality of life of our people. Many resources owned by the Federal Government are a part of our national heritage and have a value to the American taxpayers—and their descendants—far in excess of the amount of money the Government would realize from public sales of those properties. I commend Senator SASSER for his leadership in this area, and I hope that all of my colleagues will join in supporting this important legislation.●

By Mr. MOYNIHAN (for himself and Mr. MELCHER):

S. 2637. A bill to amend the Food Stamp Act of 1977 to modify the amount of dependent care and excess shelter expense deductions which are allowable under such act; to the Committee on Agriculture, Nutrition, and Forestry.

FOOD STAMP ACT AMENDMENTS

● Mr. MOYNIHAN. Mr. President, hunger is increasing in the United States. After more than 20 years of progress, we now witness a dramatic increase in the demand for emergency food assistance. More and more people need the help of soup kitchens, food pantries, and emergency food distribution centers. Many of these people receive food stamps but find themselves without food by the third or fourth week of every month. Their limited resources simply cannot be stretched far enough to pay for food, shelter, and the other necessities of life.

I rise today to introduce legislation to ameliorate the terrible choices poor people face, by improving the responsiveness of the food stamp program to the dire economic circumstances of many low-income American families. This bill would reform the food stamp program, so that no poor family will be forced to choose between food and shelter. Specifically, this bill would establish separate deductions for child care and excess shelter expenses, capping the dependent care deductions at $160 a month and the excess shelter expense deduction at $175 a month. We must take due account of the rapid increases in the costs of shelter and child care, when calculating how much food stamp assistance a poor family can receive.

The food stamp program rests on the tenet that food stamps should make up any difference between a family's costs for a minimally adequate diet and 30 percent of the family's income—with some adjustments for unusual expenses. A family is expected to expend 30 percent of its income for food, but if this sum is not enough to provide an adequate diet, then the family may be eligible to receive food stamps to make up the difference.

We determine how much money a family has available for food by first excluding income used for certain expenditures that are unusual, excessively high, or more or less beyond the family's control. Current law includes the following exclusions: a standard deduction of $89 per month; 18 percent of all earned income, to take account of taxes and work expenses; certain expenses for the care of a dependent while the parent is working; and shelter expenses that exceed 50 percent of all income remaining after other deductions. Under current law, however, the total exclusion for dependent care and shelter cannot exceed $125. Only elderly and disabled recipients are not bound by this $125 ceiling.

It is painfully clear, Mr. President, that this ceiling for shelter and child care expenses bears little relation to the burden actually borne by many low-income families. Between 1980 and 1983, for example, household utility costs for all Americans increased 33 percent, while rents increased 24 percent. The food stamp program ignored these increases. The ceiling on income exclusion for food stamp recipients remained frozen at $115 per month through September 1983.

Studies of residential energy use by the U.S. Department of Energy, moreover, show that low-income families suffer more from rapid increases in energy costs than do families who are better off. Home energy expenses consume about twice as large a share of the incomes of families receiving food stamps, than they do for households at the median income. Stated simply, poor families have little flexibility in their energy consumption. They have already reduced their consumption as much as possible; the heat cannot be turned down any further, and they cannot buy a new heating system to take advantage of price changes for different fuels.

These deductions were designed to take account of unusually high shelter expenses, and therefore one might expect that only a small fraction of food stamp recipients would find themselves at or near the ceiling. This is not the case. More than one-fourth of all households receiving food stamps, and more than 30 percent of public assistance households on food stamps, had child care and shelter expenses exceeding the $125 cap. The conclusion is clear, the deduction is too low.

This legislation would implement a one-time special adjustment, raising the ceiling to $175 for fiscal year 1985. This adjustment would increase food stamp benefits by as much as $14 per month for a family with very high shelter costs. The test for this additional shelter deduction is quite strict, granting the deduction only to the extent that shelter costs exceed half of net income, so as to target the benefit increase on those most in need. While the bill increases the benefits for recipients already on the rolls, it will not increase the number of recipients receiving benefits.

This bill also would allow a family to deduct its child care expenses, separately from the excess shelter expense deduction. Congress established a single cap for both deductions in 1977, to limit participating by families with relatively high gross incomes. Today, however, families with incomes significantly above the poverty line cannot receive food stamps because a family with gross income of 130 percent of the poverty level automatically is disqualified. In light of this change, it is appropriate and fair to establish separate shelter and child care deductions, to recognize the special needs of low-income families with high child care and high shelter expenses.

It is more difficult to document the increase in child care costs with precision, but cuts in title XX funds have reduced significantly the availability of low-income American families. The 1981 Omnibus Reconciliation Act eliminated the $200 million set-aside for subsidized day care and dropped the requirement that 50 percent of all title XX funds be used to provide services such as day care, to the poor. As a result of these changes, 10 States have reduced the numbers of low-income working families eligible for title XX child care and 20 States have been forced to tighten eligibility requirements for low-income mothers in training programs to receive title XX child care. In my own State of New York, the numbers of children receiving subsidized day care have dropped from 94,000 children in fiscal year 1981 to 82,400 in fiscal year 1983. A separate child care deduction, capped at $160 a month as I propose, could offset some of the adverse effects of these title XX cuts and provide food stamp recipients the incentive and opportunity to week work or job training.

Surely, Congress does not intend to force poor Americans to choose between food and shelter. This legislation would permit our poor families to pay their rents and child care costs without fear of going hungry. I urge my colleagues to join me in this effort.

I ask unanimous consent that the full text of the legislation be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the material was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

S. 2637

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That section 5(e) of the Food Stamp Act of 1977 (7 U.S.C. 2014 (e)) is amended—

(1) by striking out the fourth sentence and inserting in lieu thereof the following: "Households, other than those households containing an elderly or disabled member, shall also be entitled, with respect to expenses other than expenses paid on behalf of the household by a third party, to (1) a dependent care deduction, the maximum allowable level of which shall be $160, for the actual cost of payments necessary for the care of a dependent, regardless of dependent's age, when such care enables a household member to accept or continue employment, or training or education which is preparatory for employment, and (2) an excess shelter expense deduction to the extent that the monthly amount expended by a household for shelter exceeds an amount equal to 50 per centum of monthly household income after all other applicable deductions have been allowed, except that the amount of such excess shelter expense deduction shall not exceed $175 a month in the forty-eight contiguous States and the District of Columbia, and shall not exceed, in Alaska, Hawaii, Guam, and the Virgin Islands of the United States, $305, $250, $210, and $130, respectively, adjusted on October 1, 1985, and each October 1 thereafter, to the nearest lower dollar increment to reflect changes in the shelter (exclusive of homeownership costs), fuel, and utilities components of housing costs in the Consumer Price Index for all urban consumers published by the Bureau of Labor Statistics as appropriately adjusted by the Bureau of Labor Statistics after consultation with the Secretary, for the twelve months ending the preceding June 30."; and

(2) by striking out "the same as that for the excess shelter expense deduction contained in clause (2) of the fourth sentence of this subsection" in subclause (B) of the last sentence and inserting in lieu thereof "$160".●

ADDITIONAL COSPONSORS

S. 384

At the request of Mr. HEFLIN, the name of the Senator from Hawaii (Mr. MATSUNAGA) was added as a cosponsor of S. 384, a bill to aid State and local governments in strengthening and improving their judicial systems through the creation of a State Justice Institute.

S. 1201

At the request of Mr. MATHIAS, the names of the Senator from Rhode Island (Mr. CHAFEE), and the Senator from South Carolina (Mr. THURMOND) were added as cosponsors of S. 1201, a bill to amend title 17 of the United States Code to protect semiconductor chips and masks against unauthorized duplication, and for other purposes.

S. 1935

At the request of Mr. HEINZ, the name of the Senator from Florida (Mrs. HAWKINS) was added as a cosponsor of S. 1935, a bill to establish an interagency task force on cigarette safety.

S. 2266

At the request of Mr. COCHRAN, his name was withdrawn as a cosponsor of S. 2266, a bill to grant a Federal charter to Vietnam Veterans of America, Inc.

At the request of Mr. ABDNOR, his name was withdrawn as a cosponsor of S. 2266 supra.

S. 2375

At the request of Mr. WEICKER, the name of the Senator from Minnesota (Mr. BOSCHWITZ) was added as cosponsor of S. 2375, a bill to amend the Small Business Act to improve the operation of the secondary market for loans guaranteed by the Small Business Administration.

S. 2378

At the request of Mr. ABDNOR, the name of the Senator from New Jersey (Mr. BRADLEY) was added as a cosponsor of S. 2378, a bill to provide authorizations of appropriations for the impact aid program under Public Law 874 of the 81st Congress, and for other purposes.

S. 2423

At the request of Mr. THURMOND, the names of the Senator from Virginia (Mr. TRIBLE), the Senator from Georgia (Mr. MATTINGLY), and the Senator from Illinois (Mr. DIXON) were added as cosponsors of S. 2423, a bill to provide financial assistance to the States for the purpose of compensating and otherwise assisting victims of crime, and to provide funds to the Department of Justice for the purpose of assisting victims of Federal crime.

S. 2532

At the request of Mr. LAUTENBERG, the names of the Senator from Maryland (Mr. SARBANES), and the Senator from North Dakota (Mr. BURDICK) were added as cosponsors of S. 2532, a bill entitled the "Computer Education Assistance Act of 1984."

S. 2564

At the request of Mr. HEINZ, the name of the Senator from Michigan (Mr. LEVIN) was added as a cosponsor of S. 2564, a bill to grant the consent of Congress to a high speed passenger rail interstate compact between the States of Illinois, Indiana, Michigan, Ohio, and Pennsylvania and to authorize the Department of Transporation to cooperate with such States in implementing the compact.

S. 2623

At the request of Mr. THURMOND, the name of the Senator from Delaware (Mr. BIDEN) was withdrawn as a cosponsor of S. 2623, a bill to implement the Montreal Convention for the Suppression of Unlawful Acts Against the Safety of Civil Aviation, and for other purposes.

S. 2624

At the request of Mr. THURMOND, the name of the Senator from Delaware (Mr. BIDEN) was withdrawn as a cosponsor of S. 2624, a bill to implement the International Convention Against the Taking of Hostages.

S. 2625

At the request of Mr. THURMOND, the name of the Senator from Delaware (Mr. BIDEN) was withdrawn as a cosponsor of S. 2625, a bill to permit the payment of rewards for information concerning terrorist acts.

S. 2626

At the request of Mr. THURMOND, the name of the Senator from Delaware (Mr. BIDEN) was withdrawn as a cosponsor of S. 2626, a bill to prohibit the training, supporting, or inducing of terrorism, and for other purposes.

SENATE JOINT RESOLUTION 246

At the request of Mr. EXON, the name of the Senator from Wisconsin (Mr. PROXMIRE) was added as a cosponsor of Senate Joint Resolution 246, a joint resolution strongly urging the President to secure a full accounting of Americans captured or missing in action in Southeast Asia, and for other purposes.

SENATE JOINT RESOLUTION 258

At the request of Mr. BIDEN, the names of the Senator from North Carolina (Mr. HELMS) and the Senator from Pennsylvania (Mr. HEINZ) were added as cosponsors of Senate Joint Resolution 258, a joint resolution to designate the week of June 24 through June 30, 1984 as "National Safety in the Workplace."

SENATE JOINT RESOLUTION 270

At the request of Mr. COCHRAN, the names of the Senator from Wisconsin (Mr. KASTEN) and the Senator from South Carolina (Mr. THURMOND) were added as cosponsors of Senate Joint Resolution 270, a joint resolution designating the week of July 1 through July 8, 1984 as "National Duck Stamp Week" and 1984 as the "Golden Anniversary Year of the Duck Stamp."

SENATE JOINT RESOLUTION 273

At the request of Mr. HEFLIN, the names of the Senator from Washington (Mr. GORTON), the Senator from Mississippi (Mr. COCHRAN), the Senator from Alaska (Mr. MURKOWSKI), the Senator from North Dakota (Mr. ANDREWS), the Senator from New Hampshire (Mr. HUMPHREY), the Senator from Maryland (Mr. SARBANES), the Senator from Washington (Mr. EVANS), the Senator from North Carolina (Mr. HELMS),and the Senator from Missouri (Mr. DANFORTH) were added as cosponsors of Senate Joint Resolution 273, a joint resolution to designate the week of May 13, 1984, through May 19, 1984, as "Smokey Bear Week."

SENATE JOINT RESOLUTION 279

At the request of Mr. KASTEN, the name of the Senator from Nebraska (Mr. EXON) was added as a cosponsor of Senate Joint Resolution 279, a joint resolution to designate the week of November 11, 1984, through November 17, 1984, as "Women in Agriculture Week."

SENATE JOINT RESOLUTION 283

At the request of Mr. THURMOND, the name of the Senator from Maryland (Mr. SARBANES) was added as a cosponsor of Senate Joint Resolution 283, a joint resolution to authorize and request the President to designate the week of May 7, 1984, as "National Arson Awareness Week."

SENATE RESOLUTION 372

At the request of Mr. SIMPSON, the name of the Senator from Florida (Mrs. HAWKINS) was added as a cosponsor of Senate Resolution 372, a resolution expressing the sense of the Senate regarding exposure of members of the Armed Forces to ionizing radiation and to herbicides containing dioxin.

SENATE CONCURRENT RESOLUTION 110—RELATING TO THE ANNIVERSARY OF THE UNANIMOUS DECISION OF THE SUPREME COURT IN BROWN VERSUS BOARD OF EDUCATION

Mr. DOLE (for himself, Mrs. KASSEBAUM, Mr. MATHIAS, Mr. DECONCINI, Mr. CHAFEE, Mr. LEAHY, Mr. GORTON, Mr. MOYNIHAN, Mr. HATFIELD, Mr. NUNN, Mr. MURKOWSKI, Mr. HART, and Mr. BINGAMAN) submitted the following concurrent resolution; which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary:

S. CON. RES. 110

Whereas May 17, 1984 marks the thirtieth anniversary of the unanimous decision of the Supreme Court in the Brown v. Board of Education decision which invalidated the doctrine of "separate but equal";

Whereas the Brown decision was rooted in the principles of individual freedom and equality of all persons before the law which lie at the heart of American democracy;

Whereas the Brown decision provided the catalyst for an end to legally mandated racial segregation in all segments of American society;

Whereas in the 30 years since Brown, the nation has made great strides toward achieving true equal educational opportunity for all Americans of all races and colors, though much remains to be done;

Whereas the thirtieth anniversary of Brown provides an appropriate time to reaffirm the support of the American people for the principles articulated in the Brown decision, the nation's commitment to the ultimate goal of a color blind society, and the elemental importance of equal educational opportunity to that end: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring) That the Congress—

(1) expressing the sentiments of the people of the United States, extolls the unanimous decision of Brown v. Board of Education;

(2) designates May 17, 1984 as a "National Day of Commemoration for the Brown v. Board of Education Decision"; and

(3) authorizes and requests the President of the United States to issue a proclamation calling upon the people of the United States to observe the designated day with appropriate ceremonies, programs, and activities.

The Secretary of the Senate shall transmit a copy of this concurrent resolution to the President.

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, I rise to submit a Senate concurrent resolution designating May 17 as a national day of commendation for the Brown versus Board of Education decision.

Mr. President, 34 years ago, a little girl named Linda Brown from Topeka, Kans., asked her parents why she had to be bused 2 miles to attend an all-black school, when her white playmates attended another school only a few blocks away. Linda's parents petitioned the Federal courts for an answer. After 4 years of litigation, Linda's question was finally posed to the members of the Nation's Highest Tribunal. And on May 17, 1954, they gave an answer which shook the Nation.

Linda's question forced the Supreme Court and the country to come to grips with the warped hypocrisy of the doctrine of separate but equal. The "separate" had proved to be nothing more than a way to tell black Americans they were second-class citizens. The "equal" had proved to be nothing more than lipservice to the dictates of the 14th amendment. Linda Brown gave the Court an opportunity to expose the cruel hoax of Plessy versus Ferguson. "Separate," the Court wrote, was "inherently unequal." The Nation's schools were to be desegregated with all deliberate speed.

Kansas was able to avoid the trauma and violence which plagued some other jurisdictions in the wake of the Brown decision. Perhaps this was because Kansans remembered their unique heritage as "Bleeding Kansas"—A State forged in the white-hot glue of the Civil War. So it was more with regret than resistance that Kansans came to recognize the irony of a dual educational system, in a State given birth by a war fought in the name of slavery's extinction. It was with complete and immediate acceptance that Kansas responded to the Supreme Court's directive.

In 1955, Kansas ended its system of segregated elementary schools and by 1961, not one black child in Topeka continued to attend an all-black school. As with so many other jurisdictions which share our tragic history, we still have a way to go. But our record of progress is one of which we can be very proud. For instance, over 70 percent of all black students in Kansas now attend fully integrated schools, as compared to 40.8 percent for all border States, and 37.1 percent for the Nation.

To mark the 30th anniversary of Brown versus Board of Education, Washburn University in Topeka will be holding a 2-day program commemorating that landmark decision. It is my hope that by passing this resolution, Congress can encourage others to follow Washburn's lead, either through formal activities or simply private reflection. Perhaps we have all become too distracted by disagreements over how best to remedy lingering vestiges of de jure segregation, and too consumed by debate about the degree to which our current obligations arise from constitutional mandate or moral imperative. May 17 would be an appropriate time for all to come together in reaffirming our dedication and commitment to the basic tenets of the 1954 Brown decision, to take heart in the progress that has been made, and to look forward to the day when there are no longer "black schools," nor "white schools," but just schools.

SENATE CONCURRENT RESOLUTION 111—RELATING TO THE DEPLOYMENT OF SEA-LAUNCHED CRUISE MISSILES

Mr. MATHIAS (for himself and Mr. DURENBERGER) submitted the following concurrent resolution; which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations:

S. CON RES. 111

Whereas the Soviet Union has yet to return to the strategic arms reduction talks (hereafter in this concurrent resolution referred to as "START") or the intermediate nuclear force reduction talks (hereafter in this concurrent resolution referred to as "INF");

Whereas an early resumption of these negotiations is in the interest of all mankind;

Whereas the United States has both demonstrated flexibility in the START and INF negotiations and expressed a willingness to consider any reasonable Soviet proposals;

Whereas the President has repeatedly emphasized his willingness to negotiate limits on or reductions in the stocks of all nuclear weapons with a view toward the complete elimination of all such weapons from the earth;

Whereas sea-launched cruise missiles equipped with nuclear warheads, if further deployed, will greatly complicate the prospects for such nuclear arms control agreements; and

Whereas sea-launched cruise missiles equipped with nuclear warheads could create unforeseen and undesirable military and diplomatic consequences for the United States, its allies, and adversaries: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That the President should, at the earliest possible date—

(1) urge the Soviet Union to return to the START and INF negotiations;

(2) include in the appropriate negotiations a discussion of sea-launched cruise missiles equipped with nuclear warheads with a view toward the complete elimination of such missiles from the arsenals of the United States and the Soviet Union; and

(3) propose to the Government of the Soviet Union, as an interim means of advancing the goal described in paragraph (2), a mutual and verifiable moratorium on any further deployment of sea-launched cruise missiles equipped with nuclear warheads pending the implementation of a final START or INF agreement, as appropriate.

SEC. 2. The Secretary of the Senate shall transmit a copy of this concurrent resolution to the President.

Mr. MATHIAS. Mr. President, the United States is on the verge of making a grave mistake. The United States is about to pull the rug out from under the whole arms control process that has been so painstakingly constructed over the past two decades.

Sometime between now and the end of June, without benefit of congressional hearings, the United States will begin to deploy the nuclear-armed, sea-launched cruise missile [SLCM]. As weapons go, the nuclear SLCM is appealing: It is cheap at just over $3 million per missile; it is easy to transport and conceal; it is identical in most respects to its air- and ground-launched cousins. But, as weapons go, it is also about as foolish as a weapon can be: It will make only a marginal contribution to our national security, and it may kill all hope of verifiable arms control agreements in the future.

This weapon will be ours within 60 days, maybe even earlier. All this body has to do is exactly what it has done about this type of missile in the past—nothing.

I am here today with the distinguished Senator from Minnesota, Mr. DURENBERGER, in a last-ditch effort to try to do something to prevent nuclear folly—SLCM deployment. Today we submit a concurrent resolution designed to put the brakes on the American and Soviet nuclear SLCM programs. Tomorrow and the next day, and every day until we either win or lose this fight, we will take every opportunity to remind our colleagues, the President of the United States, and the American people of the dangerous step we are about to take. We will speak out against SLCM deployments, and we invite interested colleagues to do the same until this system is defeated, or until we reach the dreadful point of no return signaled by the first SLCM deployment.

This is not the first time I have attempted to focus the attention of this body on the dangers posed by the nuclear SLCM, and I am deeply concerned that time—once my ally in this debate—is no longer on my side.

The current U.S. program, the Tomahawk land attack missile (nuclear), known as TLAM-N, is due for initial deployment in June of this year. It is intended to provide a diversification of our naval tactical strike capability and a strategic reserve, whatever that means. The Soviet nuclear SLCM program, while ongoing, is unimpressive by comparison, and is confined for the most part to a 600 kilometer range.

Many people find apparent comfort in the fact that our SLCM technology currently outstrips Soviet capabilities, but historically we know that there is little comfort to be found in such superiority. In the late 1960's, the United States enjoyed a similar clear lead in MIRV technology. Our reluctance to relinquish MIRV's then created the land-based ICBM vulnerability that the United States is now experiencing. By refusing to include MIRV's in the SALT talks, we virtually invited the Soviet Union to match our MIRV capability in the fastest manner possible. They accepted that invitation, and matched our MIRV technology within 6 years.

I am fully aware of and increasingly concerned by anticipated deployments of Soviet long-range nuclear SLCM's on submarines cruising off our east and west coasts. Such activity only increases the sense of urgency I feel. Pentagon planners evidently shared my concern when, earlier this year, they moved the Presidential airborne command post from Andrews Air Force base to an inland area that is safer from Soviet submarine-launched nuclear missiles. Not only is there very little time before large-scale nuclear SLCM deployments occur on both sides, but those deployments will further reduce the time either country would have to react to a missile attack.

The manifold dangers posed by nuclear SLCM deployments are not military alone. Their deployment would entail significant arms control and diplomatic costs as well.

There is virtual unanimity among the arms control community and the defense establishment that American and Soviet sea-launched cruise missile activity will be, and in fact already is, difficult to verify. Once deployed on submarines and surface vessels, the small, easily transported and concealed cruise missile will make future arms control agreements almost impossible. There is also the problem of distinguishing between a cruise missile carrying a conventional or a nuclear warhead. I do not have to remind my colleagues that such ambiguity will make home porting and visits to friendly ports a potential diplomatic nightmare.

At present, we can estimate the numbers and capabilities of Soviet nuclear SLCM's with a reasonable degree of certainty. But a new generation of these weapons will make this task almost impossible. It is not unreasonable to imagine a time in the not-too-distant future when the United States would have to assume that every Soviet fishing trawler is a potential cruise missile launch platform.

As long ago as September 1981, Supreme Allied Commander Bernard W. Rogers warned:

> We have always, in the past, maintained that if you put cruise missiles with nuclear warheads on submarines you are, in fact, fuzzing up the distinction between tactical and strategic nuclear weapons.

Since this country began negotiating about nuclear weapons with the Soviet Union, it has avoided fuzzing up the distinction between tactical and strategic forces. In this respect, the nuclear SLCM is a giant step backward. The time to tackle such problems is now, before major deployments have occurred, and not after the fact.

I am painfully aware of the difficulties associated with verifying a moratorium or an eventual ban on nuclear SLCM deployments. Neither I nor Senator DURENBERGER would support an accord that we did not find to be adequately verifiable. But I do not see how we or the U.S.S.R. will be in a position to judge what might constitute adequate verification until we are talking to one another. An a priori assumption on either side that an agreement limiting nuclear SLCM deployment is unverifiable suggests gross disregard and disdain for the diplomatic process. I for one am not prepared to make such an assumption.

The alternative to negotiation, in this case, is not acceptable. Once both sides are engaged in massive deployment of nuclear SLCM's President Reagan's search for an arms control agreement incorporating verifiable deep cuts in nuclear arsenals will become a practical impossibility. A Congressional Budget Office study from March 1984 notes that:

> Unless an agreement embraces emerging weapons like the sea-launched cruise missile, it may be obsolete before it is signed.

So I say, Mr. President, let us not repeat the negotiating errors of the past. Let both the United States and the Soviet Union make an effort to address the nuclear SLCM question before it becomes an insurmountable obstacle to negotiated progress, to future arms control agreements. Let us talk while there is still time to talk.

As the astute British statesman, David Ormsby Gore, once said:

> It would indeed be a tragedy if the history of the human race proved to be nothing more than the story of an ape playing with a box of matches on a petrol dump.

We may not be able to eliminate the petrol dump. We may not be able to confiscate the matches all at once. But we could start taking them away from the ape one by one—and we must.

Mr. DURENBERGER. Mr. President, Senator MATHIAS and I are today submitting a Senate concurrent resolution which we hope will give us one last chance to avoid a needless, senseless, and potentially dangerous arms race. We are confident that, as the facts emerge about the nuclear version of the sea-launched cruise missile (SLCM), it will become clear that this is a weapon which has comparatively little military worth but which, if deployed, will create some profound problems. Our resolution is a straightforward proposal that, if the Soviets come to their senses and return to the INF and START talks, the President should propose incorporation of the nuclear SLCM in the appropriate forum and should also propose an interim moratorium on any further deployment of this particular weapon.

Mr. President, the history of arms control is a history of lost opportunities. It is a tragic irony that we seldom recognize the full implications of a given technology in its earliest stages. Only as engineering development gives full shape to a concept does there emerge a more thorough understanding of the pros and cons of deployment. But by that time, the development program often seems to have developed a life of its own.

Unfortunately, this seems to have been the case with the nuclear-armed SLCM, just as it was earlier the case with the MIRV warhead system. In retrospect, there are few who would argue that the deployment of MIRV's has enhanced our security. In fact, the entire thrust of the build-down concept, which originated here in Congress and which I fully support, is to "de-MIRV" both our own missiles and those of the Soviets. What Senator MATHIAS and I hope will happen is that we will avoid the necessity, at some later date, to make a Hobson's choice between living with the nuclear-armed SLCM or abandoning any version of the sea-launched cruise missile. In other words, we strongly feel that the time for action is now, not later. We cannot plan to de-nuclearize the SLCM after the fact. We must control this weapon now, or not at all.

If the history of arms control is a history of lost opportunities, it is also a history of what might be called one-way thinking. By this, I mean that we frequently tend to recognize that a given weapons system might prove useful if we deploy it ourselves, but we seldom think through the consequences of a Soviet deployment. Conversely, we ourselves occasionally recognize that a given weapon system might be interesting or useful to the Soviets, given their unique geostrategic setting, but we fail to understand that a comparable weapon in our own hands can be a foolish mismatch of technology to our own military requirements. The first illustration is an example of naive ethnocentrism—the failure to understand that what our engineers can do, Soviet engineers can also do, even if later and not as well. The second illustration is an example of mirror-imaging—the belief that if the Soviets have something, we too should have it.

The result, at the minimum, is an offsetting series of actions and reactions which leave us in the same comparative military situation as when we started, but billions of dollars poorer. At the worst, the result is a measurable degeneration in our overall security. Again, the case of the MIRV proves instructive.

Mr. President, we have heard much, and we will hear much more, about the threat posed by the Soviet nuclear-armed SLCM. Over the past few weeks, we have seen several news stories suggesting that, thanks to the diversion of U.S. technology, the impending version of the latest Russian SLCM will be as capable as—or more capable than—the Tomahawk Land-Attack Missile, Nuclear (TLAM-N) which is slated for initial operational capability this June. These are valid points. But they do not detract from the need to control these weapons as soon as possible. Instead, they bolster it.

As the Navy has correctly pointed out for many years, the Soviets have been deploying sea-launched cruise missiles since the early 1950's. Many of these weapons are designed as anti ship missiles. Others are designed to carry a nuclear payload to shore-based targets. In the case of the cruise missile, it is simply incorrect to say—as so many people do—that the United States will start an arms race. Quite the contrary, the United States is belatedly catching up with the Soviets. The question is whether it is appropriate for us to catch up in every possible application of this technology.

When cruise missiles are used as anti shipping weapons, armed with conventional warheads, they constitute an enormous force multiplier. For a maritime nation such as the United States, they are a vital element of the strong Navy which we need. So it was foolish of the United States to overlook this potential for so long at a time when the Russians were arming every possible vessel with anti shipping missiles. We should do nothing which would derail the Tomahawk Anti-Ship Missile program, for it permits us to match—and exceed—Soviet capabilities in a crucial area and to add to the punch of our Navy. In fact, whether or not the Soviets had developed such a weapon on their own, it would have been a smart investment for us to develop this capability, for we are far more dependent than most nations on freedom of the seas and our Navy must be capable of meeting any possible threat to our ocean-going commerce.

But if it is sensible to develop the anti-ship missile for the U.S. Navy, it is questionable indeed to press ahead with the TLAM-N. And it is simply vital that we make one last concerted effort to prevent the planned deployment of the Soviet SSN-X-21.

The current fleet of Soviet nuclear-armed SLCM's, many of which are now on station off our east coast, represents an undeniable hazard to the security of the United States. Any nuclear warhead aimed at our territory carries with it the potential to inflict damage beyond imagination. So I do not want to minimize the threat posed by the current generation of Soviet nuclear-armed SLCM's.

But I would point out to my colleagues, Mr. President, that these weapons present a hazard with known boundaries. The Soviets, as we know, tend to keep everything they have ever built, whereas we tend to retire older generations of weaponry in order to improve our command and control, to reduce unintended or collateral effects, and to ease the burden on the taxpayer. The current generation of deployed Soviet nuclear-armed SLCM's derives from the days before the Soviets had developed a ballistic missile capability. These weapons are of comparatively short range and are thought to be very inaccurate.

For the Soviets, investment in such weapons made a considerable degree of sense, given the geographic asymmetries between our two countries. For a comparatively modest investment, the Soviets could threaten a huge proportion of the population of the United States, since so many of our citizens live within a few hundred miles of each coast. For the Soviets, in other words, the first generation of nuclear-armed cruise missiles represented a means of obtaining what their technology could not give them: Weaponry with which to threaten the United States with countervalue strikes.

Had we chosen to respond in kind, it would have been a waste of money. First, beginning in the 1950's, we were able to develop several generations of increasingly capable ballistic missiles.

Second, given the range constraints on cruise missiles, there were relatively few targets in the Soviet Union which could be reached by cruise missiles. So we would have gained virtually nothing, and expended a lot of money. Under the circumstances, the decision to cancel the Bomarc and other such nuclear-capable cruise missiles was eminently sensible.

The fundamental case against our own deployment therefore remains as strong today as it was 25 years ago. Even though the range and accuracy of our planned TLAM-N is much better, the fact is that these weapons are simply redundant given our current robust nuclear arsenal. In fact, the best case the Navy seems able to offer for the TLAM-N is that it will be a strategic reserve. This phrase is a de facto admission that the TLAM-N is redundant to our strategic deterrent requirements.

The Soviets, on the other hand, might gain a new capability if they should deploy the SSN-X-21, or any other system comparable to our planned TLAM-N. Based on public accounts of the expected capability of the next generation of Soviet nuclear-armed SLCMs, it is not unreasonable to believe that such weapons could pose the threat decapitating strikes aimed at our national command centers or a first strike aimed at our bomber bases deep in the interior of the United States. If so, it clearly serves our interest to limit this threat. If the price of doing so is to forego the TLAM-N, then it is well worth the bargain.

Some people might ask, therefore, why we should not wait until after the TLAM-N has achieved its initial operational capability before raising the idea of a moratorium. The answer is both simple and complex.

The simple way to answer this is to point out that, in past arms negotiations, it has customarily been the rule that once a weapon has demonstrated a given capability, all further such weapons are assumed to have the same capability. This has been the only feasible way to handle the problem of verification.

What this means is that were we to go ahead with deployment of a TLAM-N, we would most likely face the prospect that any attempt to limit further deployments of nuclear-armed sea-launched cruise missiles like the TLAM-N or the SSN-X-21 would mean that we would also be forced to limit the conventional variants of these launchers, for there is no clear way to distinguish between a conventionally-armed antiship cruise missile and a nuclear-armed land-attack missile. We would thus face the impossible choice I mentioned at the outset—to live with the threat of nuclear-armed SLCM's in order to gain the high military advantage of an antiship cruise missile, or to lose the antiship missile in order to control the nuclear SLCM. Either way, our security would suffer.

The issue, in other words, hinges on the verifiability of the cruise missile. The current generation of Soviet sea-launched cruise missiles can adequately be monitored, for they are primitive weapons launched by primitive means. But the impending generation will pose nearly impossible problems for those who wish to monitor that limits are being met. The only way to handle the issue, in other words, is to stop it before it starts. Hence the need for an interim moratorium pending final resolution of this issue in the appropriate arms control forum.

The complex answer to the question of why a moratorium now is really a derivative from the simple answer. Simply put, deployment of the TLAM-N will constitute a foolish decision in terms of our own unilateral military requirements.

First, deployment of the TLAM-N, even temporarily, runs the risk that we will severely complicate the deployment of the Pershing II and Ground-Launched Cruise Missiles. As General Bernard Rogers argued nearly 3 years ago, "we have always, in the past, maintained that if you put cruise missiles with nuclear warheads on submarines you are, in fact, fuzzing up the distinction between tactical and strategic nuclear weapons." In other words, the verification issues posed by this weapon are unique, and they could overwhelm our hopes for a "zero option" or some similar outcome at the INF talks.

Second, and in a related vein, it is conceivable that deployment of this weapon will pose some tough questions for our European allies. To some people, the TLAM-N might suggest overkill, given the ongoing deployments in Europe. To others, they might suggest a convenient escape valve from the necessity to base the Pershing II and GLCM in Europe as a visible symbol of NATO resolve. In other words, the TLAM-N is uniquely capable of suggesting both overkill and decoupling simultaneously.

Third, if the Navy continues with its plans to put the TLAM-N aboard a variety of vessels in order to diversify our tactical nuclear capability, we may well face the prospect of controversy every time a U.S. vessel visits a foreign port, regardless of whether it carries a TLAM-N or not.

Finally, we will in essence disarm our fleet of attack submarines. Every TLAM-N—a weapon justified as a strategic reserve—which we put aboard an attack sub means one less torpedo or SUBROC or other such weapon which can be carried in the ship's magazine. As I saw for myself when I was at the launching and later at the commissioning of the U.S.S. Minneapolis-St. Paul, SSN-708, our submarine fleet is already stretched thin and each boat has only a finite magazine capacity. To add to those problems for the sake of a strategic reserve strikes me as simply foolish. And Senators should not look to the planned vertical TLAM launchers for a way out of this problem. Those launchers will not be added to the fleet for several years.

So, Mr. President, we are faced with a fundamental question here. Does it make sense to proceed with the TLAM-N, and to let the Soviet proceed with the SSN-X-21, unencumbered by any sense of reality? Does it make sense to diminish the capability of our submarine fleet, to undermine our anti-ship missile program, to pose potential diplomatic issues of the first order, and to make future agreements difficult if not impossible to reach? Or, does it make sense to try to use the arms control process to do what it is supposed to do: enhance our security?

The issue is not matching a Russian capability. We have already done that. The issue is not adding to our naval strength, for we will not. The issue is not enhancing our deterrent, for the best that can be said of this weapon is that it is a reserve. The issue is simply one of using the arms control process and the impending deployment of TLAM-N to obtain an outcome which is better than any other alternative.

SENATE RESOLUTION 386—RELATING TO THE MANDELA FREEDOM RESOLUTION

Mr. LEVIN submitted the following resolution; which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations:

S. RES. 386

Whereas the Republic of South Africa has excluded blacks and other nonwhites from participation in the government of their country by means of a system of racially discriminatory laws and practices known as the apartheid system;

Whereas the South African practice of apartheid is based on violence, exploitation, and deprivation of basic human and civil rights, is incompatible with the dignity of mankind, and contravenes the most fundamental human and political rights as set forth in the Charter of the United Nations and the Universal Declaration of Human Rights;

Whereas the Government of the United States, the United Nations, and virtually every country in the world condemns the practice of apartheid by the Government of South Africa.

Whereas in 1944, Nelson Mandela joined, and later led, the banned African National Congress, which is committed to eradicating the South African Government's official policy of racial apartheid and in its place erecting a society in which the rights of all South African citizens shall be the same, regardless of race, color, or sex;

Whereas in 1962, when he was already in jail under a five-year sentence for inciting strikes and leaving the country without a permit, Nelson Mandela was again brought to trial and sentenced to life imprisonment for seeking to overthrow the government with violence and has been incarcerated ever since that time;

Whereas now, after twenty years in prison, Nelson Mandela nevertheless remains the leading symbol of resistance to political oppression, race and color prejudice in South Africa and the most widely recognized leader of that country's black majority population;

Whereas Winnie Mandela, the wife of Nelson Mandela and one of the most prominent and highly respected leaders of the anti-apartheid movement of South Africa, was arrested twenty years ago and, despite the fact that she has never been convicted of any offense except violations of her banning orders, has been systematically banned, detained, harassed, and abused by South Africa's security police and has spent less than eleven months of the past twenty years in freedom;

Whereas Winnie Mandela, as a banned citizen of South Africa, is confined to a home designated by the State and far removed from her friends and family, is not permitted to meet with more than one person at a time, may not be quoted or write any material for publication, and is prohibited from having her name or photograph appear in print anywhere in South Africa; and

Whereas the anti-apartheid movement in South Africa exemplifies the loftiest ideals and aspirations of the American people and all freedom-loving peoples the world over: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved, That it is the sense of the Senate that—

(1) the Government of the Republic of South Africa should immediately release and free Nelson Mandela from prison and should revoke and cancel Winnie Mandela's banning order;

(2) the President of the United States should use his good offices to secure the release and freedom of Nelson and Winnie Mandela; and

(3) the President of the Senate is requested to transmit a copy of this resolution to the President of the United States and to the Prime Minister of the Republic of South Africa.

● Mr. LEVIN. Mr. President, I am today introducing Senate Resolution 386, the Mandela Freedom Resolution, calling for the immediate release, by the South African Government, of Nelson and Winnie Mandela, leaders in the struggle against apartheid.

Nelson and Winnie Mandela are a couple of extraordinary principle and courage. Nelson Mandela led demonstrations against apartheid over 20 year ago, as leader of the African National Congress (ANC) which he joined in 1944 and subsequently became the founder of the ANC Youth League.

Nelson Mandela was admitted to Fort Hare University in South Africa in 1938, but expelled in 1940 for being one of the ringleaders in a student strike. He later went on to study law at the University of Witwatersrand, and in December 1952 established with his friend Oliver Tambo, the first firm of African attorneys in Fox Street, Johannesburg. In 1952 he was appointed National Volunteer-in-Chief to head the Defiance Campaign, which resulted in 8,500 people voluntarily challenging race laws to go to jail as a protest against discrimination. Elected president of the Transvaal ANC, he was served with orders on September 4, 1953, banning him from public meetings for 2 years—restrictions reimposed for 5 years in March 1956. These curbs did not prevent him from organizing a massive 3-day stay-at-home campaign in 1961 in protest against the all-white referendum held on the question of turning South Africa into a Republic.

On the run from May 31 until his arrest on August 8, 1962, Nelson Mandela managed to address a conference of nationalist leaders outside of South Africa and to meet with journalists. After his capture in August 1962, he was sentenced to 5 years imprisonment—3 for incitement to strike and 2 years for illegal exit from the country.

At the Rivonia sabotage trial which opened on October 20, 1963, while serving his 5-year sentence, Mandela and seven others faced charges of plotting violent revolution. On April 20, 1964, he gave a memorable 4½-hour speech in his defense. Saying, in part that he did not "have any love of violence" and that he acted because of the "political situation that had arisen after many years of tyranny, exploitation, and oppression of my people by the whites."

Nelson Mandela refused to appeal against the sentence of life imprisonment. As a prisoner on Robben Island he has spent nearly one-third of his life there. He has rarely seen his wife Winnie or his children. In 1982, he was moved to Pollsmoor maximum security prison on the mainland near Cape Town.

Since 1962, Winnie Mandela has been either banned or imprisoned for violations of her banning orders. She was first banned the same year that her husband was arrested. She was never convicted on any charges except violations of her banning orders. She was prosecuted eight times with two convictions for such violations. Under the banning orders, Mrs. Mandela is prohibited from being in the company of more than one person at a time. She cannot be quoted in South Africa, she cannot visit educational institutions, and she is confined to her home during evenings—6 p.m. until 6 a.m.—and Sundays—3 p.m. Saturdays to 6 a.m. Monday. She must obtain permission to visit her husband. For such visits she must use air transportation since she is prohibited from using cheaper buses, trains, or cars. During each visit she is allowed only 30 minutes.

In addition to these restrictions, Winnie Mandela is under constant police surveillance and is frequently harassed by the security police. The latest incident occurred in January 1983, when police charged her with breaking her banning order while two Members of Parliament were visiting with her in her home. Police also confiscated several items from her home, including a bedspread. The following March, Members of the U.S. Congress sent a quilt to her to replace the bedspread and to express support for her fight against apartheid. Mrs. Mandela has also been occasionally threatened and attacked by unidentified individuals.

Mrs. Mandela believes that her banning orders and her banishment to Brandfort were calculated to break her spirit. Instead, she has used her training as a social worker to set up a soup kitchen and an unofficial clinic. She has also defied the segregation laws at the supermarket and other Brandfort shops. In November 1982, despite a severe illness, she refused to be treated at the nearby hospital for blacks. Because she was refused admittance to the all-white hospital, her lawyers obtained permission for her to receive treatment at a private multiracial clinic in Johannesburg.

Mr. President, this resolution is the opportunity for the Senate to make a significant foreign policy statement—we must do so. Let us stand united and resolute for the principles we hold so dear to in the United States. I urge my colleagues to join in support of the Mandela freedom resolution. A similar resolution sponsored by my good friend in the House, Congressman GEORGE CROCKETT with over 100 cosponsors was recently unanimously reported out of the Africa Subcommittee.●

AMENDMENTS SUBMITTED

FEDERAL BOAT SAFETY ACT AMENDMENTS

MATTINGLY (AND OTHERS) AMENDMENT NO. 3045

Mr. MATTINGLY (for himself, Mr. DIXON, Mr. EVANS, Mr. EXON, AND MR. D'AMATO) proposed an amendment to amendment No. 3027 proposed by Mr. BAKER (and others) to the bill (H.R. 2163) to amend the Federal Boat Safety Act of 1971, and for other purposes; as follows:

At the end of the amendment, add the following new section:

LINE-ITEM VETO

SEC. . (a) The President may disapprove any item of appropriation in any Act or joint resolution, except any item of appropriation for the legislative branch or the judicial branch of the Government.

(b) (1) If an Act or joint resolution is approved by the President, any item of appropriation contained therein which is not disapproved shall become law.

(2) The President shall return, with a statement of objections, any item of appropriation disapproved to the House in which the Act or joint resolution containing such item originated.

(c) The Congress may reconsider any item of appropriation disapproved under this section in the same manner as is prescribed under section 7 of article 1 of the Constitution of the United States for reconsideration by the Congress of Acts disapproved by the President, except that only a majority vote of each House shall be required to approve an item which has been disapproved or to restore an item which has been reduced by the President to the original amount contained in the Act or joint resolution.

(d) The Provisions of this section shall apply to items of appropriation for the fiscal year beginning on October 1, 1984 and to items of appropriation for the fiscal year beginning on October 1, 1985.

NICKLES AMENDMENT NO. 3046

(Ordered to lie on the table.)

Mr. NICKLES submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to amendment No. 3027 proposed by Mr. BAKER (and others) to the bill H.R. 2163, supra; as follows:

At the end of the matter proposed to be inserted, add the following new title:

TITLE —COST-OF-LIVING ADJUSTMENT LIMITATIONS INCOME TAX INDEXING

SEC. . (a) Paragraph (3) of section 1 (f) of the Internal Revenue Code of 1954 (relating to cost-of-living adjustment) is amended to read as follows:

"(3) Cost-of-living adjustment.—

"(A) Calendar years 1985 through 1987.—For purposes of paragraph (2), the cost-of-living adjustment for any calendar year beginning after December 31, 1984, and before January 1, 1988, is the excess of—

"(i) the percentage (if any) by which—

"(I) the CPI for the preceding calendar year, exceeds

"(II) the CPI for the calendar year 1983, over

"(ii) 3 percentage points.

"(B) Calendar years after 1987.—For purposes of paragraph (2), the cost-of-living adjustment for any calendar year beginning after December 31, 1987, is the percentage (if any) by which—

"(i) the CPI for the preceding calendar year, exceeds

"(ii) the CPI for the calendar year 1983.".

(b) EFFECTIVE DATE.—The amendments made by this section shall become effective on the date of the enactment of this Act.

COST-OF-LIVING ADJUSTMENTS IN BENEFIT PROGRAMS

SEC. . (a)(1) Any increase in benefits which would occur by law under any of the provisions of law described in subsection (b) during the period beginning on October 1, 1984, and ending on September 30, 1987, on the basis of any percentage increase in the Consumer Price Index or the SSA average wage index, shall be limited as though the relevant percentage increase in the Consumer Price Index or the SSA average wage index was equal to the actual percentage increase in such index minus three percentage points.

(2) The provisions of paragraph (1) shall apply only to the increases in benefit amounts, and shall not be applied in determining whether a threshold CPI increase has been met or in determining increases in amounts under other provisions of law which operate by reference to increases in such benefit amounts.

(3) Any increase in benefit amounts which would have occurred but for the provisions of paragraph (1), and any increase in the CPI or SSA average wage index which is not taken into account by reason of paragraph (1), shall not be taken into account for purposes of determining benefit increases occurring after September 30, 1987.

(b) For purposes of this section the applicable provisions of law are the cost-of-living adjustments for—

(1) old-age, survivors, and disability insurance benefits under section 215(i) of the Social Security Act (but the limitation under subsection (a) shall not apply to supplemental security income benefits under title XVI of such Act);

(2) armed services retirement and retainer pay under section 1401a of title 10, United States Code, retired pay and retainer pay to members and former members of the Coast Guard, and retired pay of commissioned officers of the National Oceanic and Atmospheric Administration or the Public Health Service;

(3) civil service retirement benefits under section 8340 of title 5, United States Code, foreign service retirement benefits under section 826 of the Foreign Service Act of 1980, Central Intelligence Agency retirement benefits under part J of the Central Intelligence Agency Retirement Act of 1964 for certain employees, Comptroller General annuities under section 777 of title 31, United States Code, cash relief payments under section 1245(c) of the Panama Canal Act of 1979, and retirement benefits for Federal Reserve Board employees;

(4) Federal workers' compensation under section 8146a of title 5, United States Code;

(5) railroad retirement benefits under the provisions of the Railroad Retirement Act of 1974, including cost-of-living adjustments under such Act which operate by reference to title II of the Social Security Act; and

(6) any other benefits payable under a Federal law, the amount of which and the eligibility for which are not determined on the basis of need or income level, which are automatically increased by law on the basis of an increase in the Consumer Price Index.

(c) In the case of any cost-of-living adjustment which is subject to the provisions of section 301 of the Omnibus Budget Reconciliation Act of 1982, the percentage by which the annuity or retired or retainer pay is increased with respect to any increase occurring by law during the period beginning on October 1, 1984, and ending on September 30, 1987, shall be the percentage increase as determined after the application of such section 301, minus three percentage points.

(d) Prior to October 1, 1985, the Committee on Finance of the Senate and the Committee on Ways and Means of the House of Representatives shall report legislation to direct that savings achieved in the old-age, survivors, and disability insurance program under section 215(i) of the Social Security Act as a result of this section shall be transferred to the Federal Hospital Insurance Trust Fund.

(e) The amendments made by this section shall become effective on the date of the enactment of this Act.

● Mr. NICKLES. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that a factsheet on the amendment be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the factsheet was ordered printed in the RECORD, as follows:

FACT SHEET—CPI MINUS 3 PERCENT

SUMMARY OF AMENDMENT

(1) Indexing: Reduce the current law indexing of income tax brackets and exemptions by 3 percent through 1987. In 1988, indexing would be resumed as under current law.

(2) Cost of Living Adjustments: Reduce CPI-indexed non-means-tested entitlements by 3 percent through 1987. In 1988, COLAs would resume.

DENTON AMENDMENT NO. 3047

Mr. DENTON submitted an amendment intended to be proposed to amendment No. 3027 proposed by Mr. BAKER (and others) to the bill H.R. 2163, supra, as follows:

At the end of the amendment, add the following new section:

SEC. . (a) Within thirty days after the first day of each fiscal year beginning after September 30, 1985, the Director of the Congressional Budget Office shall determine (1) the amount of the deficit of the Government for the preceding fiscal year, if any, (2) the outlays of the Government for such preceding fiscal year, and (3) the percentage computed by dividing the amount of such deficit by the amount of such outlays.

(b)(1) Notwithstanding any other provision of law enacted before, on, or after the date of enactment of this Act (other than paragraph (2)), effective beginning on the first day of the first applicable pay period beginning on or after the date on which the Director of the Congressional Budget Office makes the determinations required by subsection (a) in any fiscal year—

(A) each rate of pay payable during such fiscal year for a position referred to in section 601(a) of the Legislative Reorganization Act of 1946 (2 U.S.C. 31) shall be reduced by an amount equal to the product of the rate of pay paid for such position during the preceding fiscal year and the percentage computed by such Director pursuant to subsection (a)(3) for such preceding fiscal year;

(B) the rate of pay payable during such fiscal year for the position of any officer or employee of the Government for which the rate of pay during the preceding fiscal year was not less than the rate of pay payable for a position in Executive Level V under section 5316 of title 5, United States Code, during such preceding fiscal year (other than an individual serving in a pay grade in the uniformed services, as defined in section 101(3) of title 37, United States Code) shall be reduced by the amount equal to the product of the rate of pay paid for such position during the preceding fiscal year and the percentage computed by the Director of the Congressional Budget Office pursuant to subsection (a)(3) for such preceding fiscal year;

(C) the maximum rate of pay payable during such fiscal year to any officer or employee of the Government (other than an individual serving in a pay grade in the uniformed services, as defined in section 101(3) of title 37, United States Code, and an officer or employee to whom clause (A) or (B) applies) may not exceed the rate of pay payable during such fiscal year for a position in Executive Level V under section 5316 of title 5, United States Code;

(D) the total amount of the sums available for such fiscal year for pay disbursed by the Secretary of the Senate shall be reduced by the amount equal to the product of such sums and the percentage computed by the Congressional Budget Office pursuant to subsection (a)(3) for the preceding fiscal year; and

(E) the total amount of the sums available for such fiscal year for pay disbursed by the Clerk of the House of Representatives shall be reduced by the amount equal to the product of such sums and the percentage computed by the Congressional Budget Office pursuant to subsection (a)(3) for the preceding fiscal year.

(2) Paragraph (1) shall not apply in the case of any officer or employee of the Government whose rate of pay may not be reduced under the Constitution.

(c)(1) In addition to any other tax imposed by chapter 1 of the Internal Revenue Code of 1954, there is hereby imposed on each Member of Congress for any taxable year, a tax equal to the product of—

(A) the gross income of such Member of Congress for such taxable year to the extent such gross income exceeds $150,000, multiplied by

(B) the deficit percentage.

(2) For purposes of paragraph (1), the term "deficit percentage" means for any taxable year the percentage determined by the Director of the Congressional Budget Office pursuant to subsection (a) based on the fiscal year in which such taxable year begins.

(3) For purposes of the Internal Revenue Code of 1954, the tax imposed by this subsection shall be treated as a chapter 1 tax.

NOTICES OF HEARINGS

COMMITTEE ON SMALL BUSINESS

Mr. WEICKER. Mr. President, I would like to announce that the Senate Small Business Committee's Subcommittee on Export Promotion and Market Development has scheduled a hearing on May 10, 1984, on the Eximbank's administration of the small business set-aside provisions of Public Law 98-181. The hearing will begin at 9:30 a.m. in room 428A of the Russell Senate Office Building. Senator BOSCHWITZ will chair. For further information, please contact Stewart Hudson of the committee staff at 224-0840.

AUTHORITY FOR COMMITTEES TO MEET

COMMITTEE ON FOREIGN RELATIONS

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the Committee on Foreign Relations be authorized to meet during the session of the Senate on Thursday, May 3, at 2 p.m., to consider the nomination of Robert Hennemeyer to be Ambassador to Gambia, and S. L. Abbott to be Ambassador to Lesotho.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the Committee on Foreign Relations be authorized to meet during the session of the Senate on Thursday, May 3, at 2 p.m., to consider the nomination of Michael Armacost to be Under Secretary of State for Political Affairs.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

COMMITTEE ON ARMED SERVICES

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the Committee on Armed Services be authorized to meet during the session of the Senate on Thursday, May 3, 1984, in order to receive testimony concerning recommending fiscal year 1985, defense funding reduction.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

SELECT COMMITTEE ON INTELLIGENCE

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the Select Committee on Intelligence be authorized to meet during the session of the Senate on Thursday, May 3, to hold a closed business meeting on intelligence procedures.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

COMMITTEE ON FINANCE

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the Committee on Finance be authorized to meet during the session of the Senate on Thursday, May 3, to hold an executive session to consider the following nominations and legislation:

Nomination of Joel Gerber, judge, U.S. Tax Court;

Nomination of Joseph Dennin to be Assistant Secretary of Commerce;

Increase limit on public debt;

Three authorization bills: Office of U.S. Treasury; U.S. Customs Service; and International Trade Commission.

Modifications of the Disability Insurance Review Procedures;

Extension of the Generalized System of Preference contained in S. 1718;

Retroactive relief from the Dickman case.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

ADDITIONAL STATEMENTS

NATIONAL HISTORIC PRESERVATION WEEK

● Mr. ABDNOR. Mr. President, during the week of May 13 to 19 the National Trust for Historic Preservation will be celebrating National Preservation Week.

During this time it is expected that over 5,000 preservation and neighborhood groups and organizations will participate in local programs to increase public awareness of the importance and economic potential of historic preservation programs.

The theme of this year's program is "Preservation Is Taking Care of America" and, indeed, it is. As a strong supporter of historic preservation programs, I am pleased by the wide interest and active involvement of millions of Americans in a variety of historic preservation programs.

In my State of South Dakota, we have one of the most active historic preservation programs in the Nation. South Dakotans are actively involved in numerous restoration, rehabilitation, and miantenance efforts. I am proud of the commitment of South Dakotans and other Americans to preservation programs.

I should also like to commend the work of the National Trust for Historic Preservation. It has made an incalculable contribution in assisting States, communities, and localities with financial support, technical assistance and resource development.

In addition the Historic Trust is bringing new life to many urban and rural communities through its national main street center program. I am proud that the community of Hot Springs, S. Dak. served as a pilot city for this national program. Since 1977, numerous other cities and towns have been selected for participation in this effort.

The National Trust helps organize local support for efforts to renew downtown corridors in small towns, cities, and metro areas. These efforts have brought together local leaders, bankers, chambers of commerce, merchants, and individuals in a combined effort to revitalize their main streets. Each community tailors its program to meet its own needs. It is based on refocusing a community on its own image and redeveloping its center. This has proven to be a phenomenal success and brought new life and vitality to many downtown areas.

As always, I am certain that this year's historic preservation week will be a huge success. However, more importantly, efforts to restore and protect our Nation's heritage will continue through all the other weeks of the year as well. Given the dedication of the National Trust for Historic Preservation and the countless individuals, groups, organizations, and agencies that promote these programs, we look forward to even greater participation in the coming years.●

DESIGNATION OF MAY 1984 AS NATIONAL FEDERATION OF THE BLIND MONTH IN SOUTH DAKOTA

● Mr. PRESSLER. Mr. President, recently the Governor of South Dakota declared May 1984 as National Federation of the Blind Month in South Dakota. The National Federation of the Blind is the largest organization of blind persons in our country. We in South Dakota are extremely proud of the work of our NFB affiliate to insure equality, security, and opportunity for the blind citizens of our State. It's outreach efforts extend to all parts of South Dakota. I commend them as they continue to provide essential services to the blind across South Dakota and the United States.

Mr. President, I ask that the executive proclamation designating May 1984 as National Federation of the Blind Month in South Dakota be printed in the RECORD

The executive proclamation follows:

PROCLAMATION

Whereas, the National Federation of the Blind of South Dakota is a vital advocacy group that represents the interests of thousands of blind citizens statewide; and

Whereas, this invaluable organization is an effective voice of the blind for it seeks to enhance the dignity and increase the independence of our state's visually handicapped; and

Whereas, as the largest organization of the blind in America, the NFB strives to educate the public about the capabilities of the visually impaired; they are a group of individuals who see themselves not as blind people, but as people who just happen to be blind; and

Whereas, the National Federation of the Blind of South Dakota is a group whose blind members don't ask for sympathy, but for empathy * * * they wish not to be pampered, for they only desire to be given a chance to prove how much they CAN do and how little they can't do; and

Whereas, the NFB not only seeks to educate the sighted, but works as well to inform the visually handicapped of their rights and of the many services available to them:

Now, therefore, I, William J. Janklow, Governor of the State of South Dakota, do hereby proclaim the month of May 1984, as "National Federation of the Blind of South Dakota Month" in So .th Dakota. As citizens of this great State, it is important we all recognize the blind as fellow human beings who desire only to live full, rich lives in dignity and equality.●

THE SIXTH STREET FESTIVAL MARKETPLACE

● Mr. WARNER. Mr. President, I congratulate the people of Richmond on the award of a $4.2 million UDAG grant for the construction of the "Sixth Street Festival Marketplace." I was honored to join in the groundbreaking celebration for the marketplace held in Richmond, Va., on April 23, 1984 along with Secretary Pierce of the Department of Housing and Urban Development, Senator TRIBLE, Governor Robb, and Congressman TOM BLILEY, as well as thousands of other enthusiastic Virginians.

Albert G. Dobbins III, the economic development planner for the Richmond Renaissance Board—the organizers for the marketplace project—has prepared an outstanding analysis of the impact of the marketplace. I submit for the RECORD Mr. Dobbins' analysis.

The analysis follows:

6TH STREET FESTIVAL MARKETPLACE—IMPACTS ON BLACK COMMUNITY INTERESTS

The 6th Street festival marketplace project will impact Richmond's black community in a variety of ways. There will be physical and economic impacts which will affect its image and local economy. Also, there will be social impacts which will affect how blacks and whites live and interact with one another. The black community is diverse, therefore impacts will be felt differently. Specific "groups" of blacks will be affected according to their proximity to the development, their roles in the community, their vested interest in the area and their socio-economic status.

HISTORICAL OVERVIEW: POLITICS AND RACE

Since the formation of the Richmond Crusade for Voters in 1956, Richmond has been struggling to overcome its reputation for racial separation and arch-conservatism. Under the leadership of Dr. William S. Thornton, the Richmond Crusade of Voters has sustained a major campaign to increase black participation in the local decision-making process. After a series of battles going all the way to the United States Supreme Court, Richmond's voting structure was changed to a Ward System resulting in a 5-to-4 black majority on City Council in 1977. Since this change in local political power, Richmond's majority black City Council has attempted to implement a variety of programs designed to enhance the social and economic opportunities for all its residents.

DOWNTOWN INITIATIVES

The development and implementation of a downtown economic development plan has been a major item on City Council's agenda. In 1980, Council launched its first downtown initiative known as Project One. This development is to be a major office-hotel-convention center complex located north of Broad Street—a major thoroughfare often described as the dividing line separating blacks from whites. About $70 million of public funds will be committed by City government to support this mixed-use development.

A second initiative began in 1982. Richmond Renaissance, a no profit corporation, was organized as a biracial, public/private partnership to facilitate negotiation and cooperation between the business community and local government. City Council named a 60-person Board of Directors (evenly divided between blacks and whites) and committed $1.75 million in Community Development Block Grant CDBG) funds for eligible economic development projects. This amount was quickly matched by a $2 million pledge by the private sector.

In 1983, City Council agreed to a $3.5 million Section 108 loan to assist in the development of a festival marketplace project proposed by Richmond Renaissance. This was a bold step for City Council because these funds were to come from future CDBG allocations. Many in the community felt that CDBG money should only be spent for neighborhood projects. Nevertheless, Council decided that this downtown project would have substantial benefits for the entire city.

THE 6TH FESTIVAL MARKETPLACE

Richmond Renaissance's top priority project has been the 6th Street festival marketplace. More than a physical linking of the north and south sides of Broad Street, this project will be a glass and steel bond between the public and private sectors—blacks and whites. With the creation of a festival market stetching across Broad Street, the city's development efforts and the business community will be linked physically, economically and symbolically. Richmond's public officials, business and civic leaders perceive this project as a "bridge of unity" that will bring widely differing sectors of the community together.

The 6th Street project offers the black community a number of very positive direct benefits. During the design and construction of the project; 20% of the dollar value of design services and 30% of construction subcontracts will be let to minority firms. Also, minorities will comprise 30% of the construction labor force. During the operation of the marketplace, 20% of the dollar value of all service contracts will be let to minority firms, 30% of the management and administrative personnel will be minorities, 50% of clerical and maintenance personnel will be minorities and 30% of all permanent full and part-time employees of all tenants will be minorities. Most importantly, 15% of all tenants in the marketplace will be minority vendors and 51% of the capital stocks in the $6.0 million parking garage will be owned by local blacks.

THE SECOND STREET BUSINESS DISTRICT AREA

The 6th Street project also offers the potential for at least one major indirect benefit to the black community. Richmond's historic center of black business and culture is located adjacent to the Project One/6th Street marketplace site. This area, known as the Second Street Business District, is a 14-block commercial-residential community in the downtown area (see map). After the Civil War, this area became the home of black fraternal organizations, cooperative banks, insurance companies, and other commerical and social institutions. However, since the 1950's the Second Street Business District—like many small commercial areas in and near central business districts—has been affected adversely by loss of population and disinvestment.

In January 1983, Richmond Renaissance established a biracial subcommittee comprised of Second Street area merchants and property owners to investigate the potential for revitalizing this important black community. From the beginning, it was clear that the redevelopment of this area would be closely tied to the development of Project One and the 6th Street festival marketplace. Anticipating indirect social and economic benefits, the Second Street committee has begun a short-range development project. Predevelopment work is underway for a $2.5 million office building to be phased with the opening of the marketplace. This project will be financed from private sources including equity from the black community. It will attract a growing secondary office market among small service and professional firms who wish to locate outside of the high cost downtown financial district. Its feasibility is linked to the positive impacts expected from Project One, the 6th Street project and the nearby Medical College of Virginia complex.

THE "BOTTOM LINE"

The 6th Street project holds the potential for stimulating growth, jobs and more opportunities—with traditionally disenfranchised groups, i.e. blacks, included in the partnership. The project signals a new assertive direction for a city whose earlier leadership had projected an antebellum mystique where change and innovative ideas were viewed with suspicion. The "Bottom Line", is that the development of Richmond's 6th Street festival will favorably impact the social and economic well-being of all its citizens, but there are very major benefits to the black community that should be recognized.

SECOND STREET BUSINESS DISTRICT—CLAY STREET OFFICE BUILDING PROJECT

Predevelopment work is underway for a four-story, $2.5 million office building to be located at the northwest corner of Clay and Third Streets. This project wil¹ be financed with equity from the city's black community and debt from local lending institutions. It will require about 26,000 square feet of land and will offer over 28,000 square feet of leasable building space renting for roughly $12.00 per square foot. The project will attract a growing secondary office market among small service and professional firms who wish to locate outside the high cost financial district. Eighty-two on-site parking spaces will be provided and the surroundings will be designed to create a safe and attractive environment.

The Clay Street office building project is linked to nearby development initiatives. Its feasibility is based upon the development of both Project One and the 6th Street festival marketplace. If successful, this office building will be the first of many development projects leading to the revitalization of a historic black business area.●

RALPH FOSTER—PIONEER RADIO BROADCASTER

● Mr. EAGLETON. Mr. President, last week Mr. Ralph Foster celebrated his 91st birthday. For everyone in southwestern Missouri, Ralph is known as "Mr. Conservation," and a pioneer in radio broadcasting.

Ralph Foster's success in radio broadcasting is attributed to his ability to provide wholesome family programs and innovative programming techniques. He started his first station in St. Joseph, Mo., in 1926. Ralph's radio station was the first to originate "Weather Bureau" direct forecasting and to syndicate radio shows nationally. The "Ozarks Jubilee" was the first regular country music show on television and one of the biggest tourist attractions in Missouri in the mid-1950's. Through this program and other programs he produced for KWYO in Springfield, Ralph Foster has brought many an outstanding entertainment personality to the Ozarks.

It was Ralph's love for the outdoors that brought him to the Ozarks in 1933, where he has lived with his wife Harriet for over 53 years. In addition to his outstanding achievements in the field of radio and television, Ralph has been the catalyst in establishing good conservation practices for the State of Missouri. Mr. Foster helped establish the Conservation Commission in 1936 and has been collecting Native American artifacts for years. In the mid-1960's Mr. Foster donated his collection to the School of the Ozarks museum, and in 1967 the college changed the name of the museum to the Ralph Foster Museum.

Ralph Foster has dedicated his life to his fellow man. He currently is vice chairman of the Ralph Foster Museum Board, member of the Board of Trustees of the School of the Ozarks, and a member of the Board of the Lester E. Cox Medical Center.

I know my colleagues join me in wishing Mr. Foster a very special 91st birthday. Ralph Foster has given Missourians so much joy through his caring and happiness through his radio programming.●

RADIO AMATEURS LAUNCH TESTING BY VOLUNTEERS

● Mr. GOLDWATER. Mr. President, on the weekend of April 28-29, amateur radio examinations were administered to approximately 350 applicants by volunteer members of the Dayton Amateur Radio Association in Ohio. This was the first large-scale testing to be carried out by volunteers with FCC direction, rather than by the FCC itself.

This occasion marked the culmination of a process begun when Public Law 97-259 was enacted in September 1982, authorizing volunteers to administer amateur radio examinations. As the sponsor of the authorizing legislation, I want to congratulate Mrs. Judy Frye, chairwoman in charge of administering the examinations, and all the volunteers who assisted her in planning and carrying out the large scale effort to administer the examinations.

For fiscal year 1981, the latest figures available, the FCC estimated the cost of administering each amateur examination to be $7.26 per examination. The Dayton association estimates their costs to be under $3 per examination. The cost to the taxpayers is nothing. In addition, this volunteer system enables persons to obtain their amateur licenses on weekends and evenings, instead of having to lose a day of work in order to take the examination during normal FCC business hours.

I especially wish to note that the Dayton Amateur Radio Association under the very able leadership of Judy Frye and the assistance of her husband Charles, has taken the lead in coordinating examinations throughout the states of Ohio, Michigan, and West Virginia. Furthermore, they are ably advising and assisting other groups around the country, and thereby spreading the knowledge obtained by their hands-on experience in pioneering the first large-scale volunteer examinations.

I also wish to congratulate the Anchorage, Alaska, Amateur Radio Club, which was the first approved examination coordinator and also has held a testing session in that State. Other testing sessions will be held soon in Chicago, Ill., coordinated by the DeVry Amateur Radio Society, and Rochester, N.Y., by the Metroplex Amateur Communications Association.

Across the entire country, other volunteers are preparing to administer the amateur technical and Morse code examinations. Even as this occurs, the FCC has announced that they will have completely phased out their own testing by the end of 1984.

As a radio amateur myself, I am proud to report these events to my fellow Senators. The radio amateurs of this Nation are once again demonstrating their dedication and abilities. The taxpayers benefit by not picking up the tab for amateur examinations, and the amateurs benefit by having examinations more readily available and a more direct role in the amateur service.●

TRIBUTE TO ENOLIA P. McMILLAN

● Mr. SARBANES. Mr. President, Ms. Enolia P. McMillan, an energetic and dedicated civil rights activist, has recently been elected as national president of the NAACP. It is my firm belief that there is no one more qualified or more deserving of this honor. After nearly 15 years as head of the Baltimore branch of the NAACP, and after a lifetime of commitment to the cause of civil rights, Ms. McMillan is sure to bring new life and renewed commitment to the organization.

As the daughter of a slave, Enolia McMillan realizes better than most just how far we have come in the struggle for civil rights, and how far we have yet to go. During her long tenure as a teacher and then as a school administrator in Baltimore City and southern Maryland, she struggled long and hard to gain equality for blacks in the public school system. Her attempts to improve facilities and the quality of education for young black students and her struggle to obtain equal pay for black teachers were met with frequent disappointments, but she never gave up until her goals were accomplished.

Ms. McMillan has, in the past 15 years, built the Baltimore chapter of the NAACP into one of the most successful and effective chapters in the country. She has disproved assumptions that the NAACP is no longer an effective tool in the fight for civil rights, and has succeeded in dramatically increasing its declining membership. She has the rare ability to lead effectively, redirecting chapter goals to meet the changing demands of the times. Ms. McMillan's selection as president of the NAACP is indeed a great honor for Baltimore and for Maryland, and we wish her great success in her continued quest for equality under the law.

I ask that the following articles about Ms. McMillan be printed in the RECORD.

The articles follow:

[From the Baltimore Evening Sun, Jan. 13, 1984]

WAY TO GO

Enolia McMillan, the Baltimorean who has just been elected president (as distinct from the office of board chairman) of the NAACP, is hailed for her zest, her energy. Something, for a person in her 80th year. But, ever so slightly, people may be missing the point. Denton Watson of NAACP headquarters in New York says this is the first time since 1909 and its start that the organization has been presided over by a woman.

During her 35 years as a Baltimore schools teacher and administrator, McMillan somehow never got to be a principal. Lots of schools and lots of vacancies as principal; somehow, men were chosen.

Shirley Chisholm has gone into the quotation dictionaries with her remark that, throughout her career, being female was to her a bigger handicap than being black. At NAACP, recently, much of the advancement of civil rights and equal opportunity has gone on offstage, in extended court struggles. This is to predict that, to whatever extent the new president takes her case to the public, eye and minds will open as to more than one form of ancient American bias.

Enolia P. McMillan, who was elected national president of the NAACP last week, is the daughter of a man who was born a slave.

The 79-year-old Baltimorean says her father, John Pettigen, was a child working as a field hand on a Virginia plantation when slavery was abolished in 1863.

That's how close we are to slavery in our history in this country.

But Mrs. McMillan, a retired teacher and assistant principal, say she is "too busy concentrating on the branches" of her family to pay much attention to its roots.

"If I could get the branches to behave, I'd be satisfied," she says, laughing.

Actually, Mrs. McMillan does not seem to have any serious problems with the branches. Her only child is a successful engineer married to a college professor, and their children, Mrs. McMillan's grandchildren, face a future of possibilities unimaginable in 1863.

"Things have changed tremendously," Mrs. McMillan said the other day, reflecting on the 130-odd years between her father's childhood and that of her grandchildren. "Some things I never expected to live to see I have seen, like integration in the schools and in motels and restaurants.

"When I was in school I couldn't even sit down on the stool at the counter in the 5-and-10 cents store. Segregation was such a very strong tradition in this country, I was surprised that we were able to break it as quickly as we did."

Mrs. McMillan began her education in a rural, Harford county elementary school. She remembers driving to the segregated one-room school house in a horse-drawn buggy.

Her mother was a cleaning lady with an eighth-grade education. Her father, who had only six weeks of schooling in his life, became a farmer after he was freed.

But Mrs. McMillan says her parents wanted their children to have a better education than they had, so they moved to Baltimore, where Mrs. McMillan eventually graduated from what was then called Baltimore Colored High School.

She says she got a good education at that school, despite segregation. "Those schools had much more dedicated teachers than you find, on the whole, nowadays," she said. "The classes were quite small and the teachers took a real interest in pupils who showed some promise."

After high school, Mrs. McMillan went to Howard University in Washington, because, she says, "There wasn't a single first-rate college in Maryland that was open to blacks."

She couldn't afford to move to Washington so she commuted by train five days a week for four years, a trip which she says took her two and a half hours each way, door to door.

Despite the commute and the need to work part-time waiting on tables and selling stockings, Mrs. McMillan graduated with honors and went on to get a master's degree in education administration from Columbia University in New York.

Her dream was to become a doctor and work as a missionary in Africa, but she couldn't afford to go to medical school or to Africa, so she started teaching. She says she soon realized "there was plenty of good work to be done right here."

The good work included 19 years of class room teaching and more as an administrator, in Southern Maryland and Baltimore city.

During those years, Mrs. McMillan found herself fighting for equality at almost every turn.

The first big battle came when she discovered that white teachers were being paid twice as much as blacks. It took a number of years and the threat of a law suit, but eventually Mrs. McMillan and her colleagues won that fight.

She was rewarded for her efforts by being elected president of the Maryland State Colored Teachers Association.

From that position she became involved in the establishment of the Baltimore chapter of the NAACP and has remained active in that organization for nearly half a century now.

During those years, she says, she has seen the organization's power and prestige rise and fall and rise again.

"When other blacks called us 'Uncle Toms' during the sixties, we stuck to our original principles," she says. "We never changed. We've never advocated violence. We've always worked for change through negotiation, legislation and litigation. Our critics changed, but we've always stayed the same."

If the NAACP was threatened by black militancy in the sixties, now Mrs. McMillan says the organization is threatened by complacency.

"A lot of successful blacks think we've arrived just because they have. They've got a good job, a nice car, a lovely home. The civil rights laws are on the books. They say, 'We've made it. Who needs the NAACP anymore?'"

This is how Mrs. McMillan answers that question:

"There are still millions of blacks who need us. Even where there is no more overt discrimination, there is covert discrimination. There is economic discrimination. There is black unemployment running twice as high as white unemployment."

"I may be old, but I can still see," she says, "and I see a lot of racism still with us here in America, and a lot of back-sliding in Washington, a lot of battles that we thought we'd won and now we have to fight them all over again."

"Well, we've won some of those battles, and we've come a long, long way, but the war is not over," says Enolia P. McMillan, the daughter of a man who was born a slave. "It would be real nice to sit back after 79 years and say 'Praise the Lord. It's done. The war is over.'"

"But in my heart," she says, "I know it's not."

ENOLIA MCMILLAN: NAACP LEADER KNOWS THE PRICE OF PROGRESS

(By Jeffrey W. Peters)

Enolia P. McMillan, retired teacher, veteran civil rights activist and rookie national president of the NAACP, studied in the shadow of prejudice and learned well the price of progress.

From a youth spent in search of education, through the time she joined the local chapter of the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People, through 40 years as a city school teacher and 14 more at the helm of Baltimore's NAACP, McMillan battled an intransigent establishment and apathetic members of her own race.

But the sacrifice of her ambition and privacy as been repaid—collectively, in the growth of opportunities for all blacks, and personally, in her elevation to the national presidency of the NAACP this week, even though the job is unsalaried.

"Maybe this is just the shot in the arm I need to keep me going a little bit longer," said McMillan, 79, as she reflected on a half-century of struggle studded with success.

Even as well-wishers jammed McMillan's living room and telephone line, reminders of past efforts surrounded her.

Her husband, Betha M. McMillan, proudly pointed to the plaques and parchments that mark her contributions to a host of social, charitable and educational organizations. Delta Sigma Theta recognized her outstanding citizenship, the Maryland State Teachers Association commemorated her dedication to education and former Gov. Marvin Mandel congratulated her for years of service on the Morgan State University board of trustees.

In 1962, when the Rev. Martin Luther King Jr. was just becoming nationally prominent, the NAACP thanked McMillan for her many years of dedicated service.

"We've had successes over the years, and that proves that progress is possible," McMillan said. "It may not be as fast or as complete as you want, but it is possible. And unless you believe that, you'll just fold up your arms and say 'Come on, death.'"

Prodded by questions, she remembered the arguments and the protests, the sit-ins and the walkouts. The recounted stories chart a map of social progress in the black community and offer a blueprint for future fights.

"The most important change over the years has been in the types of jobs blacks are able to get. Now, we just don't have enough of them [blacks] getting jobs," McMillan said. "But when I got out of college the only thing I could get was teaching, or domestic work."

Four years of daily, five-hour journeys to Howard University in Washington had prepared the former Enolia Pettigen of Baltimore for a teaching career. In 1927, she entered the profession as a teacher at Denton High School in Carolina County. Then came eight years as a principal in Charles County, followed by a 35-year career as a teacher and administrator in the Baltimore school system.

Despite the discrimination and harassment she would encounter, McMillan had broken the bonds of ignorance. Neither her mother nor sister had gone to college; both labored for a lifetime in the homes of others. The child whose father had been born a slave was the first member of her family to attend college—although Maryland's segregated schools forced her to leave the state to do so.

She in turn communicated a love of learning to her own child, Betha M. McMillan Jr. Nearly 30 years after his mother graduated, Betha Jr. earned his engineering degree from Lehigh Univesity in Pennsylvania. He now works for Westinghouse Co.

In her quest to extend the benefits of education to all blacks, McMillan found little support and much opposition. From buildings to buses, textbooks to teacher salaries, black schools ranked a very poor second to the supposedly "separate but equal" white systems.

Charles County, with a population almost equally divided between whites and blacks, maintained five white schools but funded only a single secondary institution for blacks. McMillan found that few teen-age blacks could afford to attend the school that was tucked away in a distant tip of the county.

"So we got together and bought a little, used yellow bus and named it Amos," she remembered. "It gave us fits but it also got out to students for almost 40 miles around. The next year we bought a second bus and, by the third year, we were up to having a brand new bus. By the time I left, we had three buses running through the county."

Similar struggles awaited when McMillan returned to her native Baltimore in 1935, armed with a master's degree from Columbia University in New York.

Already known as a radical for her efforts to boost the pay of black teachers, she brought her feisty energies to bear on the serious overcrowding that had plagued the city's black schools for years.●

DIANA HOPE HAMILTON

● Mr. DIXON. Mr. President, I would like to take this opportunity to salute an outstanding public servant, Diana Hope Hamilton, the executive director of the Northeast-Midwest Senate Coalition.

Diana is leaving the coalition to pursue a master's degree in business.

She has worked effectively with 38 Senators representing diverse political philosophies, which is no small accomplishment. She has also been able to galvanize representatives of our legislative staffs into working toward common goals that benefit the Northeast and Midwestern regions of the Nation. Diana was responsible to 38 Members of the U.S. Senate and many of them have told me how much they respect her work.

Diana is an exceptional individual. She has mastered the techniques of the legislative process, while at the same time expanding the influence of the coalition.

I know of very few people who could accomplish what she has in 3 years.

The coalition is now interviewing candidates to replace Diana and we are having a difficult time finding a replacement because of the standards she set.

Along with my colleagues, I wish her well in her future endeavors and want Diana to know that we are going to miss her.●

THE 1984 AAA SCHOOL SAFETY PATROL LIFESAVING MEDAL RECIPIENTS

● Mr. WARNER. Mr. President, this month, the American Automobile Association is presenting 10 young people, including a Virginian, the highest award given to members of school safety patrols throughout the United States, the AAA School Safety Patrol Lifesaving Medal.

The lifesaving award program was initiated in 1949 by the American Automobile Association to recognize and honor selected school patrol members for their heroic lifesaving contribution to their communities.

Since its inception, there have been more than 260 boys and girls from 28 States and the District of Columbia who have been honored with the lifesaving medal.

An award review board, composed of representatives from active national organizations in the fields of education, law enforcement, and safety, selects deserving medal recipients from those candidates who have been officially nominated for consideration.

As a cosponsor of Senate Joint Resolution 172 last year, designating the week of October 3 to 8, 1983, as "National Schoolbus Safety Week of 1983," I heartily commend these young people for their achievements.

I an particularly proud that a young Virginian, Terezia C. Rauch, is an award winner this year, and I am pleased to list for the RECORD the 1984 recipients of the AAA School Safety Patrol Lifesaving Medal:

Terezia C. Rauch, 11, Glebe School, Arlington, Virginia; John M. Aleksa, 11, Public School No. 107, Flushing, New York; Robert Bodine, 11, South Daytona Elementary School, South Dayton, Florida; Iliana Cintron, 11, Public School No. 26X, Bronx, New York; Annie L. Kustelski, 12, Stuart School, Milwaukee, Wisconsin; Pablo D. Lues, 11, Public School No. 107, Flushing, New York; Chadwick W. Macfie, 12, South Daytona Elementary School, South Daytona, Florida; Deron Spigner, 12, James E. Stephens Elementary School, Bartow, Florida; Gary J. Thomas, 10, Fairhome Elementary School, Lorain, Ohio; Ken Wetherington, 12 James E. Stephens Elementary School, Bartow, Florida.

I know my colleagues join me in congratulating these fine young people for their achievements.●

HUMAN SERVICES REAUTHORIZATION ACT

● Mr. COCHRAN. Mr. President, I recently returned from a visit to several Head Start programs in my State and would like to take this opportunity to impress upon my colleagues the tremendous job this program is doing to enhance the long-term growth and development of the young people the program serves.

As Senators know, Head Start has been widely recognized as one of the Federal Government's most cost effective and successful Federal programs. It has been in existence since 1965 and currently serves over 400,000 children enrolled in full-time programs throughout the country. The programs provide for education, counseling, food and nutrition services, health care, volunteer opportunities, and training and jobs for parents and members of the community.

A great deal of research and several studies have clearly documented the positive effects on children and their parents resulting from involvement in the Head Start program. One such study concluded that Head Start's benefits outweigh its costs by 235 percent.

I have been, and will continue to be, a strong supporter of this valuable program. Recently, I cosponsored legislation, S. 2374, the Human Services Reauthorization Act, along with Senator STAFFORD and over 34 of my colleagues, which would extend the authorization for the Head Start program for 5 years. This legislation includes several provisions which will strengthen the ability of the program to continue to deliver high quality, cost-effective services to an additional 60,000 children during fiscal year 1985 alone.

Language in the bill strengthens existing local community Head Start programs, while allowing flexibility in the designation of new Head Start programs in areas where such services are not now being provided. Funding for training and technical assistance, child development associate training, as well as assessment and credentialing programs for such personnel, is included. This is a very important matter for a program that depends so heavily on volunteers and parents for staff.

The performance standards, which must be met by each local program, are strengthened so that the quality and scope of services will be maintained at a level equal to those standards in effect in November 1978.

Much of Head Start's continued success, in Mississippi and throughout the country, will depend on the effective implementation of these, and other, provisions contained in the Human Services Reauthorization Act.

I urge the chairman of the Committee on Labor and Human Resources, Senator HATCH, to act on S. 2374 and assist in its passage. This will certainly allow the Head Start program to continue to build upon a well established, solid record of accomplishments.●

PRESIDENT REAGAN'S VISIT TO FAIRBANKS, ALASKA

(By request of Mr. STEVENS, the following statement was ordered to be printed in the RECORD:)

● Mr. MURKOWSKI. Mr. President, I would like to take this opportunity to explain my absence from this week's Senate business.

This week, I had the honor and privilege of hosting President Ronald Reagan on his 32-hour visit to Fairbanks, my hometown.

In addition to hosting President Reagan and his wife, Nancy, I had the pleasure of greeting Secretary of State George Shultz and Secretary of Interior William Clark.

I also had the honor to represent the U.S. Congress during the visit between President Reagan and His Holiness, Pope John Paul II.

This business was a once-in-a-lifetime event for the estimated 12,000 Alaskans who attended the meeting at the Fairbanks International Airport. I believe it will also have a tremendous impact on the world's perception of Alaska.●

JACK KASSEWITZ WAS ONE OF A KIND

● Mr. CHILES. Mr. President, the heading on this tribute was taken from the headline on the obituary for Jack Kassewitz in the Miami News, the newspaper with which he was associated since 1954. In my opinion the headline describes him beautifully.

Jack died of cancer April 16 in Miami at age 70 following an outstanding newspaper career and an active role in the community that will long leave its mark there. He will be sorely missed.

In his memory and in recognition of his contributions I offer several excerpts from the News obituary which help define the man:

Jack Kassewitz felt at home in the elite downtown Miami Club and just as comfortable helping out derelicts who wandered into his office and walked out with money in their hands.

He loved practical jokes and practical jokers, and he looked at the world with an oft-bemused stare. But he also was a respected thinker who wrote prize-winning editorials. And . . .

Forced to drop out of college during the Depression to take a $15-a-week job as a part-time reporter in Mercer, Ga., Kassewitz was a lifelong advocate of higher education. He served 13 years on Miami-Dade's board of trustees, often as chairman or vice chairman. He was appointed to the State Community College Council and taught journalism classes at Miami-Dade in the late 1960's. A data processing building on Miami-Dade's south campus is named after him. And . . .

Kassewitz was a member of the News' editorial board for 15 years. In those years the newspaper won the Florida Society of Newspaper Editors' first place award for editorials. He also won a special award from the Florida Bar for an editorial policy sensitive to public issues "in the administration of justice." And . . .

Long active in the Jewish community, Kassewitz was a three-term chairman of the Florida Regional Board of the Anti-Defamation League of B'nai B'rith in the 1970's. He is listed in Who's Who of World Jewry.

In recognition of his achievements Kassewitz was awarded the Anti-Defamation League's Leonard L. Abess Human Rights Award in 1979.

Kassewitz served for years as a member of the county's Community Action Agency and was an active Mason.

Kassewitz held a number of civic posts . . . and former president of the Greater Miami Chapter of the Society of Professional Journalists, Sigma Delta Chi.

And, most important—

"He was probably the greatest family man that God ever made," his wife said, "He was the most unselfish and generous man. He never considered himself over anyone else."

All of this says a lot about the man that Jack Kassewitz was, but it does not say it all. For his kind, words are not enough.●

TRIBUTE TO ANSEL ADAMS

● Mr. JEPSEN. Mr. President, today it is my privilege to pay tribute to Ansel Adams. His death on April 22 brought an end to his brilliant era as one of America's best known photographers. For over half a century, Mr. Adams captured the majesty of the American West on film with amazing clarity and precision.

As an innovator of landscape photography, he researched and perfected techniques for the development of modern landscape photography. His contributions of insight into photography education taught many to see through the camera lens the same wilderness beauty he admired.

It was this love for the American West and especially the Yosemite Valley that inspired Adams to dedicate a great portion of his life to the preservation and conservation of our environment. His efforts as a true conservationist earned him awards of such magnitude as the Sierra Club's John Muir Award in 1963 and the Conservation Service Award for the Interior Department in 1968. In 1980, Adams received the Nation's highest civilian honor, the Presidential Medal of Freedom, for being both an artist and an environmentalist.

Ansel Adams took his talents and brought them in picture form to millions of Americans to enjoy and appreciate the grandeur of the American wilderness.

In January of 1975, Adams said of himself: "As I became more and more interested in the mountains, my natural impulse was to have a visual diary." We are fortunate to have this extraordinary visual diary of a man who was so in tune to the natural beauty and grace of the American West.

Ansel Adams was a photographer, educator, conservationist, and American whose impact will always be felt and whose presence will definitely be missed.●

PHELMON SAUNDERS RETIRES

● Mr. LEVIN. Mr. President, I am pleased to recognize today a fine person who recently celebrated his retirement.

Born and raised in Detroit, Phelmon Saunders attended the Detroit public schools and Marygrove College, where he took classes in printing and graphic art. He gained valuable experience in the printing field, working for the Detroit Tribune and several print shops. He was admired by his coworkers and made many friends while employed by the Ford Motor Co. and later at the Wayne County General Hospital, where he was promoted to duplicating machine supervisor in 1969. In 1982, Mr. Saunders transferred to the Wayne County Cooperative Extension Service, where he worked diligently until his retirement a few weeks ago.

Phelmon Saunders has been an active member of various union organizations. He was elected financial secretary of local 25 of the American Federation of State, County, and Municipal Employees and held that position from 1968 to 1979. He was also a delegate to AFSCME Council 25 and the Metro Detroit AFL-CIO.

Phelmon Saunders will continue to be active in the Smith Chapel AME Church in Inkster, Mich. He is a trustee of the church, organized and directs the choir, and is vice president of the Men's Club—MOVE—Men Organized in Volunteer Endeavors.

I wish to congratulate Phelmon Saunders on this happy occasion and to wish him continued happiness and fulfillment.●

RHODE ISLAND DECLARATION OF INDEPENDENCE

● Mr. CHAFEE. Mr. President, the Colony of Rhode Island and Providence Plantations was the first of the Original 13 Colonies to declare its independence from Great Britain.

May 4, 1984, marks the 208th anniversary of the general assembly's declaration of independence from King George. In order to commemorate that day, I ask that Rhode Island's original renunciation of the Crown be printed in the permanent RECORD.

The material follows:

RENUNCIATION OF THE CROWN

An act repealing an act entitled, "An Act for the more effectually securing to his Majesty the Allegiance of his Subjects, in this his Colony and Dominion of Rhode-Island and Providence Plantations;" and altering the Forms of Commissions, of all Writs and Processes in the Courts, and of the Oaths prescribed by Law.

Whereas in all States existing by Compact, Protection and Allegiance are reciprocal, the latter being only due in Consequence of the former: and whereas George the Third, King of Great-Britain, forgetting his Dignity, regardless of the Compact most solemnly entered into, ratified and confirmed, to the Inhabitants of this Colony, by His illustrious Ancestors, and till of late fully recognized by Him—and entirely departing from the Duties and Character of a good King, instead of protecting, is endeavouring to destroy the good People of this Colony, and of all the United Colonies, by sending Fleets and Armies to America, to confiscate our Property, and spread Fire, Sword and Desolation, throughout our Country, in order to compel us to submit to the most debasing and detestable Tyranny; whereby we are obliged by Necessity, and it becomes our highest Duty, to use every Means, with which God and Nature have furnished us, in Support of our invaluable Rights and Privileges; to oppose that Power which is exerted only for our Destruction.

Be it therefore Enacted by this General Assembly, and by the Authority thereof it is Enacted, That an Act entitled, "An Act for the more effectual securing to His Majesty the Allegiance of his Subjects in this his Colony and Dominion of Rhode-Island and Providence Plantations," be, and the same is hereby, repealed.

Clerk of the house, Josias Lyndon, wrote: "Resolved that the aforementioned written pass as an act of this assembly."

It was read and approved in the upper house the same day, as attested by Henry Ward, secretary.

For the first time the session closed with the words, "God save the United Colonies."●

IN REMEMBRANCE OF ARMENIAN MARTYRS DAY

● Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, 69 years ago, in 1915, the Armenian people were subjected to unprecedented brutality. Innocent Armenians were massacred. Those years of darkness for the Armenian people must never be forgotten. It is one of the saddest chapters in the history of the human race. In an effort to keep the memory of this tragedy alive, I have cosponsored Senate Joint Resolution 83—designating a day of remembrance for the victims of Armenian genocide—and Senate Resolution 241, expressing the sense of the Senate that the foreign policy of the United States should take account of the genocide of the Armenian people.

I am disturbed that the Department of State is reluctant to recognize these unspeakable mass murders as genocide. All who respect the dignity of human life must condemn these killings and similar abuses without equivocation.

We will recall these tragic events again and again, so that public leaders and private citizens the world over will remember that mankind has a collective responsibility to insure that such abuses never recur. Also, we must do everything possible to liberate the human race from these terrible cycles of violence. Armenian Martyrs Day plays an important role in these efforts.●

YOUTH EMPLOYMENT OPPORTUNITY WAGE

● Mr. DENTON. Mr. President, I submit for the RECORD a resolution endorsing a youth opportunity wage program by the National Conference of Black Mayors and a statement issued by the National Conference of Black Mayors explaining their support for the program.

The Reagan administration has announced that it soon will send a bill to Congress to establish a youth opportunity wage for youth under the age of 22 at $2.50 an hour. The National Conference of Black Mayors, by endorsing the administration's efforts courageously has shown that the "Black Mayors" are willing to try an innovative approach to the age-old problem of chronic youth unemployment in the black community.

I am proud that the "Black Mayors" were led in passing this resolution by the President of the conference, Mayor Johnny Ford of Tuskegee, Ala. Mayor Ford's conscientious leadership is well-known in Alabama and the rest of the country. I congratulate Mayor Ford and his colleagues for their wise statement of policy.

The material follows:

RESOLUTION —

"The National Conference of Black Mayors (NCBM) believes that everyone should earn the minimum wage or above. However, given the tremendous problem of youth unemployment and particularly the problem of minority youth unemployment and given the persistence of the tragedy of youth unemployment, despite a history of programs designed to reduce youth unemployment, be resolved the NCBM supports an experimental summer youth opportunity wage program which increases youth employment opportunities which would not displace youth or adults currently employed at or above the minimum wage, and which provides sanctions sufficient to prevent abuse."

STATEMENT BY BOARD OF NATIONAL CONFERENCE OF BLACK MAYORS, APRIL 20, 1984

"In a dramatic opening session of the National Conference of Black Mayors, the urgent need for new national policies to reduce unemployment among minority youth led to the passage of a resolution in support of an experimental summer youth opportunity wage program.

"The resolution came in the face of strong arguments against relaxing any aspect of the standard wage floor.

"At issue was the Mayors' concern that any lessening of wage standards versus the compelling need to develop new solutions to get minority youth off the streets and into gainful employment be addressed immediately. Present estimates of black teenage unemployment range as high as 75 percent.

"A critical element in persuading the National Conference of Black Mayors' membership to go along with the ground-breaking resolution was the experimental character of the initiative, as well as the crisis in black teenage unemployment.

"The real-life experience of black mayors at the grass roots level of government—seeing more and more structurally unemployed minorities and especially young blacks—and less and less money for summer employment—dictated that there be some effort—some experiment to help now to solve the problem.

"The mayors hope that their leadership on the subject will lead to a constructive dialogue within the national and local black communities on how best to assure mainstream employment for black youth.

"The fear expressed by some mayors was that support for this youth measure might be misread or misconstrued to suggest weakened support for full adult employment at full wages. To meet these concerns, clear provisions were insisted upon to bar any adult worker displacement, under pain of civil and criminal penalties."●

TOWARD AN ENERGY EFFICIENT AMERICA

● Mr. CRANSTON. Mr. President, despite the severe oil shocks of the seventies which demonstrated our tremendous vulnerability to precipitous cutoffs of foreign oil supplies, the United States has seen much of its progress toward eliminating foreign oil dependence reversed by administration policies over the past 3 years. A temporary surplus of oil stocks created by a worldwide recession in the industrial nations has lulled us into complacency, and a shortsighted reliance on fossil fuels and nuclear power—no matter how costly, dangerous, polluting, or unreliable—has replaced the long-range programs initiated in the seventies to increase conservation and provide clean, reliable energy alternatives.

Enactment of S. 2629, S. 2630, S. 2631, and S. 2632, the four bills comprising the Energy Efficient America Act will go a long way toward reestablishing our commitment to energy conservation and the use of renewable energy sources as the best way to provide affordable, safe, and reliable energy to all our people in the future.●

ORDER FOR AUTHORIZATION TO RECEIVE AND REFER

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, since we are not going to be in session on Monday, I ask unanimous consent that during the recess of the Senate on Friday until Tuesday, May 8, the Secretary of the Senate be authorized to receive messages from the President of the United States and the House of Representatives and they be appropriately referred, and that the Vice President and President pro tempore be authorized to sign duly enrolled bills and joint resolutions.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

ORDER FOR THE RECOGNITION OF SENATOR PROXMIRE AND DESIGNATING A PERIOD FOR THE TRANSACTION OF ROUTINE MORNING BUSINESS ON TUESDAY

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that on Tuesday next, after the recognition of the two leaders under the standing order, the Senator from Wisconsin (Mr. PROXMIRE) be recognized on a special order of not to exceed 15 minutes, to be followed by a period for the transaction of routine morning business of not more than 10 minutes in length, in which Senators may speak for not more than 5 minutes each.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

THE PROGRAM FOR TUESDAY, MAY 8, 1984

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, when the Senate completes its business today, it will stand in recess until 9:30 a.m. tomorrow, at which time the Senate will be in session only pro forma and will be recessed then until the hour of 10 a.m. on Tuesday next.

On Tuesday next, after the recognition of the two leaders under the standing order, there will be one special order for the Senator from Wisconsin (Mr. PROXMIRE), to be followed by a brief period for the transaction of routine morning business, after which the Senate will resume the consideration of the unfinished business. At that time, the Chiles amendment will be the pending question.

Since there is an order for a time certain to vote on the Chiles amendment at 3 p.m. on Tuesday next, it is entirely possible that other matters in addition to the debate on the Chiles amendment may be taken up prior to that time.

Mr. President, Senators should be on notice that Tuesday, Wednesday, and Thursday of next week at least will be very busy days and that there will be votes on each day and perhaps late sessions.

Mr. President, I have nothing further to announce.

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, just for the record, the majority leader, I believe, has stated—he has not suggested otherwise—that there may be votes on Tuesday prior to the 3 p.m. vote. By virtue of the fact that the Senate has entered an order that there will be a vote on the Chiles amendment at 3 p.m. on Tuesday, the majority leader agrees with me, does he not, that this does not in and of itself mean no votes prior to that?

Mr. BAKER. Yes, Mr. President; that is entirely correct. I thank the minority leader for making that statement and drawing the attention of all Senators to that possibility.

Mr. BYRD. I thank the majority leader.

RECESS UNTIL 9:30 A.M. TOMORROW

Mr. BAKER. Now, Mr. President, I move, in accordance with the order previously entered, that the Senate now stand in recess until 9:30 a.m. tomorrow.

The motion was agreed to, and the Senate, at 6:07 p.m., recessed until Friday, May 4, 1984, at 9:30 a.m.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES—Thursday, May 3, 1984

The House met at 11 a.m.

The Chaplain, Rev. James David Ford, D.D., offered the following prayer:

If My people, who are called by My name, will humble themselves and pray and seek My face and turn from their wicked ways, then I will hear from heaven and will forgive their sin, and will heal their land.—II Chronicles 7: 14.

Gracious God, as we mark this National Day of Prayer, may our prayer be for ourselves, our Nation, and all people who need Your protection and care. Encourage us to be the people You would have us be and do those good things that are worthy of Your creation. May Your blessing be upon us this day and every day. That justice and mercy and peace will abide with us and all Your people. In Your name, we pray. Amen.

THE JOURNAL

The SPEAKER. The Chair has examined the Journal of the last day's proceedings and announces to the House his approval thereof.

Pursuant to clause 1, rule I, the Journal stands approved.

Mr. WALKER. Mr. Speaker, pursuant to clause 1, rule I, I demand a vote on agreeing to the Speaker's approval of the Journal.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the Chair's approval of the Journal.

The question was taken; and the Speaker announced that the ayes appeared to have it.

Mr. WALKER. Mr. Speaker, I object to the vote on the ground that a quorum is not present and make the point of order that a quorum is not present.

The SPEAKER. Evidently a quorum is not present.

The Sergeant at Arms will notify absent Members.

The vote was taken by electronic device, and there were—yeas 344, nays 28, answered, "present" 3, not voting 58, as follows:

Mr. SEIBERLING changed his vote from "nay" to "yea."

So the Journal was approved.

The result of the vote was announced as above recorded.

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT

A message in writing from the President of the United States was communicated to the House by Mr. Saunders, one of his secretaries.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE

A message from the Senate by Mr. Sparrow, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had passed without amendment a concurrent resolution of the House of the following title:

H. Con. Res. 275. Concurrent resolution commending the Government of Colombia for its recent seizure of record amounts of cocaine, congratulating the Government of Colombia for its decision to test herbicidal eradication, expressing the hope that the Government of Colombia will carry out a sustained eradication program, and deploring the assassination of the Minister of Justice of Colombia.

AUTHORIZING USE OF THE ROTUNDA OF THE CAPITOL TO HONOR THE UNKNOWN AMERICAN VIETNAM-ERA VETERAN SELECTED FOR BURIAL AT ARLINGTON NATIONAL CEMETERY

Mr. WRIGHT. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table the concurrent resolution (H. Con. Res. 296) authorizing use of the rotunda of the Capitol to honor the unknown American who lost his life while serving in the Armed Forces of the United States in Southeast Asia during the Vietnam era and who has been selected to be buried in the Memorial Amphitheater at Arlington National Cemetery, and ask for its immediate consideration.

The Clerk read the title of the concurrent resolution.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Texas?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the concurrent resolution, as follows:

H. CON. RES. 296

Resolved by the House of Representatives (the Senate concurring), That during the period beginning on May 25, 1984, and ending on May 28, 1984, the rotunda of the United States Capitol may be used for the lying in state of the remains of the unknown American who lost his life while serving in the Armed Forces of the United States in Southeast Asia during the Vietnam era and who has been selected to be buried in the Memorial Amphitheater at Arlington National Cemetery, and for the conduct of ceremonies in connection with that use.

SEC. 2. The Architect of the Capitol may prescribe appropriate conditions for physical preparations with respect to the use of the rotunda authorized by the first section.

SEC. 3. The Speaker shall be authorized to appoint a delegation representating the House and the Majority Leader of the Senate shall be authorized to appoint a delegation representing the Senate.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas (Mr. WRIGHT) is recognized for 1 hour.

Mr. WRIGHT. Mr. Speaker, this carries out the mandate voted by the Congress in the 93d Congress. This will permit the ceremony to be held and the body to lay in state from May 25 until May 28 in the rotunda, preparatory to burial in the Memorial Amphitheater at Arlington National Cemetery of a young American whose life was taken in Southeast Asia during the Vietnam era.

On May 17, the Unknown will be officially designated with great ceremony in Hawaii where the remains now are. The Navy, with a Coast Guard escort, will move the Unknown by ship from Hawaii to San Francisco arriving there on May 24. The next day the Air Force will fly the remains from Travis Air Force Base to Andrews Air Force Base, and there a multiservice ceremonial unit, under the lead of the U.S. Army, will move those remains to the Capitol where it will be authorized here to lie in state, and this resolution provides that the Speaker shall be authorized to appoint a delegation representing the House and the majority leader of the Senate shall be authorized to appoint a delegation representing the Senate.

Mr. GILMAN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WRIGHT. I yield to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. GILMAN. I thank the gentleman for yielding.

Mr. Speaker, while this is certainly a worthy tribute to our missing in action, I want my colleagues to know, that there is some concern amongst some of our veterans groups throughout our Nation that this may be perceived as a closing of the book on our missing in action. We certainly hope that there is no basis for that perception and that that will not occur.

I want my colleague to know that there were some reservations by some of the leadership of our veterans organizations with regard to this initiative. While we recognize that it is a worthy tribute to our missing in action, and I hope and pray that we will continue in our efforts to try to bring about a full and final accounting of our missing in action in Southeast Asia, who still number over 2,400.

The issue of the Unknown Soldier from the Vietnam war is an issue that is of major importance to many of our veterans across the Nation—not only to our Vietnam-era veterans, but to all the veterans in America. As chairman of the House Task Force on American Prisoners and Missing in Southeast Asia, I believe that while the internment of the remains of a soldier from the Vietnam war is a worthy tribute, it is premature. With some 2,500 Americans still missing in Southeast Asia, and with the thousands of families of those unaccounted for in Asia still waiting for word on the fate of their loved ones, such internment could be perceived that our search for the missing is no longer a high priority. Many Americans will question the timing of this internment, and will wonder why we are closing the book on our Vietnam experience at a time when some progress is being made in the search for our MIA's and POW's.

We have worked long and hard for a full and final accounting of our missing Americans. I hope that if the Tomb of the Unknown Soldier is to contain the fragments of a Vietnam-era soldier, we will not forget the valiant struggle that our Americans have made in Southeast Asia—and may still be making there. In my mind, and in the mind of many Americans, the Vietnam war will not be over until all of our Americans—including all 2,500 still unaccounted for—come home. The repatriation of remains, and the return of live Americans will signal the final chapter in the Vietnam story. With increasing evidence that some Americans may still be alive in Southeast Asia, we cannot afford to close the book at this time. With the increasing public awareness that has been focused on the MIA/POW issue, it is my hope that placing unidentifiable remains in the Tomb of the Unknown Soldier at this time will not send a signal to the American people that the MIA question no longer has the urgency and the importance that it once had.

Along with many of our colleagues in the House, our MIA task force intends to continue working to secure a full and final accounting of our missing Americans, and we urge our fellow Americans to continue this effort with us.

Thank you.

Mr. WRIGHT. I thank the gentleman for his comments.

Mr. MONTGOMERY. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WRIGHT. I yield to the distinguished chairman of the Veterans' Affairs Committee, the gentleman from Mississippi (Mr. MONTGOMERY).

Mr. MONTGOMERY. I thank the gentleman for yielding.

Mr. Speaker, I generally support what the gentleman from New York (Mr. GILMAN) has said, but I would like to make it clear to my colleagues that in my position that after thorough study and after heading up two select committees from the House of Representatives, it seems that no Americans are still being held captive in Southeast Asia who fought in the Vietnam war.

There could be a few deserters over there living with the Vietnamese or living in Cambodia or Laos, but I think it should be made clear, that in my opinion no Americans are still being held captive. I think it is unfair to the families of the missing to give the families false hope when there is no information that any of these brave men are still alive. I agree with the gentleman from New York (Mr. GILMAN) that we need to continue to gather as much information as we can on what happened to those Americans and not stop our search for what happened to these Americans.

We made a good accounting in Southeast Asia; we have accounted for all but 4 percent of those who were killed or did not come home. In World War II, we did not account for 22 percent of those, and in the Korean war, 22 percent were not accounted for.

My point is, Mr. Speaker, that we should not give the families hopes that any Americans are still alive in Southeast Asia and being held captive. I would certainly hope I was wrong and Americans are being held captive; but all the signs point that no Americans are being held against their will. I think this is the right step to honor the Unknown Soldier, and the reason it has taken 10 years to have an Unknown Soldier for the Vietnam war is that under the technology that we now have, we have been able to identify all the Americans who came into the identification center in Honolulu. This American was not identified and it is only proper that this Unknown be honored as we have honored those in other wars.

Mr. McCAIN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WRIGHT. I yield to the gentleman from Arizona.

Mr. McCAIN. I thank the gentleman for yielding.

Mr. Speaker, I would like to concur in the remarks of the distinguished chairman of the Veterans' Affairs Committee. I do not believe that this administration or anyone else views this as a closing of the chapter of our missing in action. I understand the remarks that the gentleman from Mississippi (Mr. MONTGOMERY) just made, but I still would not want us to forget that we must continue to make every effort to receive a full accounting for those 2,400 who are missing in action.

I do not view, nor do I believe anyone should view this particular long overdue ceremony of recognizing the Unknown Soldier from Vietnam as a closing, but possibly, a refocusing of attention on this issue and a recognition that we need to resolve it and continue to make every possible effort.

Mr. MICHEL. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WRIGHT. I yield to the distinguished minority leader.

Mr. MICHEL. I thank the gentleman for yielding to me.

Mr. Speaker, did I understand the gentleman in enumerating the schedule that the actual lying in state would be in the Capitol Rotunda beginning when, May 25?

Mr. WRIGHT. May 25, and continuing into May 28.

Mr. MICHEL. Then would the interment in the Arlington National Cemetery be on what date?

Mr. WRIGHT. Yes; on the 28th of May.

Mr. MICHEL. I think it a very appropriate time of the year, Memorial Day, for such a ceremony to take place, but with only one caveat.

The Members were advised, as we agreed on a schedule early on in the year, that we would take our Memorial Day recess from the 25th of May through the 29th, which I am sure most Members have obligated themselves to appearances on Memorial Day occasions back in their respective districts.

I would certainly not want it to appear in any way disrespectful to what is taking place here in the Nation's Capital during that period that there will not be a great number of Members of Congress, all of whom would probably want to participate in that ceremony. I do note that the gentlemen's resolution, however, does call for the Speaker authorizing the appointment of the delegation representing the House and majority leader of the Senate to do likewise, so that the Congress, both Houses, will be appropriately represented at those ceremonies, and I am grateful for that consideration in the resolution.

I am sure, if put to a vote, each and every one of us would want to be present on that very solemn occasion.

Mr. WRIGHT. The gentleman is most certainly correct. That official delegation appointed by our Speaker and by the majority leader in the Senate will formally represent the Congress.

□ 1130

Undoubtedly every Member would desire to be present, were it possible so to do. There is no date, however, upon which we might select a more appropriate time than during the Memorial Day period, and probably no date on which we could find an occasion when all Members were free of obligations previously entered into.

Mr. GILMAN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield further?

Mr. WRIGHT. Surely. I yield to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. GILMAN. Mr. Speaker, I thank the gentleman for yielding.

Does the gentleman intend to request leave for Members to enter further remarks in the RECORD with regard to this resolution?

Mr. WRIGHT. I certainly do.

● Mr. LENT. Mr. Speaker, I rise in support of House Concurrent Resolution 296 authorizing use of the rotunda of the Capitol to honor the unknown American who gave his life while serving his country during the Vietnam conflict and who has been selected to be buried in the Tomb of the Unknown Soldier at the Arlington National Cemetery. The interment ceremony is scheduled for Memorial Day, May 28, 1984.

The Tomb of the Unknown Soldier is our Nation's most sacred national monument to those who served, fought, and died during World War I, World War II, the Korean conflict, and now the Vietnam war. Those brave men and women who gave their lives during these conflicts deserve the highest recognition and honor we can bestow upon them. We are now able to honor those who gave their lives in Southeast Asia and those still missing in action, by placing one of their fallen comrades-in-arms alongside the national heroes of previous wars at the Tomb of the Unknowns.

It is especially appropriate that the Unknown from the Vietnam war be honored in the rotunda of the Nation's Capitol. This is a deserved tribute on the part of all Americans to all of those who served in that long, anguished conflict and to the 2,500 American servicemen still missing in action in Southeast Asia.

This important occasion should renew our sense of obligation to all who have answered their country's call to service in time of war and heighten our dedication to be worthy of their sacrifices.●

● Mr. PATTERSON. Mr. Speaker, a fitting commemoration for the missing patriots of the Vietnam war.

Mr. Speaker, this Memorial Day will be very special. The remains of a young American soldier who died in Southeast Asia during the Vietnam war will be buried in the Memorial Amphitheater at Arlington National Cemetery. That Amphitheater is better known as the Tomb of the Unknown Soldier.

In 1973, Congress directed the Department of Defense to honor those Vietnam servicemen still missing in action by returning one of their number in the Memorial Amphitheater. Since then, our technology has enabled us to identify the remains of all Americans who came into the identification center in Honolulu. Now, after more than 10 years, the congressional directive will be fulfilled.

On May 17, 1984, the unknown soldier will be officially designated with great ceremony in Hawaii, where the remains are now located. The Navy, with a Coast Guard escort, will move the unknown soldier by ship from Hawaii to San Francisco, arriving there on May 24. The next day, the Air Force will fly the remains from Travis Air Force Base, near San Francisco, to Andrews Air Force Base, outside Washington, D.C. A ceremonial unit composed of members from each branch of the armed services will move the unknown soldier to the Capitol where he will lie in State. On Memorial Day, a procession will take the unknown soldier to Arlington National Cemetery. Duly appointed representatives from the House and Senate will be in attendance. Ultimately, the young man's remains will be interred and the ceremony will end—the symbolic conclusion of a tragic era in our history.

If I recall one thing from that era it is the statistics. The routine nightly broadcasts recounting the number of dead and missing. I used to imagine the families of the soldiers and how they must have felt when a news commentator reported that 147 more young men had perished. Commentators quickly reported the casualties on the other side like the results of some ghastly baseball game.

The statistics still haunt me: nearly 58,000 Americans died during the Vietnam war; over 2,400 Americans are listed as missing in action. I feel the horror of that war every time I think of the families or hear about another troubled Vietnam vet.

The ceremonies this Memorial Day will be a fitting commemoration to the patriots of the Vietnam war only if they stimulate our renewed commitment to the families of the dead and missing and to the Vietnam vets themselves. We must continue to work toward a full accounting of those 2,400 who are still missing in action. We must continue to provide educational, vocational, and health services for our Vietnam vets. Above all, we must not allow this country to suffer through another tragedy like Vietnam. Let us make this Memorial Day a time to remember.●

The concurrent resolution was agreed to.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

GENERAL LEAVE

Mr. WRIGHT. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that all Members may have 5 legislative days in which to extend their remarks on the subject of the concurrent resolution just agreed to.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Texas?

There was no objection.

AUTHORIZING THE PRESIDENT TO AWARD MEDAL OF HONOR TO UNKNOWN AMERICAN VIETNAM ERA VETERAN SELECTED FOR BURIAL AT ARLINGTON NATIONAL CEMETERY

Mr. PRICE. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the Committee on Armed Services be discharged from further consideration of the bill (H.R. 5515) to authorize the President to award the Medal of Honor to the unknown American who lost his life while serving in the Armed Forces of the United States in Southeast Asia during the Vietnam era and who has been selected to be buried in the Memorial Amphitheater at Arlington National Cemetery, and ask for its immediate consideration in the House.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Illinois?

Mr. DICKINSON. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, and I shall not object, I wonder if our chairman would explain what is contained in the resolution to be discussed.

Mr. PRICE. Mr. Speaker, H.R. 5515 is similar to acts approved in 1921, 1948, and 1957 authorizing awards of the Medal of Honor to unknown American servicemen who lost their lives in the First World War, the Second World War, and the Korean conflict. H.R. 5515 would recognize the gallantry of members of the Armed Forces of the United States who gave their lives in Southeast Asia.

This Vietnam Unknown Soldier will be officially designated on May 17, 1984, in Hawaii, where the remains are now located. Following the ceremonies in Hawaii, the Navy, with a Coast Guard escort, will move the Unknown Soldier by ship to San Francisco. The Air Force will then fly the Unknown Soldier to Washington, D.C. A multiservice ceremonial unit will move the Unknown Soldier to the Capitol to lie in state. Finally, on Memorial Day a procession will take the Unknown Soldier to Arlington National Cemetery for interment at the Tomb of the Unknowns.

If authorized by the Congress, the medal would be presented in connection with the interment ceremony on Memorial Day. For that to be possible, the Congress must act without delay.

Mr. DICKINSON. Mr. Speaker, further reserving the right to object, let me say that:

I wholeheartedly support this bill, and endorse what the chairman has just said about it. This particular recognition of those who made the supreme sacrifice in Southeast Asia has been a long time in coming.

We should note, however, that this is the first time the Department of Defense has been confronted with remains that are identifiable only to the extent of being those of an American serviceman killed in Southeast Asia. The Department has been properly reluctant to give up efforts to identify all the remains it recovers.

Now that it is clear that we are unable to identify this unknown American, we can with assurance move swiftly to honor him and all those he represents.

And so I join with the chairman in urging my colleagues in the House to support passage of H.R. 5515.

Mr. Speaker, I withdraw my reservation of objection.

● Mr. DICKINSON. Mr. Speaker, the history of the Unknown Soldier is now a long one. It began in 1921, when the Congress authorized the selection of an unidentified American soldier to receive national honors as a representative of all American soldiers who died in the First World War. The tradition was continued in 1948 and in 1957 for the Second World War and the Korean conflict. In 1973, the Congress authorized the designation of an Unknown Soldier of the Vietnam conflict. Remains have now been selected for that designation, and the Unknown Soldier of the Vietnam conflict may be laid to rest with appropriate honors.

I wholeheartedly support H.R. 5515. This particular recognition of those who made the supreme sacrifice in Southeast Asia has been a long time in coming. It should be noted, however, that this is the first time the Department of Defense has been confronted with remains that are identifiable only to the extent of being those of an American serviceman killed in Southeast Asia. The Department has been properly reluctant to give up efforts to identify all the remains it recovers.

It is unfortunate that the effort to identify this brave American has been unsuccessful. But now that it is clear that we are unable to identify him, we can with assurance move swiftly to honor him and all those he represents. I can think of no honor more fitting than the Medal of Honor, to be awarded to the Unknown Soldier as the representative of all those who served their country so bravely in Southeast Asia.●

● Mr. HILLIS. Mr. Speaker, the designation of an Unknown Soldier for interment in the Memorial Amphitheater of the Arlington National Cemetery is a highly symbolic event. It honors not only the unidentified serviceman whose remains are designated but also all those servicemen whose remains have gone unrecovered or unidentified.

The award of the Medal of Honor to the Unknown Soldier is yet more symbolic. By honoring the gallantry of the Unknown Soldier we honor as well the distinguished service of all who served this Nation in Southeast Asia during the Vietnam conflict. This Medal of Honor is a fitting measure of the esteem in which a grateful nation holds not only those who gave their lives but also those many others who served so unselfishly.

Let all those who served this Nation in Southeast Asia during the Vietnam conflict and all those whose loved ones sacrificed their lives in that war view the ceremonies this coming Memorial Day as tribute not to one but to all.

It is of the utmost importance that H.R. 5515 be enacted without delay, so that the Unknown Soldier and all those he represents may be honored this Memorial Day.●

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Illinois?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

H.R. 5515

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the President may award, and present in the name of Congress, the Medal of Honor to the unknown American who lost his life while serving in Southeast Asia during the Vietnam era as a member of the Armed Forces of the United States and who has been selected to lie buried in the Memorial Amphitheater of the National Cemetery at Arlington, Virginia, as authorized by section 9 of the National Cemeteries Act of 1973 (Public Law 93-43).

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

GENERAL LEAVE

Mr. PRICE. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that all Members may have 5 additional days in which to revise and extend their remarks and to include extraneous matter on H.R. 5515, the bill just passed.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Illinois?

There was no objection.

EL CINCO DE MAYO

(Mr. McNULTY asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. McNULTY. Mr. Speaker, I rise in recognition of the 122d anniversary of the battle De Puebla, Mexico, in which a small but determined and inspired group of Mexican fighters fought and defeated the French Army, which eventually led to Mexico's independence from France. The event is commemorated in Mexico and the Southwestern United States as "El Cinco De Mayo"—the 5th of May.

It is appropriate today that we salute the people of the Republic of Mexico for the tremendous success they have achieved as President Miguel de la Madrid strives to bring that nation back from the brink of economic disaster. His Presidency inherited the most serious political and economic crisis since the revolution of 1910.

We should be proud of our southern neighbor's continuing fight for economic independence which is coming about thanks to considerable sacrifice on the part of the Mexican people. Today, her inflation rate has been cut in half, she has renegotiated her international debt, and integrity and trust are being restored in her Presidency. Mexico can look forward to advocating, leading, and setting a model for the rest of the developing Third World.

I urge my colleagues to join me in honoring Mexico's continuing independence.

"Que viva Presidente de la Madrid."

"Que viva Mexico y su gente."

"Viva Los Estados Unidos."

WE CAN DO SOMETHING ABOUT HIGH INTEREST RATES

(Mr. TAUZIN asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. TAUZIN. Mr. Speaker, interest rates are too high and they are going up again. We have just seen the first negative results, I believe, in the drop in the index of leading economic indicators.

It is time for this Congress to do something about high interest. We obviously are not doing a great job controlling Federal spending and borrowing, but we still can do something about high interest rates.

This month a number of my colleagues will join with me in offering a bill to give every American a chance to earn a significant amount of tax-free interest, provided that interest is earned in the traditional passbook account. Among this bill's purposes and its many good results is the aim of reducing the high cost of money in America's lending and savings institutions, now estimated at 10 percent, and dramatically improving America's low savings rate which, by the way, for 1983 was 4.8 percent, the lowest since 1929.

If we can cut the cost of money to our savings institutions, we can cut the high mortgage rates down to size, and we can do it by giving every American a chance to earn some tax-free income in a passbook savings account.

NO MORE CUBAS IN THE WESTERN HEMISPHERE

(Mr. DANIEL asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. DANIEL. Mr. Speaker, I cannot let go unchallenged remarks attributed to some of our colleagues. These statements, made subsequent to visits to Latin America, lead me to believe that some of these Members visited a Central America far removed from that which I visited in mid-April.

As chairman of the Readiness Subcommittee, I walked the areas where we have put up temporary structures and airfields to support maneuvers in Honduras. Plainly, they meet, but do not exceed, the regulatory requirement of minimum and essential construction for military training exercises.

I can tell you that I approached the first site with the thought I had stepped backward in time. The structures—one could scarcely call them buildings—were almost identical to the ones in which I lived during my stint with the Civilian Conservation Corps. They in no way resembled the kinds of permanent buildings we regularly erect when it is our intent to become a permanent presence.

I invite those who have an interest to visit those places and draw their own conclusions.

If we are to debate the issue, let it be on the merits of whether we believe it is appropriate to assist the weakened nations of Central America in their fight against imported totalitarianism; let us not muddy the waters with opinions on the architecture, or conjecture on its use.

"No more Vietnams" has become an overworked phrase of our times. Let this President, and whomever the next President might be announce to the world there will be no more Cubas in the Western Hemisphere. Then all of us can make our own decision as to where we come down on the issue.

AUTO COMPANY EXECUTIVE BONUSES ARE AN AFFRONT

(Mr. DURBIN asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute.)

Mr. DURBIN. Mr. Speaker, the multimillion-dollar bonuses which have been given to American automobile company executives are an affront to consumers who have been asked to pay higher prices for cars, and for plantworkers who have been asked to do without pay raises to save their companies.

During the Kennedy administration, the President called the leaders of the steel industry into his office to let them know that their corporate decisions were not in the best interests of the United States. I think President Reagan should call the presidents of the major automobile companies in the United States into the Oval Office for some straight talk.

Government help to the automobile industry was meant to give them an opportunity to get their companies back on their feet, put people back to work, and to make sure that our cars were more competitive with the Japanese. It was never meant to give these indefensible corporate bonuses.

THE EDUCATION FOR GIFTED AND TALENTED CHILDREN AND YOUTH IMPROVEMENT ACT OF 1984

(Mr. MURPHY asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. MURPHY. Mr. Speaker, today I am pleased to introduce along with my colleagues the Education for Gifted and Talented Children Youth Improvement Act of 1984. This legislation will launch a national effort to assist States in maximizing public and private resources and talents to develop, expand, and improve educational opportunities for gifted and talented students. While the Congress has over the past decades, developed, defined, and maintained Federal roles for various students with unique learning needs, there is at present no Federal leadership directed at improving educational opportunities for gifted and talented youth and children. The modest Federal role that this legislation provides is designed to fill that gap. The National Commission on Excellence in Education calls upon our Federal Government in cooperation with our State and local government, private enterprise, and our American citizens to share the responsibility for improving education. This gifted and talented legislation will provide the limited Federal role that the Commission on Excellence in Education recommends.

FINAL REPORT OF THE "NEW IRELAND FORUM"

(Mr. DONNELLY asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. DONNELLY. Mr. Speaker, yesterday was an historic day in the search for a just and lasting peace in Northern Ireland.

The "New Ireland Forum" published its final report, recommending specific steps that can be taken to bring peace and reconciliation to Ulster.

The report recognizes the need to respect the rights, the preferences, and the loyalties of all parties to the long and bitter conflict.

Much hard work and soul-searching has gone into the Forum's report. Much more remains ahead before the consent of all parties can be achieved.

I applaud the courageous work of the Forum's members, and urge the British Government and all the parties in Northern Ireland to carefully consider the Forum's work in the spirit it is presented—a good-faith effort to find a peaceful, political, democratic solution to the bitterness and violence.

Fifty-two members of this House have now agreed to cosponsor the resolution presented by the distinguished majority whip, Mr. FOLEY, and myself endorsing the effort of the forum and urging careful consideration of their report. I urge the other Members of this House to join us as cosponsors of House Concurrent Resolution 276.

WEST VIRGINIA JOINS IN CELEBRATING NATIONAL NURSES WEEK

(Mr. STAGGERS asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. STAGGERS. Mr. Speaker, this week we are paying a special salute to the nurses across America. National Nurses Week, highlighted by National Nurses Day this Sunday, is a fitting tribute to the largely unsung heroines and heroes of American medicine.

In West Virginia, we are blessed with nearly 15,000 nurses statewide. This important group of professionals provides vital life-saving services. They put in long hours and work hard serving the health needs of all citizens.

In our veterans centers, in our community hospitals and clinics, and in the home, this special group of individuals is working to make a difference in the lives they touch. In setting aside this special time to acknowledge the contribution made by the nurses of our communities and across the Nation, we are saying that their hard work is appreciated not just this one week, but every day of the year.

Additionally, the contribution made by groups such as the West Virginia Nurses' Association, on the State level, and the American Nurses' Association, on the national level, is significant. The legislative initiatives promoted by these groups have demonstrated a dedication to vision and innovation. The substantial recommendations made by these organizations have provided the Congress with valuable insight into the impact of legislation being debated in the Congress.

I join in saluting the nurses of America, during this their special week.

THE VULNERABILITY OF THE MX MISSILE

(Mr. PENNY asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. PENNY. Mr. Speaker, I believe in a strong defense and recognize that the United States must maintain a stable deterrent—a nuclear arsenal powerful enough to discourage anyone else from using nuclear weapons. But effective deterrence requires stability. The MX missile will not increase stability, because it is a destabilizing first strike weapon and it is vulnerable to attack.

Since development of this system began, dozens of basing modes have been considered and rejected. More than $1 billion have been spent to find this missile a home. Now the decision has been made to place the MX in the same vulnerable silos which were the source of the problem in the first place. This is money literally down the tubes.

Last year despite strong, bipartisan opposition, money for the first 21 weapons was appropriated. This year President Reagan has requested $5 billion for the next 40 missiles. The total cost of this system may approach $30 billion.

I believe that we can preserve America's deterrent strength and maintain our military capability without the MX missile. When it comes to matters of defense spending, we must make wise decisions. While fighting the problems of a huge Federal deficit, all areas of spending must be carefully evaluated. Therefore, this body must choose what we can afford and what we need. This country neither needs nor can it afford to waste billions on an unnecessary and destabilizing weapons system.

I urge my colleagues to vote against this year's funding request.

THE ALARMING TREND TOWARD HIGHER INTEREST RATES

(Mr. SLATTERY asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. SLATTERY. Mr. Speaker, I rise today to draw my colleagues' attention to some news that I feel should be alarming to all of us. Interest rates in this country are rising, and rising rather dramatically.

Today the 90-day T-bill rate is 9.68 percent; a year ago it was 8.04 percent. The prime rate today is 12 percent; 1 year ago it was 10.5 percent. Mortgage rates today are 13.73 percent, and a year ago mortgage rates were 12.75 percent. The municipal bond rate today is 9.94 percent, and a year ago the rate was 8.78 percent.

Interest rates are rising, Mr. Speaker, because of our Nation's huge deficit. The 3-year $150 billion downpayment plan that has been much discussed is a political cop-out. It is just simply not enough. Now is the time for all of us to take decisive action if we want to prevent another round of high interest rates which will be devastating to our farmers, home builders, small businessmen, and businesswomen.

Mr. Speaker, I think it is absolutely essential for us in the remaining weeks of this session to dramatically reduce the deficit by at least $220 billion over the next 3 years.

AMERICA CONTINUES ITS ROMANCE WITH THE AUTOMOBILE

(Mr. ROEMER asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. ROEMER. Mr. Speaker, in love with the automobile in America. For two generations Americans have been in love with the car, and although the ardor has cooled, the central romance has continued.

Add to that the importance of the automobile industry to jobs in our country, and it should surprise no one that the administration has rediscovered the car.

Headlines abound that auto quotas are bad. What took them so long?

The administration's current policies are wrong. Bad politics, worse economics.

Current policy emphasizes arbitrary quotas and denies long-term domestic content. These policies work a tremendous economic hardship on the American consumer, allow current manufacturers an ad hoc oligopoly, and put no pressure on foreign manufacturers to follow their products to America.

For more than 2 years, I and others have advised the administration to revise current policy.

Let me say it again publicly. Wise economics and sound politics demand a quota-free marketplace combined with a transition toward majority domestic content. It will work to the benefit of the consumer, the worker, and the manufacturer.

Mr. Speaker, we are talking love again.

THE NATIONAL HEALTH SERVICE CORPS

(Mr. RICHARDSON asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. RICHARDSON. Mr. Speaker, I rise today to ask for my colleagues' support for legislation I have just introduced to reauthorize the National Health Service Corps. I would like to extend my appreciation to Congressman HENRY WAXMAN, the able chairman of the Subcommittee on Health and the Environment for his hard work and skilled leadership in this important health care area.

The National Health Service Corps provides medical personnel to health manpower shortage areas. These young doctors, in return for Government scholarship aid, make a commitment to serve in a health care clinic in one of these medically underserved areas for a limited period of time. The clinics then pay back the Government for its costs in educating the individual in addition to a salary.

Nationwide there are over 500 of these small National Health Service Corps clinics and there are 28 of them in New Mexico.

This is a vitally needed national program that makes a major difference in the lives of over 100,000 New Mexicans in my district who depend on these clinics for their principal source of health care.

I would remind my colleagues that this is the program the Reagan administration tried to kill last year by imposing a new, onerous payback policy that would have forced them to close their doors. But the Congress, in a sharp rebuke to the White House, approved my legislation which reversed the administration's policy.

This new legislation which I have introduced not only assures that these clinics' doors will remain open, but that the entire program will be strengthened in the years ahead by authorizing 2,200 new medical scholarships for young doctors. As a result, many of these doctors will be serving the people in my district in northern New Mexico in the 1990's. There have been virtually no new National Health Service Corps scholarships since President Reagan took office and without any new doctors in the pipeline, this valuable program would eventually die. I do not believe the Congress will permit that to happen.

There are many of us in the Congress who believe there is a rather positive role for the Federal Government in seeing that some measure of justice and fairness is insured in the way the Federal budget is divided and in the way Government does its work. The National Health Service Corps is a classic, textbook example of commonsense government at its best. A high percentage of the patients who use these rural health care clinics are older Americans living on small fixed incomes who have chronic health problems. This legislation benefits not only my State of New Mexico, but the Nation as a whole. It is a creative, low cost, sensible way to successfully deliver quality health care to those in need.

I urge my colleagues to support this important legislation.

NICARAGUAN MOTHERS' SIGNATURE BOOK

(Mr. DELLUMS asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. DELLUMS. Mr. Speaker, in June of last year, a group of American women visiting Nicaragua was given a signature book. This book contains over 2,000 signatures of Nicaraguan women who lost loved ones in the war against Somoza and in the continuing war against the Contras. The Nicaraguan women asked that the book be presented to the Congress of the United States of America as a symbol of their suffering and as a plea to the United States to stop the aggression against their country.

These signatures remind us of the human aspect of war. Sometimes, I think we forget that our millions of dollars in military aid result in the deaths of sons, daughters, husbands, wives, mothers, fathers, and other loved ones. A Nicaraguan mother who lost two sons said, and I quote:

As a mother suffering for her children, I ask you to take the message to Mr. Reagan and ask him to leave us in peace. We've already cried a lot for our children * * * so we as mothers ask you to tell your country and your people that here we see thousands of mothers asking that there be peace.

I would ask my colleagues to weigh this cry for peace. I am placing the signature book in the Speaker's lobby for your review. A letter to us accompanies the book and is worthy of your attention. The book will be in the lobby until the end of next week's legislative session. I urge all of my colleagues to read the letter and review the book.

FIFTY DAYS OF SILENCE

(Mr. MICHEL asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. MICHEL. Mr. Speaker, for 50 consecutive days now that we have been in session, Members of the minority have asked the majority leadership to provide clearance for various unanimous-consent requests. Those requests have dealt with a variety of issues, ranging from permitting voluntary school prayer to a line item veto. These requests have been greeted by 50 consecutive days of silence from the majority.

Now, we have all heard about the silent majority, but this is rather ridiculous. The majority leadership reacts like Charlie McCarthy without Edgar Bergen.

The silence which greets requests from our side says a lot. Members of this body who want to debate issues, who want to vote on issues, cannot. Members of our minority are muzzled, and because they are, so are millions of Americans.

Mr. Speaker, we were sent here to work, not wait. We were sent here to vote, not vacillate. We were sent here to deal with issues, not defer them.

We Republicans do not want to wait for the Democratic Convention to dictate our legislative agenda, and let us not let the California primary dictate immigration policy.

We are legislators, not the lackeys of campaign consultants.

THE DIFFERENCE BETWEEN AMERICAN AND SOVIET POLICIES

(Mr. BETHUNE asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. BETHUNE. Mr. Speaker, when the President sent the Marines and the Rangers into Grenada to liberate the Grenadians and free the medical students, many liberals were quick to criticize and often they used as the centerpiece of their argument that they were concerned that this country was becoming like the Soviets in Afghanistan.

Well, let us look at the record just a minute. The Soviets have been in Afghanistan for more than 4 years and they are still there. There are over 150,000 combat troops there. The government is in control, the Soviet Union, and just this week they launched a new offensive, high-altitude bombing, a major offensive through the Panjur Valley, where they are wreaking havoc on the poor Afghans.

Contrast that, if you will, the United States was in Grenada for 2 months, 7,500 troops and now out, a few MP's and Coast Guard there to help train the Grenadians, almost universal acceptance by the Grenadians, even sold out of T shirts that say "God Bless America."

Just recently, a couple of days ago, it was May Day. We need to remember the lesson of Hanna Aaron, who wrote the great book on totalitarianism, that totalitarian governments cannot survive without exterior expansion.

Now, I ask my naive liberal colleagues who were making their points and who were the nay sayers on Grenada, are you still really worried that the United States is like the Soviets in Afghanistan?

CONGRESS SHOULD AMEND TITLE IX OF 1972 EDUCATION AMENDMENTS

(Mr. COLEMAN of Missouri asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. COLEMAN of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, 11 years ago, it was an accepted practice for many colleges and universities to require female applicants to score higher on their entrance exams than their male counterparts in order to get into school. Athletic scholarships were for men only. Female students were strongly advised to pursue "women's fields" and leave math, science, law, and medicine to men. Female professors were paid far less than their male counterparts.

In short, Mr. Speaker, educational institutions discouraged women from getting the opportunities they needed to have an equal opportunity to succeed in our society.

But 11 years ago Congress passed title IX of the 1972 Education Amendments, and the results have been significant. Women are studying professional and technical fields in far greater numbers. Athletic scholarships for women have grown to over 10,000 per year. Female professors are no longer denied paying positions.

The formula for title IX is simple; if an institution fails to end discriminatory policies, it faces a total cutoff of Federal funds, including student loan assistance.

We have made a great deal of progress in ending gender-based discrimination since title IX became law, but a Supreme Court decision earlier this year threatens this progress. In deciding Grove City against Bell, the Court severely restricts the scope and effectiveness of title IX, making a significant cutoff of funds to a violator institution all but impossible. Congress should take immediate action to restore this legislation.

The language that the Court found wanting is the exact same language in legislation guaranteeing equal opportunities and access for senior citizens, minorities, and the handicapped. Laws guaranteeing these rights are now vulnerable as well.

Together with colleagues from both sides of the aisle, I have introduced legislation to amend title IX to satisfy the Court so that title IX enforcement can continue today as it has for the last decade.

During past debates on women's issues, everyone has professed their commitment to equality for women, even if they have opposed measures on other grounds. There can be no equivocating on this issue. Title IX works for women by mandating equal treatment. We should take action now to make sure that it continues.

FORFEITURE REFORM WOULD REDUCE DRUG TRAFFICKING

(Mr. DANIEL B. CRANE asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. DANIEL B. CRANE. Mr. Speaker, drug trafficking has become a major problem in every State, county, and city of this great Nation. This problem reaches into the homes of the rich as well as the poor; and something must be done to curtail this epidemic.

Boats seized from drug traffickers by the Federal Government are usually vandalized and looted by criminals before they have to be sunk in the river. The hundreds of seized and rotting vessels, aircraft and autos are a national embarrassment because the law now prevents Government officials from confiscating and selling the vehicles intact until after conviction and by then they are usually worthless.

Forfeiture reform, which would correct the current problems in our law enforcement tool of forfeiture are contained in S. 1762. This is the single most important legislative tool before us to reduce the drug trafficking into every congressional district. The only way to reduce drug trafficking is to take the profit out of the crime. To reach this result, forfeiture allows the Government to seize the assets used to commit the crime and those assets which are the criminal's illegal profits.

We cannot enforce this punishment correctly as long as current procedures are so inefficient and time consuming that the assets rot in the interim.

Forfeiture reform is just one of the many desperately needed reforms that are in the President's Comprehensive Crime Control Act. The American people deserve this reform measure today.

ACID RAIN

(Mr. GREGG asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. GREGG. Mr. Speaker, political positioning has claimed acid rain control legislation as its most recent victim. Yesterday's defeat of H.R. 3400 on a 10 to 9 vote in the Subcommittee on Health and Environment of the full Committee on Commerce and Energy was a defeat for the health of this country. This vote is an unfortunate example of the regional trench warfare that has prevented us from conducting constructive dialog on the issue of acid rain.

Is it not time that we acknowledged that acid rain is one of the Nation's most pressing environmental probelms? Unfortunately, we have not acknowledged that in this House today. The environment is too precious to squander and yet this House appears to have decided to do so.

THE OMNIBUS CRIME BILL

(Mr. SAWYER asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. SAWYER. Mr. Speaker, today Americans consider crime to be one of the most crucial issues affecting their lives. It has taken nearly 14 years, but finally the Senate has adopted the initiative and enacted a major omnibus crime bill, comprising some 44 different sections. It passed the Senate 91 to 1 on a strictly bipartisan basis; however, if the House leadership has its way, the House will never get to vote on this issue and it will die before it is ever born.

A number, a handful I might say, of subcommittee chairmen are exercising their power to keep the House from ever having an opportunity to vote on this bill.

I urge the Democratic leadership to intervene, because these Members and I am sure their districts are no freer of crime than many of the rest of us.

This is an urgently needed bill. I think refusing to allow the House to vote on this issue is in itself a crime.

DIPLOMATIC IMMUNITY SHOULD NOT MEAN DIPLOMATIC IMPUNITY

(Mr. MARLENEE asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. MARLENEE. Mr. Speaker, yesterday one of my staffers was run off the road by a driver who made an illegal lane change. Damage to my staffer's car will probably total $200. The D.C. police would not even investigate, respond or come to the scene of the accident.

What recourse does my staffer have? None.

This wild driver was a diplomat from the French Embassy. The police couldn't write the diplomat a ticket, nor would the police even come investigate the accident. Diplomatic immunity should not mean diplomatic impunity.

Somehow, someway, there should be a method developed which at very least investigates and records these diplomat-caused accidents. We do not have to prosecute, but we should keep records. At the end of a year these records should be examined. Perhaps those diplomats who have trouble operating a motor vehicle in this country without running everyone else off the road could be given a warning to either learn how to drive or take a taxi.

ANOTHER DELAY?

(Mr. DREIER of California asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. DREIER of California. Mr. Speaker, I take the well to inform you that my constituents are going to be angry—very angry. There is a report in today's Washingon Post that you have once again delayed floor action on the immigration bill. This time until after the June primary elections in California.

Perhaps the Speaker still does not realize how important this issue is to California. But what I find to be even more disturbing is the fact that it was my own California colleagues from the other side of the aisle that requested this delay. This is most interesting considering the fact that their Presidential primary will probably be sewn up by then, and thanks to their diligent efforts during the reapportionment process, it appears that not one of them faces serious election threats.

Until now I was telling my constituents that action was being delayed because the national democrat leadership just did not understand the real concerns of the Southwest. How am I going to explain that it seems fellow Californians are now prompting the delay?

Can anyone seriously believe that we will have time between mid-June and adjournment to consider this issue fully? Does the Speaker have a particular time in mind? I need to know, Mr. Speaker, because my constituents are going to want to know.

REPLACEMENT OF VITAL LOCKS AND DAMS ON THE OHIO RIVER

(Mr. McEWEN asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. McEWEN. Mr. Speaker, last Friday, yet another accident at the locks and dam at Gallipolis has interrupted the flow of vital commerce up and down the entire Ohio River system. Consumers and jobs dependent on the Ohio River for the delivery of goods and products are now faced with two poor options:

First, the main locks can be closed for 30 days while the faulty gate is repaired. This would require tows and boats to use the much smaller auxiliary gates, this would back up and delay traffic and in some instances require the costly dismantling of larger barges so they can fit through the small gate.

The other option is to replace the main gate with parts from the auxiliary gate. This, would mean that all traffic on the river will come to a halt for a week while this exchange is made.

During the past year, at least 12 such accidents have taken place at the Galliapolis locks, causing damage and halting traffic on the Ohio River system.

Every day that we here in Congress delay in authorizing the needed relacement of these vital locks on this one of the most important water transportation systems in the world—the Ohio River—we are costing consumers and our Nation time and money.

Let us act on Congressman ROE's water authorization legislation before we recess this summer.

SCHEDULING OF IMMIGRATION LEGISLATION

(Mr. WRIGHT asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute.)

Mr. WRIGHT. Mr. Speaker, I take this time because the question was raised by one of the gentlemen who spoke just a moment ago with respect to the immigration bill and its scheduling for consideration on the House floor.

It is our purpose to schedule that bill for consideration during the week of June 11. We expect to devote the entire week to its consideration, Monday through Friday. Therefore, Members may expect to be here if they are interested in voting on the numerous amendments which may be made in order to that immigration legislation during the week of June 11.

And it is our full intent and specific purpose that at the conclusion of that week we shall vote on the bill, voting it up or down, but completing action on that bill before we go to any other matter.

MONDALE WON'T BITE THE BULLET

(Mr. THOMAS of California asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. THOMAS of California. Mr. Speaker, on February 12, 1983, Walter Mondale announced he was a candidate for President of the United States. In his announcement he said that he had the experience and the strength to deal with world leaders.

Candidate Mondale cannot even take the heat of pending immigration legislation in this House. The Speaker has put off consideration of the immigration bill until after the California primary.

Just disregard any publicly offered explanations for the delay. No California Democrats are in primary election trouble. Phil Burton made sure of that.

It is true, though, that the AFL-CIO supports the immigration bill and powerful Hispanic Members in this House from California oppose the immigration bill.

Candidate Mondale, despite his claimed superior experience and alleged resolute strength, wants no bullets to bite in the California primary on his way to the Democratic nomination. That is the real reason why this House will not consider immigration legislation until after the California primary.

All you Mondale supporters gather over there under the banner that reads, "Let's Put a Hypocrite in the White House."

SCHEDULING IMMIGRATION LEGISLATION

(Mr. LUNGREN asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. LUNGREN. Mr. Speaker, the issue of immigration has come up once again and it is very interesting that it has come up again. But I hope you do not mind if I do not hold my breath waiting for its actual action.

I was here a little over 2 years ago when we were given time from 10 at night to 2 in the morning to discuss this important issue, and because it was pushed down to the last week and 200 amendments were in order, it died of its own weight.

I was here when you, Mr. Speaker, told us in October of last year that this was not a national issue, there was no national problem, there was no national constituency for it.

I was here, Mr. Speaker, when you said in January you changed your mind and it was going to be one of the first things we would bring up this year.

I was here, Mr. Speaker, in February when we were told it was going to be the first thing we took up after the February break.

I was here, Mr. Speaker, just before Easter when we were told it was going to be the first thing brought up after Easter.

I was here when we were informed that it was going to be brought up the very first thing in May.

Mr. Speaker, I sat in a rules committee meeting 2 days ago when the gentleman from Texas (Mr. WRIGHT) informed us that it would be brought up the week of May 21 and we would have 2 weeks committed to it. In that same meeting, we were told we could not deal with it after those dates because there would not be time as we had all of the appropriation bills to consider.

Imagine my surprise, Mr. Speaker, when I opened up the paper today and found out that now you tell us that we will have to put it into that period when we have no time.

Mr. Speaker, it is a shame Mr. Mondale called you and asked you to put it off. I remember Mr. Mondale's speeches. He tells us he should be President of the United States because he is a leader.

Mr. Speaker, I would suggest that anybody that needs nighttime fiction reading ought to take Mr. Mondale's speeches to bed with them.

IMMIGRATION LEGISLATION

(Mr. SHAW asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. SHAW. Mr. Speaker, I would like to associate myself with the remarks of the gentleman from California (Mr. LUNGREN).

One of the greatest frustrations since first coming to this House is to see the shabby treatment which the majority party, the Democrat Party, has treated the borders of this country by continuously throwing ever possible block in front of a meaningful immigration bill for our country.

I would remind the Speaker in setting forth the policy of this House in the form of a schedule, that this is not a partisan issue. This is a carefully crafted, thought-out bill that was molded very very carefully in the Judiciary Committee by both the Democrat and Republican members working together.

Now that we are getting closer to election it does appear that it is becoming a more partisan issue. As we have seen the Democrat's Presidential roadshow rolling across this country like a bowl of loose jello, caving in on every issue of a local nature, we now see that this particular type or brand of politics is making its way into the scheduling of issues on the floor of the House of Representatives. This is not right.

The borders of this country are not a political issue. They are not to be made into a political football, even though this is an election year. This House has a responsibility to go forward with responsible legislation.

ACID RAIN LEGISLATION

(Mr. CONTE asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks and include extraneous matter.)

Mr. CONTE. Mr. Speaker, yesterday, a democratically controlled House subcommittee pulled the plug on acid rain legislation for the 98th Congress.

The approach advocated by the subcommittee chairman and the New England Congressional Caucus is a fair and good faith offer to our colleagues from the Midwest. The Conte/D'Amours bill (H.R. 4404) requires each region to pay its fair share of the total costs based on total sulfur dioxide emissions, the documented cause of acid rain. The victims of acid rain—my constituents in western Massachusetts—are willing to participate in a national cost-sharing program designed to spread out the costs of reduction.

Instead of working to develop an acceptable control program, the subcommittee rejected our offer, ignoring the mounting environmental damage caused by acid rain. Just this morning, the Springfield Union ran a front-page story on the effects of acid in the Quabbin Reservoir. A recent study found that feeder streams to the reservoir—which supply the city of Boston with drinking water—are "contaminated with such lethal levels of acidity that 100 percent of the fish died in an experiment conducted last month." I will include the full text of the article for the RECORD.

How long will the Congress wait before a control program is adopted? How long will the acid rain of terror ravage the environment? A democratically controlled subcommittee answered those questions yesterday.

[From the Springfield Morning Union, May 3, 1984]

TEST SHOWS HIGH ACIDITY KILLING FISH IN QUABBIN

(By Donna Parker)

BELCHERTOWN.—Feeder streams on the western border of Quabbin Reservoir are contaminated with such lethal levels of acidity that 100 percent of the fish died in an experiment conducted there last month.

The alarming results have prompted state Fishery and Wildlife researchers to investigate the survival rate of fish in the vast reservoir itself.

Early experiments at reservoir coves near the mouths of the streams found that 90 percent of the rainbow trout turned belly-up in less than six days.

"This experiment has proved conclusively that the western streams of the reservoir are toxic to the rainbow trout, and that increased acidity has created toxic zones in the reservoir," reported Dick Keller aquatic biologist for the state Fishery and Wildlife Division, Wednesday.

The killer streams cited by Keller included Cadwell Creek, Army Camp, Gulf, Atherton, Cobb, and Briggs brooks, and the western arm of the Swift River.

Keller said that these streams are typical of an estimated 20 percent of the streams in the state judged to have critically high acid levels.

A healthy stream normally has a ph level of 6 to 7.5, while a ph level of 5 is considered toxic to fish. High acidity in the streams surveyed reduced ph levels to as low as 4, Keller said.

"This experiment was a very good indication of the impact of acid rain on our streams," he said.

In a separate survey, it was found that the upper Millers River and its feeder streams in the Wendell and Orange area have lost all non-game species due to a total loss of alkalinity in the water.

The Chicopee, Blackstone and Nashua Rivers are slated for similar studies.

However, Keller was more alarmed by the toxic effects the contaminated water had on fish even when diluted in the 800 million gallons of reservoir water.

"I expected the fish to die in the streams. I did not expect them to die in the coves," he said.

The study was prompted by a severe drop in the number of rainbow trout caught at Quabbin Reservoir in the past two years.

Normally, the state stocks the reservoir with 15,000 rainbows, and 25 percent are retrieved by anglers annually. However, since 1981, only 10 percent of the fish have been caught.

"We wanted to find out if the diminished numbers were caused by increased predation or increased acidity," he said.

Researchers placed 1,500 fish in porous cages sited in feeder streams and reservoir coves last month when acidity levels are normally high from increased spring rainfall.

The results, yet to be published, showed that increased acidity and aluminum content in the water caused severe gill irritation, killing the fish.

Aluminum levels, lethal to fish at .1, were measured as high as .9 in some streams, Keller said.

"The aluminum is leached from the soil by increased acidity. When both are present in the water, the toxicity increases dramatically," he explained.

Keller fears that during the summer, the aluminum content settling on the bottom of the reservoir will be reactivated by the cooler water temperatures there, threatening the survival of species that live in all areas of the Quabbin.

THE NATIONAL COMMISSION TO PRESERVE SOCIAL SECURITY AND MEDICARE

(Mr. BOEHLERT asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. BOEHLERT. Mr. Speaker, the National Commission to Preserve

Social Security and Medicare—now that is a noble-sounding organization, and certainly the stated goal is worthy, one that we all share; preserving social security and medicare.

But when we pose questions about the organization and upon closer examination of what is being done to whom, a dark cloud hangs over the nobleness and worthiness associated with it. Millions of Americans across this country are being told, through a slick mail order house operation, that the way to save social security and medicare is to send $10 to some post office box.

Do not do it. Do not send your hard-earned money to this slick mail order operation. Congress has preserved social security because it was the right thing to do and Congress will preserve medicare because it is the right thing to do.

THIS IS A REDUCED DEFICIT

(Mr. BURTON of Indiana asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. BURTON of Indiana. Earlier today, the gentleman from Kansas complained about the high-interest rates and how they are going up. He further compared the current rates with last year's. He noted they are up slightly and we should be concerned about this. I wholeheartedly agree as do most Americans.

But what he failed to do was to tell you that 3½ years ago, when this administration took office, interest rates were at 21½ percent, and that was one of the main reasons we reached excessively high unemployment, because the previous administration did not pay attention to the economy and to the interest rates.

He also talked about the huge deficit and remarked something must be done to reduce it. He remarked, President Reagan's $148 billion downpayment is too little. But the Democrats have proposed very little as an alternative.

As a matter of fact, last year in this body, they voted for $49 billion more in spending than was finally realized. That means that instead of having an $180 billion deficit we would have had a $229 billion deficit had they had their way.

So I think the people of America should look to the Democratic Party for some leadership because they sure have not shown it thus far.

HOUSE SHOULD TAKE UP CRIME CONTROL ACT

(Mr. DAUB asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to extend his remarks.)

Mr. DAUB. Mr. Speaker, a Comprehensive Crime Control Act was introduced in the House and in the other body earlier last year and, as of today, only the other body has taken action on that important piece of legislation referred to as S. 1762.

The House version, H.R. 2151, languishes, bottled up in the Judiciary Committee with no action yet taken and no indication of hearings yet planned.

Mr. Speaker, I am concerned that the House may not view this legislation as an important item, important enough to warrant our prompt attention. Nothing should be further from the truth. Americans are concerned about serious crime and the Congress' seeming inability to deal with it effectively on this Federal level.

The reforms suggested in that Comprehensive Crime Control Act of 1983 would arm our Federal enforcement officials with the means to help protect the safety of our citizens more effectively.

We, in the House, the people's body, have a duty to debate and take action on the matter which is of great concern to our constituencies.

I hope my colleagues will join me in calling upon the chairman of the House Judiciary Committee to schedule hearings with an idea in mind to move this bill to the floor for a vote before the summer recess; bail reform, insanity defense, determinate sentencing, all very critical to better law enforcement in this America, and this House has it bottled up, and may it rest in peace in the Judiciary Committee.

AN ANNIVERSARY OF SORTS—AND THE LAMPREY EEL

(Mr. LOTT asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. LOTT. Mr. Speaker, today is an anniversary day—of sorts—but not one that provides much cause for celebration. The House has been in session now for some 52 days this year. During that time, we have passed a budget resolution and a couple of important measures, but not much else.

Earlier this week, the House acted on a bill to control the lamprey eel population in the Pere Marquette River, and I am hopeful that the other body will act on that measure soon.

But when it comes down to action on such measures as a balanced budget constitutional amendment, immigration reform, criminal law reform, or consideration of the school prayer issue, somehow, the majority leadership just has not been able to find the time to schedule these important issues.

Time and time again, Republican Members have attempted to bring these issues to the floor for consideration, but each time they are met with a wall of silence from the majority leadership, reflecting an indifference to the demands of the majority of the American people who want this Congress to act on these issues.

Mr. Speaker, what is good for the lamprey eel is good for the American people. Let us bring these issues up for a vote. I applaud my colleagues' efforts to draw the attention of the American people to the inaction of this House on such critically important issues.

PRESIDENT REAGAN'S COMPREHENSIVE CRIME PACKAGE

(Mr. GEKAS asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. GEKAS. Mr. Speaker, nothing is more shocking to the American public than the spectacle of a known violent criminal or the drug-peddling felon to have been arrested and then to sit in jail for about 1 minute or 1 day at the most, and then be accorded bail and the day after to recommit the same type of offense for which he was arrested and put in prison awaiting trial.

We need in this Congress immediate action on bail reform. We want to end the practice of a known drug pusher going to jail for bail, paying what ever is necessary to get out on bail, and then fleeing the country altogether and never coming to trial or going back to his same business-as-usual practices of pushing that vile product and then going to jail again, and putting up bail, simply paying a fine; so to speak, or paying dues, so that he can keep on doing his evil business.

The President of the United States has offered a comprehensive crime package bill which includes bail reform in which the President insists that we ought to be tougher on these repeat criminals and to make bail tougher to obtain.

We need action on this and I urge the majority leadership to bring it to the floor. Thank you.

DAY OF RECKONING, BALANCED-BUDGET AMENDMENT IS COMING

(Mr. KASICH asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. KASICH. Mr. Speaker, soon the Senate is going to consider and pass a balanced budget amendment. Your time is coming. The day of reckoning will soon be here.

We will see if the born-again budget busters on the liberal side of the aisle translate their rhetoric into action.

Of course, if the majority is really concerned about deficits and balanced budgets, they would approve the unanimous-consent request and bring the amendment to the floor immediately.

In fact, Mr. Speaker, I would like to make that request. The Chair has ruled that in order to make such a request, I have to have the clearance of the majority and minority leadership. I have obtained the clearance of the minority leadership and ask for the majority leadership to give us unanimous consent.

Mr. Speaker, of course I hear none.

The polls show that America certainly knows that the liberals are responsible for the massive national debt and the current high deficits. The American people know that the reelection strategy of the past 30 years of the liberals in this Congress to tax and spend, tax and spend for reelection must come to an end.

Concerning the balanced budget amendment, it will soon be here and the liberals in this House will be unable to hide behind their rhetoric any longer.

As for this side of the aisle, we have just begun to fight for the passage of the constitutional amendment to balance the Federal budget.

DEMOCRATS RESPONSIBLE FOR DELAYING AGENDA FOR AMERICA

(Mr. WALKER asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute.)

Mr. WALKER. Mr. Speaker, if out across this country a work supervisor asked an employee on 50 consecutive days to do something and for 50 consecutive days that employee refused, in most workplaces that would be grounds for firing the employee. Let us hope the same standard applies to this Congress.

There can be little doubt that our employers, the American people, want to see us act on a balanced budget, school prayer, and the line-item veto.

For 50 days some of us have been asking this House to do what our employers want. On 50 consecutive days this House has refused.

Maybe the only way to correct this kind of insubordination is to fire the people responsible come this November.

Let us be clear, it is not the Republicans who have been negligent. The Republican leadership made clear day after day they are willing to see these important matters debated. It is the Democrats and their leadership who are the negligent parties.

Finally, let me thank all of those who have come to the floor for the last several weeks asking the will of the American people be carried out.

Over the past 50 days we have seen a contrast between the political parties develop in this House: The Republicans who want to work on those kinds of things of great concern to the vast majority of the American people and the Democrats who do not want to go about such work.

ONE MINUTES NOT SUITABLE SUBSTITUTE FOR MAJOR LEGISLATION

(Mr. GINGRICH asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. GINGRICH. Mr. Speaker, I just want to comment that frankly, those of us on our side of the aisle would just as soon not give any more 1 minutes. We would love to have the Speaker decide that we represented a force as important as Big Labor or that we were as important as the front runner for the Democratic Presidential nomination. But when a bill can be written on Monday, taken to the Rules Committee on Tuesday, voted on on Wednesday because Big Labor wants it. When a major bill can be pulled because a Democratic front runner for the Presidency wants it and we cannot bring a constitutional amendment to require a balanced budget or a constitutional amendment to permit voluntary prayer or a very important package to stop crime and drug use in America, then we have no alternative except to come to the floor day after day and make sure the American people know that it is the Democratic leadership which on issue after issue does what the big bosses want and on issue after issue hides from the American peoples' true desires.

□ 1220

And we would hope the leadership would quit what they are doing, meet with us, work out a common schedule and let us have a decent, fair chance to pass the American people's agenda.

REPORT OF COMMODITY CREDIT CORPORATION FOR FISCAL YEAR 1983—MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES

The SPEAKER pro tempore laid before the House the following message from the President of the United States; which was read and, together with the accompanying papers, without objection, referred to the Committee on Agriculture:

(For message, see proceedings of the Senate of today, Thursday, May 3, 1984.)

FEDERAL RECLAMATION HYDROELECTRIC POWERPLANTS AUTHORIZATION ACT OF 1983

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Pursuant to House Resolution 491 and rule XXIII, the Chair declares the House in the Committee of the Whole House on the State of the Union for the consideration of the bill, H.R. 4275.

IN THE COMMITTEE OF THE WHOLE

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the State of the Union for the consideration of the bill (H.R. 4275) to authorize the Secretary of the Interior to construct, operate, and maintain hydroelectric powerplants at various existing water projects, and for other purposes, with Mr. FLIPPO in the chair.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. Pursuant to the rule, the first reading of the bill is dispensed with.

Under the rule, the gentleman from Arizona (Mr. UDALL) will be recognized for 30 minutes and the gentleman from Wyoming (Mr. CHENEY) will be recognized for 30 minutes.

The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Arizona (Mr. UDALL).

Mr. UDALL. Mr. Chairman, I yield myself such time as I may consume.

Mr. Chairman, I rise in support of H.R. 4275. The bill as reported by the Interior Committee contains two titles. Title I authorizes the construction of additional generating capacity at seven existing Bureau of Reclamation dams. This program would provide an additional 188 MW of clean, relatively inexpensive power.

Since the committee reported H.R. 4275, title I has become the subject of some controversy. Some of the projects are the subject of pending FERC applications. Others are in the midst of discussion about financing arrangements. Although I support the development of this additional capacity, and I believe that hydropower is an important component of our national energy mix, I am convinced that we should defer authorization of these seven projects for awhile. Therefore, I intend to offer an amendment at the appropriate time to strike title I and to proceed to consideration of the rest of the bill.

Title II of the bill contains a settlement of contract rights for power generated at the Hoover Dam, on the Colorado River. Hoover was authorized by Congress in 1928, and was originally known as the Boulder Canyon Dam. When it was constructed it was awesome, because of its massive size—600 feet—and because of the enormous amounts of power that it could generate and the water that could be stored in its reservoirs.

Today, more than 50 years later, Hoover is still an awesome structure. The benefits of its power system and its reservoir system are distributed to millions of people in the States of Arizona, California and Nevada.

In 1930, in order to guarantee the repayment of the Federal investment in Hoover Dam, the Secretary of the Interior solicited customers for the power to be generated there. Although the power was offered to many customers, the Metropolitan Water District, Southern California Edison, the cities of Los Angeles, Pasadena, Burbank, Glendale and the States of Arizona and Nevada signed up. In some cases, those customers had to agree to contracts for more power than they could actually use. They took that risk, and their repayment agreement enabled the United States to construct the project. Part of the agreement between the Government and the power customers was the original purchasers would be entitled to renewal of their contracts after the original 50-year period expires.

The reason we are here today is that those original contracts expire in 1987. In 1979 the Western Area Power Authority (WAPA) began the process of reallocating the power. In the course of the marketing process, a bitter fight erupted among the three States and the United States. California had one theory of how the power should be reallocated, Nevada and Arizona had another, and WAPA had a third strategy. The dispute was heightened by the filing of a lawsuit by Nevada in 1981. Arizona joined in, and today we are faced with a complex suit that threatens to disrupt the power future of customers in all three States.

Luckily, cool heads have prevailed, and the legislation before us represents a negotiated settlement of the legal issues involved in the power allocation program. As is the case in most compromises, no one gets exactly what he wanted: but all the parties get a fair share of the power, and a potentially lengthy, costly and very bitter lawsuit is avoided.

As a veteran of the Arizona-California wars, I can tell you very honestly that I am very relieved that we have been able to reach this settlement.

The agreement has several parts: First, the power from the existing capacity from Hoover is reallocated to the original purchasers. This fulfills the provision of the Boulder Canyon Project Act that guarantees a right of renewal to the original contractors.

Second, the bill authorizes the renovation of the existing generators at Hoover through an uprating program. The uprating will provide an additional 500 MW of power. This power will be allocated roughly equally among the three States.

In order to spread the benefits of Hoover power to more customers, the bill provides that California's share of the uprating (about 127 MW), may not be sold to customers that now receive 20 MW or more. That means that the city of Los Angeles and MWD will not be able to buy the new power. Instead, WAPA will market it to preference entities in California. Several municipalities, including Anaheim, Banning, Colton, Azusa, and Riverside have applied to WAPA for this power.

There has been considerable discussion over the financing of the uprating program. The bill now provides that funds may be advanced by the power purchasers, or appropriated by the Federal Government. Today, I will offer an amendment that deletes the authorization for Federal funds and says, instead, that funds shall be advanced by the purchasers. This is 100 percent of the costs. The power purchasers have agreed to this financing arrangement, they are capable of raising the moneys, and they will enter into contracts with the United States to advance costs. The contracts will provide for the repayment of the advanced funds, plus interest, from revenues generated by the uprated generators.

Third, the bill provides that power from the Navajo Generating Station in Page, Ariz., will be marketed first to the Arizona power customers. This marketing program is in accord with the proposed WAPA marketing criteria. The revenues from that power will assist the repayment of the central Arizona project, in accord with the provisons of the 1968 act that authorized the project.

The settlement contained herein is the result of many years of debate and negotiation. It is supported by the Governors of Nevada and Arizona, by all parties to the litigation, and by the Reagan administration. Although the bill is complex, I am convinced that it provides an equitable allocation of the Hoover resource among cutomers in the three States, and that it permits the Department of Energy to go forward with the contracts smoothly and without controversy. I urge your support of this settlement.

Mr. Chairman, I reserve the balance of my time.

□ 1230

Mr. CHENEY. Mr. Chairman, I yield myself such time as I may consume.

Mr. Chairman, I rise in support of H.R. 4275, the Federal Reclamation Hydroelectric Powerplants Authorization Act of 1983. As members know, the committee will offer amendments this morning to delete title I of the bill. I will focus my comments on title II, the amendments relating to Hoover Dam Powerplant.

Hoover Dam is one of the greatest American engineering achievements. The dam is one of the largest in the world, and controls for beneficial use one of our major rivers, providing flood control, irrigation water, power generation, recreation and other benefits to millions of Americans throughout the West. Ironically, when Hoover Dam was built, concern was expressed about the Federal Government's engineering ability to construct the project.

There were also doubts about the economic feasibility of Hoover Dam. To resolve these latter doubts, contracts for power were signed with various contractors, designed to recover the Federal Government's costs of construction, with interest. Contracts for power generation from Hoover Dam were signed in 1937, and will expire in 1987. These contracts have been fully performed. Under the original authorization, the Boulder Canyon contractors are entitled to renewals of their contracts—a statutory recognition of their investment in the facility. Contractors at Hoover Dam took power under contracts which required them to buy power even if they could not resell it.

When the time for renewal approached, the three lower basin States which had traditionally been served by the facility began to disagree about their relative shares of future output. At the same time, the Bureau of Reclamation, in a commendable manner, began to consider the proper method of modernizing the facilities at Hoover Dam Powerplant. The Bureau of Reclamation proposed to expand, or uprate, the power generation capacity at Hoover Dam.

After the inevitable law suits began, the parties recognized that a negotiated solution would better provide certainty with respect to the future use of Hoover Dam, and they negotiated such an agreement. The basic purpose of title II of H.R. 4275 is to ratify this agreement. Briefly, the agreement shares out power both from the original output and from the uprating, among various entities in Arizona, Nevada, and California. The parties are convinced, and the committee agreed, that this is a fair settlement of their legal rights under the original authorization for Hoover Dam. The administration supports this proposed compromise as well. After carefully reviewing the proposal, I believe it is fair to the parties, and fair to other sections of the country as well, and I am happy to support it.

Mr. UDALL. Mr. Chairman, I yield 3 minutes to the gentleman from California (Mr. MILLER).

Mr. MILLER of California. Mr. Chairman, I rise in support of the amendment by the gentlewoman, from California.

This amendment raises a very basic question about the proper management of our national resources.

Over the last several years, this Congress has told a lot of people in this country that the wastefulness, the largesse, the benefits of a generous past must change.

We have taken away services from senior citizens; food from children; funds from our schools; housing away from the poor.

Today the issue is whether we—in 1984—can continue to live as we did five decades ago, when the Hoover power was first allocated.

Fifty years ago, Franklin Roosevelt was President, gasoline was 25 cents a gallon, a candy bar was less than a nickle—and Hoover Dam power was contracted away at enormously subsidized rates.

The cost of that subsidy is staggering. Hoover power costs about a half-a-cent per kilowatt hour. Consumers who are not so fortunate to have a Hoover power contract pay 10 times that amount or more elsewhere in the Southwest.

But that subsidy is not free. It is paid for by the taxpayers represented by every Member of this house who are not Hoover customers.

The bill we are considering today would perpetuate that subsidy for another 30 years. In just the first decade of that extension, the cost to the taxpayers of the Nation would be $3.5 billion.

By what rationale should Southern California Edison, a private utility, continue to enjoy subsidized rates, while customers of San Diego Gas and Electric, also a public utility, pay 12 times as much?

Why should Los Angeles receive benefits, but San Francisco be prohibited from sharing in Hoover's power?

Why should the shares of Arizona and Nevada be increased, but nothing be allocated to New Mexico, Utah or Colorado?

The original customers claim a special right to renewed contracts because they supported the project during the early years, when the success of the Hoover project was in doubt. As the San Francisco Chronicle and Examiner noted recently, 50 years of preferential, subsidized power would seem an adequate appreciation for past loyalty.

Today, there are many other potential purchasers for this power, many willing to pay market price for the power.

We do not give away the public energy resources of the United States. We competitively lease our offshore tracts.

We do not give away our coal resources; yet some of those who castigated former Interior Secretary Watt for his failure to secure fair market value for coal now endorse this 30-year subsidy of hydroelectric power.

We do not give away irrigation or municipal water. In fact, this Congress recently enacted tough reforms to make irrigators pay the real cost of the water the Federal Government delivers to them.

So let us not make special rules for Hoover power contractors. We are not punishing or penalizing them by asking that they leave behind the power prices of the 1930's and enter the real world of the 1980's. We are not suggesting that they give up their right to Hoover power.

We only ask that they purchase power on the open market, through competitive bidding, and that they pay their own utility bills instead of passing along the multibillion-dollar cost of their subsidies to the other power users of the United States.

Mr. CHENEY. Mr. Chairman, I yield 7 minutes to the gentleman from Arizona (Mr. MCCAIN).

Mr. MCCAIN. Mr. Chairman, I rise in strong support of H.R. 4275, the Federal Reclamation Hydroelectric Powerplants Authorization Act of 1983. This legislation authorizes the Secretary of the Interior to construct, operate and maintain hydroelectric generating facilities in seven existing Bureau of Reclamation projects and it provides for the relocation of the output of Hoover Dam power.

Because of the growing need for the development of hydroelectric resources due to the rising cost of fossil and nuclear electrical generation, legislation was introduced in Congress in 1977 to authorize the Secretary of the Interior to construct additional generating units at several sites. Unfortunately, no action was taken.

Again in the 97th Congress legislation was introduced to expand power generation facilities at a number of existing reclamation projects, including Hoover Dam. At that time, however, the Hoover allottees in California, Arizona and Nevada were in disagreement as to the disposition of any additional power at Hoover. Therefore, the Hoover provision was dropped from the bill and the bill was not acted upon.

At the beginning of the 98th Congress interest was again focused on hydroelectric powerplants. Again the Bureau of Reclamation recommended rewinding or uprating the Hoover generators, along with the other essential replacement work at other Bureau projects.

Overlapping congressional efforts to authorize the hydroelectric facilities, the Western Area Administration, which is responsible for the marketing of power available to the United States from the Hoover Dam, the Navajo generating station and the Parker Davis project began developing criteria for the marketing of power from Hoover beyond the May 31, 1987, expiration date.

The original contracts commencing June 1, 1937, for a period of 50 years, allotted approximately 64 percent of Hoover power to users in California and 18 percent to each of the States Arizona and Nevada. In addition to the renewal of the contracts was the criteria for the marketing of the additional power which would be produced through the renovation or uprating program at Hoover. However, attempts to resolve the differences among the three States in determining the criteria resulted in bitter controversy, which has already been described by Chairman UDALL, which erupted and ended in a lawsuit in 1982. A settlement was urgent. Failure to reach one would result in lengthy and costly litigation, as well as an uncertain energy future for millions of American consumers.

Mr. Chairman, after a great deal of negotiation and compromise, an agreement was reached and is embodied in title II of this legislation. This legislation continues the authority which Congress reserved to itself in the Boulder Canyon Project Act of 1928 to prescribe terms and conditions for the renewal of Hoover power contracts.

Another major ingredient of this settlement relates to power surplus to the pumping needs of the Central Arizona project produced at the Navajo generating station in Arizona. This is to go initially to Arizona, as Arizona does not share as fully in firm Hoover power, and is expected to provide supplemental funds to assist in making possible the timely construction of the authorized Central Arizona project facilities.

This will permit the development of a plan for the optimization of the Navajo power resource and making supplemental funding for CAP available.

This legislation provides a significant step in the further development of the Nation's water resources through utilizing existing dams and reservoirs to maximize the efficient use of Federal facilities. I would like to at this time quote from a letter from the Department of the Interior, Office of the Secretary, addressed to Hon. MORRIS K. UDALL, and it states, in part:

"Mr. Chairman, we strongly support enactment of H.R. 4275, a bill to authorize the Secretary of the Interior to construct and operate and maintain hydroelectric powerplants a various existing water projects and for other purposes," if amendment as suggested.

The letter goes on to say that there are two areas which the Bureau would like to see amended. One, substitute Treasury market interest rate language for the interest rate provisions in the bill as exist. That will be addressed by an amendment which Congressman UDALL will propose, and a tax-exempt status to obligations issued to finance the Palisade power enlargement project. That will also be addressed by Congressman UDALL.

We in Arizona have paid for the projects; the users have paid for the projects, and will continue to pay for these projects. We understand the need to conserve energy. We understand the need that we cannot just expend any of our energy. The absolute requirement for this Nation to conserve our very scarce energy resources, particularly those that we obtain through the use of falling water, which is really the only clean and noncontroversial energy resource this Nation has.

Congressman UDALL will have an amendment which will impose strict conservation measures on the use of this power, and I believe that we will be able to attain that goal.

The American people do not need to be told of the need to conserve; they have seen utility rates go to 57 percent in the past decade, and I am convinced that the American people do not need to see further increases, particularly those who can least afford it, our elderly and poor and handicapped, because we are trying to impose some sort of free market value on the electricity which comes from the Hoover generating plant.

Mr. UDALL. Mr. Chairman, I yield 3 minutes to the gentleman from Arizona (Mr. MCNULTY).

Mr. MCNULTY. I thank the gentleman for yielding me this time.

Mr. Chairman, this bill, as it will be signficantly amended by the Udall amendment, is a prudent, intelligent and farsighted piece of legislation, and it ought to be passed. The Boxer amendment which will be proposed, ought to be defeated.

The premise of the Boxer amendment is that folks are not paying enough for electricity; the 10 million of them in the Southwest of America, and that consequently the power should be auctioned off to the highest bidder. The stockholders? I suggest not, but rather in increased rates.

You know, there is a place in California called Yosemite where people seek permits to visit and camp over weekends and more folks want to go there than there are permits. Now, if you want to follow this theory to its ultimate absurdity, we ought to auction off the permits to Yosemite and let the highest bidders have them.

We do not need the Boxer amendment, and we do not need arbitrarily to force higher prices for this electricity. This comes right out of the same school of thought that says that hardship is good for the character, so let's administer some.

I would urge all the Members to vote against the Boxer amendment to preserve the fragile but sensible compromise that has been worked out, especially insofar as the United States is an important part of this litigation which could be expensive and protracted.

Defeat the Boxer amendment.

Mr. CHENEY. Mr. Chairman. I yield 3 minutes to the gentlewoman from Nevada (Mrs. VUCANOVICH).

Mrs. VUCANOVICH. I thank the gentleman for yielding me this time.

Mr. Chairman, I rise in support of H.R. 4275, the Federal Reclamation Hydroelectric Powerplants Authorization Act. Title I of the bill would authorize construction of hydropower facilities at seven existing dams. Title II would provide for the uprating and allocation of power at Hoover Dam.

As maintained by previous speakers, an amendment will be offered to delete title I. So I will address title II.

I am sure there are few Members present today who are not familiar with the half century of courtroom battles over the allocation of the water from the lower Colorado River. I think that long and involved controversy provides the appropriate background for understanding the significance of the consensual agreement set forth in title II of H.R. 4275. That the three States, as well as the Federal agencies, are able to join in supporting the enactment of title II demonstrates that a lesson was learned from the battles over water in the lower Colorado River. Honorable agreement and compromise are far better than pursuing in the courts that illusory goal of complete victory.

I want to emphasize that the agreement represented by title II was not easily achieved and came about only because of the willingness of the parties to sit down at the negotiating table and hammer out their differences. But that conflict is now in the past. The important matter now is to get the bill passed, with title II in its present form, so that the parties involved can return to the negotiating table and begin the long process of working our specific power contracts prior to the 1987 deadline.

I urge my colleagues to join me in supporting this very important bill.

Mr. UDALL. Mr. Chairman, I yield 3 minutes to the gentleman from California (Mr. PATTERSON).

Mr. PATTERSON. Mr. Chairman, I rise to offer my support for H.R. 4275. The Federal Reclamation Hydroelectric Power Plants Authorization of 1984. Title II of this bill memorializes an agreement between Arizona, California, and Nevada regarding the supply of energy generated by the Hoover powerplant. There have been several years of litigation and debate over this issue, and I am pleased that these three great States have resolved their differences. I encourage all Members to support H.R. 4275.

However, I must oppose the amendment introduced by the gentlewoman from California. Although Congresswoman BOXER'S amedment is well intentioned, her amendment will do consumers a great disservice and set a sweeping precedent without the benefit of committee review.

For almost 50 years, the national policy for pricing Federal hydroelectric power has been based on the principle that prices must be the lowest possible consistent with sound business principles and the public interest. The Boxer amendment would undermine that policy by allowing the Federal Government to auction Hoover power to consumers at the highest possible price.

The Federal Government is not in the power business to make a profit at the expense of consumers. The primary purpose of the Federal hydropower program is not to maximize revenue at taxpayer's expense but to sell power at the lowest possible rates to consumers and recover the Government's investment and operating expenses. Selling Federal power at an artificial market rate would place an intolerable burden on consumers.

Based on 1982 sales to public bodies, costs to consumers would jump by an incredible 440 percent or nearly $2.2 billion a year. During the last decade, electricity rates have already increased over 57 percent. I have never received a constituent letter commending the cost of electricity, and I suspect that no other Member has either.

Jacking up the costs of Federal hydroelectric power can only discourage public utility companies from relying on one of nature's purest forms of energy. The Federal Power Act of 1920 makes no attempt to favor one region of the country over another. Rather, consumers in upstate New York, the Tennessee Valley, and in the West have all shared the benefits of cheap, clean, renewable hydropower. Hydropower is generated by falling water and is produced without dire public health and safety problems or adverse environmental consequences.

Ironically, supporters of the Boxer amendment are in fact arguing for a penalty to over 11 million consumers in only one region of the country—the Western United States. This kind of regional bias has no place in a body that is charged with the responsibility of representing the entire Nation. If supporters are serious about market pricing, then, this change in policy should be analyzed in a national context.

Finally, supporters of market pricing claim that increasing energy costs to consumers will stimulate conservation. I am in complete agreement that we need to encourage all energy users to be conservationists. The increased cost of electricity has already served to encourage consumers to conserve. The demand for electricity has been cut in half over the last few years and there is every indication that this trend will continue.

In my home State of California, this amendment will cause a dramatic increase in the cost of water to southern Californians and will jeopardize the water supply of northern Californians.

Mr. Chairman, I urge my colleagues to defeat this amendment.

Mr. CHENEY. Mr. Chairman, I yield such time as he may consume to the gentleman from Idaho (Mr. CRAIG).

Mr. CRAIG. I thank the gentleman for yielding.

Mr. Chairman, I stand in strong support of H.R. 4275, and also strongly oppose any amendment that would change major national policy without comprehensive hearings in the appropriate committees of this Congress.

Mr. CHENEY. Mr. Chairman, I yield 3 minutes to the gentleman from California (Mr. LAGOMARSINO), a member of the committee.

Mr. LAGOMARSINO. I thank the gentleman for yielding this time to me.

Mr. Chairman, I rise in strong support of H.R. 4275, the Federal Reclamation Hydroelectric Powerplants Authorization Act.

The primary component of this legislation is the authority to increase the hydroelectric power capacity at Hoover Dam. This amazing structure is one of the largest power production facilities in the world. It currently provides 1,450 megawatts of power to consumers in California, Nevada, and Arizona. However, increasing power demands, as well as the U.S. movement toward energy independence, dictates the need to expand this important and clean energy source.

An even more important aspect of this legislation, though, is the settlement of a longstanding dispute over the renewal rights to Hoover Dam power which is currently in litigation. The agreement contained in H.R. 4275 was carefully worked out and approved by the Hoover allottees and the Departments of Interior and Energy. In addition, the legislation was unanimously approved by the interior committee. Similar legislation has already passed the other body. It would be tragic to lose such a carefully crafted compromise through failure to enact this bill. The result would be prolonged litigation and the creation of uncertainty over future power supplies for the affected States and, no doubt, no increased power supplies for many years to come.

This legislation would also result in a substantial savings of oil each year. As a nation, we must work together to reduce our dependence on foreign oil supplies, especially given the volatile nature of the Mideast. Hydroelectric power is a clean, inexpensive, and more importantly, renewable, energy source. For these reasons, it is imperative that we expand the use of our water resources for hydroelectric generation.

I would also like to comment on the Boxer amendment or market pricing amendment to require the auctioning off of the uprated power capacity at Hoover Dam. At a time when we are all hearing complaints from our constituents about increasing utility rates, it would be tragic to demand higher rates for this power. This amendment would have a drastic impact on power consumers. In addition, as we all know, or I hope we do, the Federal Government is not in the power business to make a profit. This longstanding policy should definitely not be abandoned, especially at the expense of electric consumers, and especially without adequate hearing and consideration.

Before I close, I would like to compliment my colleague, MO UDALL, for the excellent job he has done on this bill. I know he has put in many hours of hard work to strike such a significant compromise.

Finally, I urge all of my colleagues to support this important energy legislation.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will advise the gentleman from Arizona (Mr. UDALL) that he has 13 minutes remaining.

Mr. UDALL. Mr. Chairman, I yield myself such time as I may consume.

Mr. Chairman, in my party in the Presidential campaign this year we have had a lot of argument about new ideas. Let me tell you about the lousiest new idea that has come along here in the last few weeks in Congress. It is called the Boxer amendment or, as somebody said, the Second Boxer Rebellion.

Suppose I came to you and said, "I have a great new idea."

"What is the great new idea, Udall?

"Well, the great new idea is, let us soak the electric power customers, the people whose home electricity bills have already gone up 50 or 60 percent in the last few years. Let us soak them for another $4½ billion in electric rates."

That is exactly what this amendment proposes. Some people say that the environmentalists want this amendment and some environmental groups do. They have the idea that somehow the way to save power or conserve power is to jack up the rates to customers. But when you have decided to lower the national debt by generating more money back for Uncle Sam, you have decided that somebody is going to pay it, and you put in nomination for that great honor the names of the electric power consumers in that area.

Let me give you another election year idea here. A vote against the Boxer amendment is a consumer vote. This is a consumer bill. And this is not my impression alone. I read from a letter to me dated April 30 from the Consumer Federation of America on this bill. They say in part, and I quote:

The Consumer Federation of America strongly opposes both of these ideas.

The other being the Bates amendment.

In view of high charges for energy and the essential nature of electricity, it would be unconscionable for the Congress to endorse a policy of whatever the traffic will bear in pricing Federal power.

This amendment, Mr. Chairman, would destroy 50 years of public power development, 50 years of having hydropower play a part in our national energy mix, 50 years of the idea that cities and local communities that want to own their own electrical distribution systems can do so. You may make some points with some environmental organizations, but you are not going to make any points with consumers and you are not going to improve the quality of American life by going for this amendment.

So I strongly urge support of the bill and opposition to the Boxer amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Arizona (Mr. UDALL) has consumed 2 minutes.

Mr. CHENEY. Mr. Chairman, may I inquire how much time I have remaining?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wyoming (Mr. CHENEY) has 14 minutes remaining.

Mr. CHENEY. Mr. Chairman, I yield 2 minutes to the gentleman from Minnesota (Mr. FRENZEL).

Mr. FRENZEL. I thank the gentleman for yielding this time to me.

Mr. Chairman, today we have under consideration H.R. 4275, the Federal Reclamation Hydroelectric Powerplants Authorization Act.

I had intended, Mr. Chairman, to offer an amendment to this legislation restructuring the interest rate formula in section 107 with the intent of recovering the full cost to the Government of constructing the various powerplants contained in H.R. 4275.

My amendment would have had the interest rate set at whatever the current market yield was on the Treasury notes at the time the money for these projects was appropriated. This would have replaced the method contained in the original draft of the bill which computed the interest rate by determining the weighted average of previous borrowing on Treasury notes with at least a 15-year maturity period. Such a practice would be, in my judgment, a bad policy for Congress to fall into. Using previous low interest borrowing rates in the formula would drag down the final computation, and the result would be a lower interest rate not reflective of the actual cost to the Treasury to borrow this money.

I was informed yesterday, however, that my colleague, Mr. UDALL is planning to offer his own amendment striking title I from the bill, which contains the authorization for construction for six and seven powerplants. The seventh affected plant is at the Hoover Dam, however, I understand that the financing for this construction will be paid up front.

With no repayment involved there seems little need for me to waste this body's time any further arguing over interest rate computations. Also, since the only thing better, in my view, than attempting to readjust the repayment terms, is to avoid them altogether, I plan to give my full support to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Arizona, and I urge my colleagues to do the same.

If the Udall amendment is passed, Mr. Chairman, I shall not offer my own.

There is another amendment, Mr. Chairman, which I would like to address at this time also. It is the one offered by the gentlewoman from California (Mrs. BOXER) and affects title II of this bill. My understanding of it is imperfect. I hope it will be improved by this debate. At the moment, it seems rational and fair.

When the Hoover Dam was first constructed, it was successfully argued in the 1930's that it was necessary for the growth of that region of the country which, like the rest of the Nation at that time, was struggling out of a depression, that it be provided with cheap power. However, the Federal Government can no longer afford to carry the burden of the Southwest's power needs, nor should it. It is, I would contend, time for the recipients of Hoover Dam power to begin helping with the national fiscal crisis by paying for its own power.

Currently, the power sold now is undervalued when compared to the market value of power around the country. This legislation would perpetuate this situation for the next 30 years. As I now understand it, the Boxer amendment will undo a special interest subsidy to specific customers which has been provided at the expense of all the taxpayers.

The amendment offered by the gentlewoman from California (Mrs. BOXER) would end this practice and auction off the power to the highest bidder. This would return in the first 10 years approximately $3.5 billion to the U.S. Treasury and would bring a fair market value and some equity to our national power policy.

I think, unless someone can make a contrary case, that we owe this vote to the taxpayers. I am especially surprised that many of my colleagues who argue for a fair market price of other energy forms still want to cling to the crutch of their own subsidy.

Mr. CHENEY. Mr. Chairman, I yield myself such time as I may consume.

Mr. Chairman, the bill supported by the committee provides that all funding for the uprating of Hoover power generation will be provided by local interests. In return, these local interests will receive the power under an agreed-upon formula. This seems eminently fair.

Some concern has been expressed about the fact that power from Hoover Dam will continue to be sold at below-market rates. First, I think it should be clear to everyone that this cannot fairly be characterized as a subsidy. There are no direct Federal appropriations involved and the power is being provided under contracts which have provided for repayment of Federal costs. The Federal Government made long-term contracts to provide this power in return for repayment of the facility.

This is not a subsidy under any normal definition of the term. If this were a subsidy, then any long-term contract which did not for its term completely reflect market conditions would be a subsidy. If Government treated such charges as subsidies, then the public which buys Government bonds would periodically have its return on such bonds reduced because they represented a subsidy. It does not take much to see that this argument would threaten most public facilities financing in the United States.

Second, the power at Hoover Dam has been provided on the same basis that public power has been provided throughout the United States—at Federal cost. This reflects the fact that public resources should be provided to the public without an effort to reap profits from their sale, since by definition if this were the goal it would be appropriate to have private interests organize the resource.

For these reasons, the public interest has been and will be protected by the use of Hoover Dam power for the benefit of the taxpayers of Arizona, California, and Nevada. The bill deserves your support.

□ 1300

Mr. UDALL. Mr. Chairman, I yield 4 minutes to the gentleman from Washington (Mr. SWIFT).

Mr. SWIFT. Mr. Chairman, I thank the gentleman for yielding me this time.

I am sometimes amazed at how short the public memory is, and I am astonished to see the Boxer amendment coming from the Democratic side of the aisle. It is exactly the kind of amendment based on exactly the philosophy that fought the concept of public power originally 50 to 60 years ago. It is an amendment that is based upon a philosophy that was exactly that which the anti-public-power people used all those years when they saw public power as a Communist plot. It is based on exactly the philosophy carried on in the last great public power debate in the Pacific Northwest during the Eisenhower administration on the high Hells Canyon Dam.

It is precisely the kind of anti-public-power amendment that one would expect to come out of and in fact has been proposed by David Stockman down at OMB, and it is precisely the kind of anti-public-power proposal that we found in the Grace Commission report.

Now, all of those things did not come from the Democratic side of the aisle, and yet this proposal does. I have asked myself why, and the only answer I can come up with is that there are those who believe that all utilities, public or private, are bad, "so let's soak the utilities."

I would remind my colleagues that all the Boxer amendment would do is to take low-cost power away from a lot of people and see that no one gets it. The prices for everyone will go up. This does not mean low-cost power is going to go to someone else; it does not mean low-cost power is going to be spread around. It means that the rates for everyone will go up and the lights that go out first will be the lights of the poor.

Mr. Chairman, the philosophy of public power was valid originally, it is valid now, and the Boxer amendment must be defeated for that reason.

Mr. MORRISON of Washington. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SWIFT. I am happy to yield to the gentleman from Washington.

Mr. MORRISON of Washington. Mr. Chairman, I just want to associate myself with the gentleman's remarks. They are precisely on target as far as those of us from the Northwest are concerned. I will join the gentleman in opposition to the amendment he described.

Mr. Chairman, I thank the gentleman for yielding.

Mrs. BOXER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SWIFT. I am happy to yield to my good friend, the gentlewoman from California.

Mrs. BOXER. Mr. Chairman, I thank my good friend, the gentleman from Washington, for yielding.

Is the gentleman aware that the Reagan administration is in opposition to my amendment, not supporting it?

Mr. SWIFT. Yes; but I have never found the Reagan administration to put a high priority on consistency.

Mrs. BOXER. All right. Is the gentleman aware that we do have programs with lifeline rates for people who have problems paying their utility bills, and that that is a separate issue apart from this issue?

Mr. SWIFT. Does that mean that everybody who is just above where you draw the line is then going to have to pay higher rates for no other reason than because you have a marketplace concept that is anti-public-power?

Mrs. BOXER. No. The point I am trying to make—and obviously I am not making it to the gentleman—is that that issue of power to people with low incomes is another issue and does not necessarily mean that those who are supporting the Boxer amendment oppose those kinds of programs.

Lastly, I want to be sure the gentleman is aware that some of the people in the Hoover Club are private utilities. I just wanted to make sure the gentleman is aware of that.

Mr. SWIFT. I am aware of that, but they come after the preference clause customers get their shot at the power, and what the gentlewoman is doing would simply mean that everybody, public, private, poor, and rich, would pay more. Nobody gains anything. Everybody loses with the Boxer amendment.

Mrs. BOXER. Mr. Chairman, I would make the point to the gentleman, if I might, that there are public power companies that would love to get into the Hoover Club, and they cannot; the private utilities are in ahead of them.

Mr. Chairman, I really appreciate the gentleman's yielding to me.

Mr. SWIFT. I was really happy to have the opportunity to do so.

Mr. UDALL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SWIFT. I yield to the chairman of the committee.

Mr. UDALL. Mr. Chairman, I am not really the spokesman for the Reagan administration, but I want to correct the impression here that the Reagan administration supports the Boxer amendment. The fact is that the administration's policy, as I understand it, is very clearly that they are against the Boxer amendment.

Mr. CHENEY. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman will yield further, I would be happy to be a spokesman for the administration, and it is my understanding that the administration enthusiastically supports the bill as advocated by the chairman of the committee and would oppose the Boxer amendment.

Mr. UDALL. Mr. Chairman, I yield 2 minutes to the gentleman from Louisiana (Mr. HUCKABY).

Mr. HUCKABY. Mr. Chairman, I thank the gentleman for yielding this time to me.

Mr. Chairman, I would like to point out to the gentleman from Washington who was just in the well that we in the State of Louisiana today have some of the highest utility rates in the entire Nation. We have coal plants built on some of the Nation's most lucrative natural gas fields. Because of public policy, we now have to import coal from out West. So if you are going to penalize one section of the country for public policy, in this case, not letting us use natural gas as a boiler fuel, why should you reward another section of the country with a public policy.

I do not know how the gentleman voted on that amendment several years ago, but certainly one must also consider the fair market value of the electricity that can be produced and what people are willing to pay. And, of course, we all know that all of our renewable resources, including our water resources, are dwindling over time.

What is wrong with the section of the West that has historically had cheap public power paying fair market values just like we have to do in the rest of the country?

Mr. SWIFT. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HUCKABY. I am happy to yield to the gentleman from Washington.

Mr. SWIFT. Mr. Chairman, there are two answers to that.

First of all, the whole concept of public power was one in which we said Government was not going to make a profit on the power. Now, maybe the gentleman philosophically disagrees with that 60-year history; I do not.

The second problem is that I think every region of the country has some advantages and every region of the country has some disadvantages. For example, if you would like to pay freight rates from the west coast when virtually everything is manufactured on the east coast, then you are dealing with some of the deficiencies that exist in the Pacific Northwest.

So I think if you want to homogenize America economically, I suppose we can, but I do not see where anyone gains by taking away some of the advantage that one region of the country may have if you are not going to take care of the economic disadvantages that that region of the country may have.

Mr. HUCKABY. Mr. Chairman, if I might reclaim my time, it certainly appears to me that at a time when this Nation is as desperate as it probably ever has been for resources, dollar resources, to reduce the size of the Federal deficit, here we have a potential spreadout over a number of years of several hundred million dollars of increased revenues to the Federal Government, that we should not let slip away.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Louisiana (Mr. HUCKABY) has expired.

Mr. CHENEY. Mr. Chairman, I yield 2 minutes to the gentleman from California (Mr. MOORHEAD).

Mr. MOORHEAD. Mr. Chairman, I rise in strong support of H.R. 4275, a bill that will provide authorization to increase the hydroelectric power capacity at Hoover Dam, title II.

H.R. 4275, approved unanimously in the Interior Committee in March 1984, is important to California, as well as other Western States, in that this bill reauthorizes the allocation of electric power from Hoover Dam, a large part of which now flows to California. This reauthorization is necessary since the original 50-year contracts signed for Hoover power in 1937 will expire in 1987. The bill will renew these contracts for the next 30 years, well in advance of the deadline, so as to permit the immediate modernization and upgrading of the existing generators at Hoover Dam.

This is good, sound legislation, meriting support for many reasons:

This measure would make possible an increase in the generating capacity of the Hoover powerplant by about one-third. The existing output from Hoover Dam is about 1,450 megawatts. The upgrading of the existing generators will increase the total power output from Hoover by approximately 500 megawatts.

This upgrading portion should be funded by up-front cost sharing from all Hoover allottees. The additional power from the upgrading will be made available to the States of Arizona and Nevada, and certain California municipalities not now having Hoover allocations. Allocations of existing Hoover power to California entities, however, will remain approximately the same after 1987.

This increase in capacity, in turn, makes possible the settlement of an existing lawsuit, brought by Arizona and Nevada against the United States and the California power contractors. Should the bill become law, the litigation that Nevada and Arizona initiated in 1982 to enjoin renewal of the California contracts can be dismissed.

As this controversy will be settled, if this bill is enacted, it is not necessary to describe it in detail. Suffice it to say that it arose from conflicting interpretations of provisions of the Boulder Canyon Project Act controlling the disposition of power after expiration of the original contracts in 1987. Without this bill, there is every prospect of another long drawn out lawsuit. The last Colorado River suit took 10 years to reach a decision.

But the parties have agreed to settle. The Departments of Energy and Interior have given their blessing to the settlement, and this bill carries it out.

As in most settlements, no one gets all that he wanted. The present contractors are to receive renewal of their contracts for 30 years, but for somewhat less quantities of power in the past. Arizona and Nevada will get most of the increase in capacity of the powerplant, but a substantial quantity is reserved for smaller publicly owned power systems in California.

H.R. 4275 would authorize "uprating"—increasing—the generating capacity of the Hoover powerplants by about one-third through the modernization of the existing generators. In its present form, the bill would also remedy the very serious objections of Los Angeles, Pasadena, Glendale, and Burbank to the original proposal of the Department of Energy. The bill would allocate to Arizona and Nevada about 75 percent of the capacity added by "uprating."

The Government's original investment in Hoover Dam, made 50 years ago, is being repaid, on time, with interest. Its new investment in the enlargement of the capacity of the Hoover powerplant will be either paid for in advance by those who are to receive power, or its repayment will be assured by contracts made in advance of construction if Congress decides to proceed by way of appropriations.

Federal electric power should be sold at the lowest cost consistent with sound business principles and the public interest. This principle is enshrined in all Federal power legislation since the 1944 Flood Control Act. Thus, power can be sold at rates which will keep the Government whole, and, in addition, will provide funds for desalting and improving the quality of the Colorado River's water.

As existing contracts are to be substantially renewed, some 12 million people, in the three States, will continue to receive the benefits of Hoover power.

Early enactment of H.R. 4275 is in the national interest in every respect. I urge my colleagues to vote for this essential piece of legislation.

□ 1310

Mr. CHENEY. Mr. Chairman, I yield 2 minutes to the gentleman from New Mexico (Mr. LUJAN), the distinguished ranking minority member of the Committee on Interior and Insular Affairs.

Mr. LUJAN. Mr. Chairman, I thank the gentleman for yielding.

Mr. Chairman, I rise in support of this legislation, particularly because I have an interest generating capacity which this bill will do, certainly with the Hoover Dam.

I liked the original part of the bill where we would also construct additional generating capacity for seven other projects, but I am sorry to see that there is going to be a move to eliminate that.

Really, Mr. Chairman, these days we must move ahead with energy projects because although we now have an excess of generating capacity, we have problems in all kinds of other areas. The nuclear generating industry is in trouble, as we have seen lately with four different powerplants just in the last few days stopping, some because of different kinds of problems that have been brought on, many of them because of the cost, and the utilities simply run out of money.

In the area of fossil fuel, we are not doing that well, either, in replacing our generating capacity. We have problems with acid rain that will be brought up before this body shortly; so as we look to the future, while we may not need that additional generating capacity today, we certainly will need it in the years to come. We have no plans for replacing existing powerplants that are wearing out.

In addition to that, we will have, of course, an increased demand as the years go on and our population grows.

So, Mr. Chairman, for that reason I rise in support of this legislation and hope that this body will overwhelmingly support that position.

Mr. UDALL. Mr. Chairman, I yield 2 minutes to the gentleman from California (Mr. LEHMAN).

Mr. LEHMAN of California. Mr. Chairman, I greatly admire and respect my colleague from California (Mrs. BOXER), and it is also with great reluctance that I would oppose an amendment she wanted to offer. However, I would like to make several important points regarding the amendment which she will soon propose.

First, the amendment really is anticonsumer. It would contribute to the escalation of energy costs and result only in a windfall to the Government at the expense of the consumer. Auctioning electricity to the highest bidder would provide the same type of market instability that consumers have suffered through during the oil energy fluctuations of the last decade, and the same price uncertainties posed by natural gas deregulation. We need to support incentives to keep energy costs down, not incentives to raise them.

Second, this amendment would establish a precedent that could drastically affect the way the Federal Government markets and sells the power it produces not only in the West, but throughout the Nation. It could alter a structure which already insures that low-cost wholesale power is provided to those public utilities which express the need.

Finally, and most importantly, this amendment casts doubt on the integrity of those individuals who helped shape this agreement. This includes those water and energy interests from the States along the Colorado River Basin, the distinguished Members of the other body, and our colleagues here in the House. As we in the West, and certainly in California realize, water and energy wars often pit region against region and State against State. With H.R. 4275, it is important to note that those regional interests have put aside their differences and reached an agreement. And this agreement adequately addresses the needs of southern California, while insuring that the interests of northern California are met and protected.

I urge my colleagues to defeat the amendment and support H.R. 4275.

Mr. CHENEY. Mr. Chairman, I have no further requests for time.

Mr. UDALL. Mr. Chairman, I have no further requests for time.

The CHAIRMAN. Pursuant to the rule, the committee amendment in the nature of a substitute now printed in the reported bill shall be considered by titles as an original bill for the purpose of amendment, and each title shall be considered as having been read.

The Clerk will designate section 1.

The text of section 1 is as follows:

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled,

SECTION 1. This Act may be cited as the "Federal Reclamation Hydroelectric Powerplants Authorization Act of 1983".

Mr. UDALL. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that section 1 and title I be printed in the RECORD and open to amendment at any point.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Arizona?

There was no objection.

The text of title I is as follows:

TITLE I

SEC. 101. The Secretary of the Interior, acting pursuant to the Federal reclamation laws (Act of June 17, 1902, 32 Stat. 388, and Acts amendatory thereof and supplemental thereto), is authorized to construct, operate, and maintain hydroelectric powerplants at existing reclamation project facilities at locations in the approximate capacities set forth in section 104 of this Act: Provided, That construction by the Secretary of the Interior of a powerplant designated in subsection (a), (c), (d), or (g) of section 104 of this Act may not proceed prior to October 1, 1985, or if a license has been issued prior to such date to a non-Federal entity pursuant to section 4(e) of the Federal Power Act (16 U.S.C. 797) to construct such powerplant. Federal construction of any powerplant authorized in section 104 of this Act shall not be deemed to be authorized until such time as the Secretary of the Interior has made findings of the economic and financial feasibility of the powerplant, and has complied with applicable environmental laws. In carrying out this title I, the Secretary of the Interior is authorized to modify the capacity of a powerplant designated in section 104 as determined to be necessary or desirable during postauthorization study and design, and after consultation with the Secretary of Energy. If the Secretary proposes to make any significant modification of a powerplant designated in section 104, he shall submit a report of the proposed modification to Congress. No funds shall be obligated for carrying out the proposed modification prior to sixty days from the date the Secretary has transmitted the report.

SEC. 102. The Secretary of Energy, consistent with any existing law which enables the Secretary to construct such facilities, may construct, operate, and maintain transmission facilities as required physically to connect the hydroelectric powerplants authorized in section 104 of this Act to existing power systems and as he determines necessary to accomplish distribution and marketing of power generated by powerplants constructed pursuant to section 104 of this Act, and to purchase replacement capacity, energy, or both in order to maintain contractual deliveries to customers during unit outages which result from Federal construction of the powerplants authorized in section 104 of this Act: Provided, That this authority shall not extend to the projects to be marketed through the Federal Columbia River Power System unless the Pacific Northwest Electric Power and Conservation Planning Council ["Council"] has determined that each project is consistent with the Council's regional conservation and electric power plan required by section 839b(d) of title 16, United States Code, and with its program to protect, mitigate, and enhance fish and wildlife required by section 839d(h) of title 16, United States Code. The Council shall determine whether each project is consistent with the power plan and the fish and wildlife program under the procedure set forth at section 839b(d)(1) of title 16, United States Code, for amendments to the power plan.

SEC. 103. During Federal construction of powerplants authorized in section 104 of this Act, the Secretary of the Interior and the Secretary of Energy shall seek to minimize the loss of capacity, energy, or both to power customers due to unit outages which result from such construction. The Secretary of Energy shall seek to maintain contractual deliveries of capacity, energy, or both at contract prices to customers affected by unit outages resulting from such Federal construction.

SEC. 104. (a) Whiskeytown powerplant unit, Central Valley project, California, consisting of a turbine generator unit of three thousand kilowatts on the outlet works of Whiskeytown Dam.

(b) Yellowtail Afterbay powerplant unit, Pick-Sloan Missouri Basin program, Montana, consisting of a turbine generator unit of ten thousand kilowatts on the outlet works of Yellowtail Afterbay Dam.

(c) Red Bluff powerplant unit, Central Valley project, California, consisting of four turbine generator units of two thousand five hundred kilowatts each at Red Bluff Diversion Dam.

(d) Palisades powerplant enlargement, Palisades project, Idaho-Wyoming, consisting of one or more turbine generator units so as to increase the powerplant capacity by ninety thousand kilowatts.

(e) Anderson Ranch powerplant unit, Boise project, Idaho, consisting of a turbine and generator unit to increase the powerplant capacity by thirty thousand kilowatts.

(f) Minidoka powerplant rehabilitation and enlargement, Minidoka project, Idaho-Wyoming, consisting of two turbine generator units of fifteen thousand kilowatts each in replacement of existing units one through six.

(g) Guernsey powerplant enlargement, North Platte project, Wyoming, consisting of one turbine generator unit to increase the powerplant capacity by fifteen thousand kilowatts.

SEC. 105. (a) Hydroelectric power generated by Federal facilities constructed pursuant to section 101 of this Act shall be delivered to the Secretary of Energy for distribution and marketing through Federal hydroelectric power marketing programs in accordance with existing law and policy consistent with the provisions of this title.

(b) The Federal powerplant constructed pursuant to section 101 of this Act shall be financially integrated with, and the power marketed under rate schedules in effect for the several programs as follows:

(1) Whiskeytown and Red Bluff powerplant units shall be marketed through the Central Valley project power marketing program;

(2) Yellowtail Afterbay powerplant unit shall be marketed through the Pick-Sloan Missouri Basin program power marketing program;

(3) Palisades powerplant enlargement, Anderson Ranch powerplant unit, and Minidoka powerplant rehabilitation and enlargement shall be marketed through the Federal Columbia River Power System; and

(4) Guernsey powerplant unit shall be marketed through the Western Division, Pick-Sloan Missouri Basin program power marketing program.

SEC. 106. Powerplants authorized in section 101 of this Act shall be designed, constructed, and operated in such a manner as to be compatible with valid existing water rights or water delivery to the holder of any valid water service contract.

SEC. 107. The interest rate used for computing interest during construction and interest on the unpaid balance of the reimbursable cost of a powerplant authorized in section 101 of this Act shall be determined by the Secretary of the Treasury, as of the beginning of the fiscal year in which construction of such powerplant commenced, on the basis of the computed average interest rate payable by the Treasury on its outstanding marketable public obligations which are neither due nor callable for fifteen ye s from the date of issue.

SEC. 108. (a) There are hereby authorized to be appropriated beginning October 1, 1984, to the Secretary of the Interior for construction of the powerplants authorized in section 101 of this Act the amounts set forth in subsection (b) of this section, on the basis of October 1983 price levels, plus or minus such amounts as may be justified by reason of ordinary fluctuations of construction cost indexes applicable to the type of construction involved herein. There are also authorized to be appropriated to the Secretary of Energy such sums as may be necessary for the purposes of section 102 and 103 of this Act, and to the Secretary of the Interior such additional sums as may be necessary for the operation and maintenance of the Federal powerplants authorized in section 101 of this Act.

(b)(1) Whiskeytown powerplant units, $3,780,000.

(2) Yellowtail Afterbay powerplant, $25,600,000.

(3) Red Bluff powerplant unit, $42,100,000.

(4) Palisades powerplant enlargement, $76,000,000: Provided, That such sums authorized to be appropriated for construction shall be reduced by the amounts, if any, paid and contributed by the State of Idaho under the provisions of section 109 of this title. The Secretary of Interior is authorized to accept such contributions. Interest paid on bonds or other indebtedness issued by the State of Idaho to provide such contributions shall qualify for treatment under section 839(f) of title 16, United States Code.

(5) Anderson Ranch powerplant unit, $14,317,000.

(6) Minidoka powerplant rehabilitation and enlargement, $73,437,000.

(7) Guernsey powerplant enlargement, $22,337,000.

SEC. 109. The Administrator of the Bonneville Power Administration, pursuant to section 839d(a)(2) of title 16, United States Code, may acquire the capability of the Palisades powerplant enlargement by contracting to pay to the State of Idaho an amount not to exceed the construction cost repayment requirement that would have resulted from financing of the complete project under section 107 of this title at a total construction cost equal to that assumed in the Council's determination of consistency with the power plan pursuant to section 102 of this title: Provided, That the project is not a major resource subject to the requirements of section 839d(c) of title 16, United States Code, as that term is defined at section 839a(12) of title 16, United States Code: And provided further, That any such contract shall terminate at such time as all debt obligations issued by the State of Idaho for the financing or refinancing of amounts contributed as construction costs by the State of Idaho have been retired or provision for their retirement has been made.

SEC. 110. The Secretary of Energy, acting through the Alaska Power Administration, is authorized and directed to enter into an agreement with respect to the Eklutna Lake hydropower project in accordance with provisions of the Act of July 31, 1950 (64 Stat. 382, as amended), the last sentence of the first paragraph of section 1 of which is amended to read as follows: "The water of Eklutna Lake and its tributaries which are required for the operation of the Eklutna project are reserved for that purpose: Provided, That a portion for the waters so reserved may be diverted from Eklutna Lake for public water supply purposes, if compensation for reduced electric energy production due to such diversions is made as required by the February 1984 agreement between the municipality of Anchorage and the Alaska Power Administation.".

SEC. 111. The provisions of this title shall not apply to any project authorized or affected by title II of this Act.

AMENDMENTS OFFERED BY MR. UDALL

Mr. UDALL. Mr. Chairman, I offer two amendments to title I and I ask unanimous consent that they be considered en bloc. They have the effect of dropping title I from the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Arizona?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendments offered by Mr. UDALL: Page 2, line 1, delete through line 3. Substitute "SECTION 1. This Act may be cited as the Hoover Power Plant Act of 1984".

Page 2, line 4, delete "TITLE I" and all that follows through to page 9, line 22. Renumber following sections and internal cross references therein accordingly.

Mr. UDALL. Mr. Chairman, these amendments which I offer en bloc, strike title I of the bill and substitute a new name, the Hoover Power Plant Act of 1984, and have the necessary renumbering accomplished.

As I mentioned in my opening statement, the bill as reported contained two titles; title I authorizes seven projects and title II is an Arizona-California-Nevada settlement and it also authorizes the upgrading of power production at Hoover Dam.

I supported title I in the committee because I believe hydropower is an important part of our national energy picture. In the future, we are either going to have to use a lot more nuclear or a lot more coal, or there is a third way to go, and that is hydropower, which is clean, cheap, and renewable.

The additional hydro capacity would come, all of it, from existing dams, not new ones, so I felt we did not risk any controversy.

Hydropower is free of the many problems that characterize coal-fired plants or nuclear generating stations; nevertheless, this title has become subject to some controversy and some confusion. Four of these plants are subject to the Federal Energy Regulatory Commission proceedings to determine whether a non-Federal interest should be licensed to construct the works. There has been no agreement yet on how the other three of these plants would be financed, so perhaps we need a little more time to think about these seven projects.

Title II of the bill, however, is ready to go; it is all agreed upon. As I said, the adoption of the settlement contained in title II would resolve the pending litigation over the Hoover allocations. In order to receive contracts from the Western Power Authority, the parties to the suit have agreed to file for dismissal with prejudice. So I reluctantly conclude that we should move ahead on title II now and hope to work out the kinks in title I at a later date.

Deletion of title I will reduce the cost of the bill by $257 million if all the authorized projects were federally financed.

Mr. EDGAR. Mr. Chairman, I rise to speak in favor of the amendment.

Mr. Chairman, I rise in support of the amendment to drop title I from this bill and to move on to dealing specifically and solely with the Hoover Dam project.

I think the seven projects in title I still have many questions relating to the recovery of costs to the Federal Government of the expansion of those projects. While I believe very strongly that hydroelectric power is a very good, clean form of energy resource, the questions of cost, the questions of who should pay that cost and the question of recovery of that cost is an important question that would have been discussed and debated with several amendments. I think the gentleman made a good point in deleting this title and focusing his attention primarily on the Hoover Dam.

□ 1320

There will be opportunities in the future to look again at these seven projects. Hopefully, we will have some of these policy initiatives developed on exactly what the Federal Government's role should be in the whole area of hydroelectric power and cost sharing before title I of this bill returns to the House floor.

I yield back the balance of my time.

Mr. LUJAN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike the requisite number of words and rise in support of the amendment, reluctant support of the amendment, I might add.

I will support the amendment of my friend from Arizona, but I must say that I am rather disappointed that we had to come to this. I suppose that my reason for supporting it is because we might as well get along with the business at hand and that is Hoover Dam.

But it just bothers me that almost every time we bring a bill for the enhancement of the amount of energy that we can have in this country, there is always something that comes up that delays it.

We went through this whole thing with the Clinch River breeder reactor, and I am not putting them in the same category at all because I do not want to do any damage of my friend's intention of having these seven generating projects. But it seems like every time something like this comes up we find some reason to delay it.

One of these days we are going to have to pay the piper, Mr. Chairman, because there are plants out there right now that are having to be replaced or will have to be replaced in the very near future. And then, of course, the expansion of our industrial base will require that we have additional generating units. What better way than hydroelectric? It is the cleanest, the most acceptable, cheapest way of generating electricity.

And I do hope that some time in the future, in the very near future, that these seven projects will be resurrected and that we can move ahead with providing additional electricity for this country.

Mr. UDALL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LUJAN. I will be happy to yield.

Mr. UDALL. I thank the gentleman for yielding and I want to express my agreement with most of what he has said. I will assure him that I mean business in terms of these seven projects.

I sometimes get a little unhappy with a few of my environmental friends that seem to be against everything. If there is anything that an environmentalist ought to be for, it ought to be to shift to renewable resources like hydroelectric power.

Our committee, with the help of the gentleman from New Mexico, has cranked out a number of initiatives, including small hydro projects. There are thousands of small rivers in Arizona and all over the country and in New England and in other places that will produce a few kilowatts or a megawatt or two, and we ought to be harnessing these. It is a shame to have to put off action on these seven units that are ready to go, but we just had too many bugs to work out between the different States and the Federal Government on financing these programs.

I have concluded that this is a critically important settlement between Arizona and California and we need to get on with the job of going on and moving to upgrading so that this project had to come ahead of the other seven or keeping the other projects in the bill. But I will work with the gentleman to see that we get as much hydro as we can, and particularly those seven projects just as soon as we can.

Mr. LUJAN. I thank the gentleman and I would hope that we can move expeditiously on approving those seven projects and that we can work out the bugs and move on ahead with them.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendments offered by the gentleman from Arizona (Mr. UDALL).

The amendments were agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will designate title II.

The text of title II is as follows:

TITLE II

SEC. 201. (a) The Secretary of the Interior is authorized to increase the capacity of existing generating equipment and appurtenances at Hoover Powerplant (hereinafter in this Act referred to as "uprating program"); and to improve parking, visitor facilities, and roadways and to provide additional elevators, and other facilities that will contribute to the safety and sufficiency of visitor access to Hoover Dam and Powerplant (hereinafter in this Act referred to as "visitor facilities program").

(b) The Secretary of the Interior is authorized to construct a Colorado River bridge crossing, including suitable approach spans, immediately downstream from Hoover Dam for the purpose of alleviating traffic congestion and reducing safety hazards. This bridge shall not be a part of the Boulder Canyon project and shall neither be funded nor repaid from the Colorado River Dam Fund or the Lower Colorado River Basin Development Fund.

SEC. 202. (a) Section 403(b) of the Colorado River Basin Project Act of 1968 (82 Stat. 894, as amended, 43 U.S.C. 1543) is amended by inserting "(1)" after "(b)" and adding the following new paragraph at the end thereof:

"(2) Except as provided in subsection 309(b), as amended, sums advanced by non-Federal entities for the purpose of carrying out the provisions of title III of this Act shall be credited to the development fund and shall be available without further appropriation for such purpose.".

(b) Paragraph (1) of section 403(c) of the Colorado River Basin Project Act of 1968 (82 Stat. 894, as amended, 43 U.S.C. 1543(c)) is revised to read as follows:

"(1) all revenues collected in connection with the operation of facilities authorized in title III in furtherance of the purposes of this Act (except entrance, admission, and other recreation fees or charges and proceeds received from recreation concessionaires), until completion of repayment requirements of the Central Arizona project;".

(c) Paragraph (2) of section 403(c) is revised by inserting immediately preceding the existing proviso: "Provided, however, That for the Boulder Canyon project commencing June 1, 1987, and for the Parker-Davis project commencing June 1, 2005, and until the end of the repayment period for the Central Arizona project described in section 301(a) of this Act, the Secretary of Energy shall provide for surplus revenues by including the equivalent of 4½ mills per kilowatthour in the rates charged to purchasers in Arizona for application to the purposes specified in subsection (f) of this section and by including the equivalent 2½ mills per kilowatthour in the rates charged to purchasers in California and Nevada for application to the purposes of subsection (g) of this section as amended and supplemented: Provided further, That after the repayment period for said Central Arizona project, the equivalent of 2½ mills per kilowatthour shall be included by the Secretary of Energy in the rates charged to purchasers in Arizona, California, and Nevada to provide revenues for application to the purposes of said subsection (g) of this section:".

SEC. 203. (a) The Boulder Canyon Project Act of 1928 (45 Stat. 1057, as amended, 43 U.S.C. 617 et seq.), as amended and supplemented, is further amended:

(1) In the first sentence of section 2(b), by striking out "except that the aggregate amount of such advances shall not exceed the sum of $165,000,000", and by replacing the comma after the word "Act" with a period.

(2) In section 3, by deleting "$165,000,000." and inserting in lieu thereof "$242,000,000, of which $77,000,000 (October 1983 price levels) shall be adjusted plus or minus such amounts as may be justified by reason of ordinary fluctuations of construction costs as indicated by engineering cost indices applicable to the type of construction involved herein. Said $77,000,000 represents the additional amount required for the uprating program and the visitor facilities program.".

(b) Except as amended by this Act, the Boulder Canyon Project Act of 1928 (45 Stat. 1057, as amended, 43 U.S.C. 617 et seq.), as amended and supplemented, shall remain in full force and effect.

SEC. 204. (a) The Boulder Canyon Project Adjustment Act of 1940 (54 Stat. 774, as amended, 43 U.S.C. 618), as amended and supplemented, is further amended:

(1) In section 1 by deleting the phrase "during the period beginning June 1, 1937, and ending May 31, 1987" appearing in the introductory paragraph of section 1 and in section 1(a) and inserting in lieu thereof "beginning June 1, 1937".

(2) In section 1(b) by deleting the phrase "and such portion of such advances made on and after June 1, 1937, as (on the basis of repayment thereof within such fifty-year period or periods as the Secretary may determine) will be repayable prior to June 1, 1987" and inserting in lieu thereof "and such advances made on and after June 1, 1937, over fifty-year periods".

(3) In section 1 by deleting the word "and" at the end of subsection (c); deleting the period at the end of subsection (d) and inserting in lieu thereof "; and", and by adding after subsection (d) the following new subsection (e):

"(e) To provide, by application of the increments to rates specified in section 403(c)(2) of the Colorado River Basin Project Act of 1968, as amended and supplemented, revenues, from and after June 1, 1987, for application to the purposes there specified.".

(4) In section 2:

(i) by deleting the first sentence and subsection (a) and inserting in lieu thereof; "All receipts from the project shall be paid into the Colorado River Dam Fund and shall be available, without further appropriation, for:

"(a) Defraying the costs of operation (including purchase of supplemental energy to meet temporary deficiencies in firm energy which the Secretary of Energy is obligated by contract to supply), maintenance and replacements of, and emergency expenditures for, all facilities of the project, within such separate limitations as may be included in annual appropriations Acts;" and

(ii) by amending subsection (e) to read as follows:

"(e) Transfer to the Lower Colorado River Basin Development Fund established by title IV of the Colorado River Basin Project Act of 1968, as amended and supplemented, of the revenues referred to in section 1(e) of this Act.".

(5) By deleting the final period at the end of section 6 and inserting in lieu thereof the following: "; Provided, That the respective rates of interest on appropriated funds advanced, respectively, for the uprating program and for the visitor facilities program, as described in section 201(a) of the Federal Reclamation Hydroelectric Powerplants Authorization Act of 1983, shall be determined by the Secretary of the Treasury, as of the beginning of the fiscal year in which the initial advances for the particular program involved is made, on the basis of the computed average interest rate payable by the Treasury upon its outstanding marketable public obligations which are neither due nor callable for fifteen years from the date of issue.".

(6) In section 12, in the paragraph beginning with "Replacements", by deleting "during the period from June 1, 1937, to May 31, 1987, inclusive" and inserting in lieu thereof "beginning June 1, 1937".

SEC. 205. (a)(1) The Secretary of Energy shall offer:

(A) To each contractor for power generated at Hoover Dam a renewal contract for delivery commencing June 1, 1987, of the amount of capacity and firm energy specified for that contractor in the following table:

SCHEDULE A: LONG TERM CONTINGENT CAPACITY AND ASSOCIATED FIRM ENERGY RESERVED FOR RENEWAL CONTRACT OFFERS TO CURRENT BOULDER CANYON PROJECT CONTRACTORS

Contractor	Contingent capacity (kW)	Firm energy (thousands of KWh)		Total
		Summer	Winter
Metropolitan Water District of Southern California	247,500	904,382	387,592	1,291,974
City of Los Angeles	490,875	488,535	209,658	698,193
Southern California Edison Company	277,500	175,486	75,208	250,694
City of Glendale	18,000	47,398	20,313	67,711
City of Pasadena	11,000	40,655	17,424	58,079
City of Burbank	5,125	14,811	6,347	21,158
Arizona Power Authority	189,000	452,192	193,797	645,989
Colorado River Commission of Nevada	189,000	452,192	193,797	645,989
United States, for Boulder City	20,000	56,000	24,000	80,000
Totals	1,448,000	2,631,651	1,128,136	3,759,787

(B) To purchasers in the States of Arizona, Nevada and California eligible to enter into such contracts under section 5 of the Boulder Canyon Project Act, contracts for delivery commencing June 1, 1987, or as it thereafter becomes available, of capacity resulting from the uprating program and for delivery commencing June 1, 1987, of associated firm energy as specified in the following table:

SCHEDULE B: CONTINGENT CAPACITY RESULTING FROM THE UPRATING PROGRAM AND ASSOCIATED FIRM ENERGY

State	Contingent capacity (kW)	Firm energy (thousands of kWh)
		Summer	Winter	Total
Arizona	188,000	148,000	64,000	212,000
California	127,000	99,850	43,364	143,214
Nevada	188,000	288,000	124,000	412,000
Totals	503,000	535,850	231,364	767,214

Provided, however, That in the case of Arizona and Nevada, such contracts shall be offered to the Arizona Power Authority and the Colorado River Commission of Nevada, respectively, as the agency specified by State law as the agent of such State for purchasing power from the Boulder Canyon project: Provided further, That in the case of California, no such contract under this subparagraph (B) shall be offered to any purchaser who is offered a contract for capacity exceeding 20,000 kilowatts under subparagraph (A) of this paragraph; and

(C) To the Arizona Power Authority and the Colorado River Commission of Nevada and to purchasers in the State of California eligible to enter into such contracts under section 5 of the Boulder Canyon Project Act, contracts for delivery commencing June 1, 1987, of such energy generated at Hoover Dam as is available respectively to the States of Arizona, Nevada, and California in excess of 4,501.001 million kilowatthours in any year of operation (hereinafter called excess energy) in accordance with the following table:

SCHEDULE C: EXCESS ENERGY

Priority of entitlement to excess energy	State
First: Meeting Arizona's first priority right to delivery of excess energy which is equal in each year of operation to 200 million kilowatthours: Provided, however, That in the event excess energy in the amount of 200 million kilowatthours is not generated during any year of operation, Arizona shall accumulate a first right to delivery of excess energy subsequently generated in an amount not to exceed 600 million kilowatthours, inclusive of the current year's 200 million kilowatthours. Said first right of delivery shall accrue at a rate of 200 million kilowatthours per year for each year excess energy in the amount of 200 million kilowatthours is not generated, less amounts of excess energy delivered.	Arizona.
Second: Meeting Hoover Dam contractual obligations under schedule A of section 205(a)(1)(A) and under schedule B of section 205(a)(1)(B) not exceeding 26 million kilowatthours in each year of operation.
Third: Meeting the energy requirements of the three States, such available excess energy to be divided equally among the States.	Arizona, Nevada, California.

(2) The total obligation of the Secretary of Energy to deliver firm energy pursuant to schedule A of section 204(a)(1)(A) and schedule B of section 205(a)(1)(B) is 4,527.001 million kilowatthours in each year of operation. To the extent that the actual generation at Hoover Powerplant in any year of operation (less deliveries thereof to Arizona required by its first priority under schedule C of section 205(a)(1)(C) whenever actual generation in any year of operation is in excess of 4,501.001 million kilowatthours) is less than 4,527.001 million kilowatthours, such deficiency shall be borne by the holders of contracts under said schedules A and B in the ratio that the sum of the quantities of firm energy to which each contractor is entitled pursuant to said schedules bears to 4,527.001 million kilowatthours. At the request of any such contractor, the Secretary of Energy will purchase energy to meet that contractor's deficiency at such contractor's expense.

(3) Subdivision E of the "General Consolidated Power Marketing Criteria or Regulations for Boulder City Area Projects" published in the Federal Register May 1983 (48 Federal Register commencing at 20881), hereinafter referred to as the "Criteria" or as the "Regulations" shall be deemed to have been modified to conform to this section. The Secretary of Energy shall cause to be included in the Federal Register a notice conforming the text of said Regulations to such modifications.

(4) Each contract offered under subsection (a)(1) of this section shall:

(A) expire September 30, 2017;

(B) not restrict use to which the capacity and energy contracted for by the Metropolitan Water District of Southern California may be placed within the State of California: Provided, That to the extent practicable and consistent with sound water management and conservation practice, the Metropolitan Water District of Southern California shall use such capacity and energy to pump available Colorado River water prior to using such capacity and energy to pump California State water project water; and

(C) conform to the applicable provisions of subdivision E of the Criteria, commencing at 48 Federal Register 20881, modified as provided in this section. To the extent that said provisions of the Criteria, as so modified, are applicable to contracts entered into under this section, those provisions are hereby ratified.

(b) Nothing in the Criteria shall be construed to prejudice any rights conferred by the Boulder Canyon Project Act, as amended and supplemented, on the holder of a contract described in subsection (a) of this section not in default thereunder on September 30, 2017.

(c)(1) The Secretary of Energy shall not execute a contract described in subsection (a)(1)(A) of this section with any entity which is a party to the action entitled the "State of Nevada, et al. against the United States of America, et al." in the United States District Court for the District of Nevada, case numbered CV LV '82 441 RDF, unless that entity agrees to file in that action a stipulation for voluntary dismissal with prejudice of its claims, or counterclaims, or crossclaims, as the case may be, and also agrees to file with the Secretary a document releasing the United States, its officers and agents, and all other parties to that action who join in that stipulation from any claims arising out of the disposition under this section of capacity and energy from the Boulder Canyon project. The Attorney General shall join on behalf of the United States, its officers and agents, in any such voluntary dismissal and shall have the authority to approve on behalf of the United States the form of each release.

(2) If after a reasonable period of time as determined by the Secretary, the Secretary is precluded from executing a contract with an entity by reason of paragraph (1) of this subsection, the Secretary shall offer the capacity and energy thus available to other entities in the same State eligible to enter into such contracts under section 5 of the Boulder Canyon Project Act.

(d) If by September 30, 1987, the Secretary of the Interior has not requested advances of funds under contracts entered into pursuant to subsection (e) of this section and if by that date the Congress has not appropriated funds to enable the substantial completion by September 30, 1992, of the uprating program, the Secretary of the Interior shall promptly request each non-Federal entity with a contract described in subsection (a)(1)(B) of this section to advance funds therefor pursuant to subsection (e) of this section. If an entity requested to advance these funds fails or refuses, within six months after notice from the Secretary of the Interior to agree to do so, that entity's contract shall thereupon terminate. In that event, the Secretary of Energy shall offer to another entity or entities in the same State eligible to contract under subsection (a)(1)(B) the opportunity to so do and thereby to succeed to the rights to capacity and energy under subsection (a)(1)(B) of the entity whose contract terminated: Provided, That an entity as a condition to entering into such a successor contract shall simultaneously with the execution thereof execute a contract with the Secretary of the Interior under subsection (e) pursuant to which it agrees to advance funds covering the deficiency. The Secretary of the Interior shall complete the uprating program, or portions thereof, as promptly as the receipt of funds permits.

(e) The uprating program authorized under section 201(a) of this Act may be undertaken with appropriated funds or with funds advanced under contracts made with the Secretary of the Interior by non-Federal purchasers described in subsection (a)(1)(B) of this section, or a combination thereof. Any funding provided by non-Federal purchasers shall be advanced to the Secretary of the Interior pursuant to the terms and conditions of such contracts.

(f) Notwithstanding any other provisions of the law, funds advanced by non-Federal purchasers for use in the uprating program shall be deposited in the Colorado River Dam Fund and shall be available for the uprating program.

(g) Those amounts advanced by non-Federal purchasers shall be financially integrated as capital costs with other project costs for rate-setting purposes, and shall be returned to those purchasers advancing funds throughout the contract period through credits which include interest costs incurred by such purchasers for funds contributed to the Secretary of the Interior for the uprating program.

(h) The provisions of this section constitute an exercise by the Congress of the right reserved by it in section 5(b) of the Boulder Canyon Project Act, as amended and supplemented, to prescribe terms and conditions for the renewal of contracts for electrical energy generated at Hoover Dam. This section constitutes the exclusive method for disposing of capacity and energy from Hoover Dam for the period beginning June 1, 1987, and ending September 30, 2017.

(i)(1) Notwithstanding any other provision of law, any claim that the provisions of subsection (a) of this section violates any rights to capacity or energy from the Boulder Canyon project is barred unless the complaint is filed within one year after the date of enactment of this Act in the United States Claims Court which shall have exclusive jurisdiction over this action. Any claim that actions taken by any administrative agency of the United States violates any right under this Title or the Boulder Canyon Project Act of the Boulder Canyon Project Adjustment Act is barred unless suit asserting such claim is filed in a Federal court of competent jurisdiction within one year after final refusal of such agency to correct the action complained of.

(2) Any contract entered into pursuant to section 205 or section 207 of this Act shall contain provisions by which any dispute or disagreement as to interpretation or performance of the provisions of this title or of applicable regulations or of the contract may be determined by arbitration or court proceedings. The Secretary of Energy or the Secretary of the Interior, as the case may be, if authorized to act for the United States in such arbitration or court proceedings and, except as provided in paragraph (1) of this subsection, jurisdiction is conferred upon any district court of the United States of proper venue to determine the dispute.

(j) It is the purpose of subsections (c), (h), and (i) of this section to ensure that the rights of contractors for capacity and energy from the Boulder Canyon project for the period beginning June 1, 1987, and ending September 30, 2017, will vest with certainty and finality.

SEC. 206. Reimbursement of funds appropriated for construction of facilities authorized under section 201(a) of this Act, inclusive of any funds advanced by non-Federal purchasers, shall be a repayment requirement of the Boulder Canyon project beginning with the first day of the month following completion of the installation, except that the cost of the visitor facilities program as defined in section 201(a) of this Act shall become a repayment requirement beginning June 1, 1987, or when substantially completed, as determined by the Secretary of the Interior, if later.

SEC. 207. (a) Subject to the provisions of any existing layoff contracts, electrical capacity and energy associated with the United States' interest in the Navajo generating station which is in excess of the pumping requirements of the Central Arizona project and any such needs for desalting and protective pumping facilities as may be required under section 101(b)(2)(B) of the Colorado River Basin Salinity Control Act of 1974, as amended (hereinafter in this Act referred to as "Navajo surplus") shall be marketed and exchanged by the Secretary of Energy pursuant to this section.

(b) Navajo surplus shall be marketed by the Secretary of Energy pursuant to the plan adopted under subsection (c) of this section, directly to, with or through the Arizona Power Authority and/or other entities having the status of perference entities under the reclamation law in accordance with the preference provisions of section 9(c) of the Reclamation Project Act of 1939 and as provided in part IV, section A of the Criteria.

(c) In the marketing and exchanging of Navajo surplus, the Secretary of the Interior shall adopt the plan deemed most acceptable, after consultation with the Secretary of Energy, the Governor of Arizona, and the Central Arizona Water Conservation District (or its successor in interest to the repayment obligation for the Central Arizona project), for the purposes of optimizing the availability of Navajo surplus and providing financial assistance in the timely construction and repayment of construction costs of authorized features of the Central Arizona project. The Secretary of the Interior, in concert with the Secretary of Energy, in accordance with section 14 of the Reclamation Project Act of 1939, shall grant electrical power and energy exchange rights with Arizona entities as necessary to implement the adopted plan: Provided, however, That if exchange rights with Arizona entities are not required to implement the adopted plan, exchange rights may be offered to other entities.

(d) For the purposes provided in subsection (c) of this section, the Secretary of Energy, or the marketing entity or entities under the adopted plan, are authorized to establish and collect or cause to be established and collected, rate components, in addition to those currently authorized, and to deposit the revenues received in the Lower Colorado River Basin Development Fund to be available for such purposes and if required under the adopted plan, to credit, utilize, pay over directly or assign revenues from such additional rate components to make repayment and establish reserves for repayment of funds, including interest incurred, to entities which have advanced funds for the purposes of subsection (c) of this section: Provided, however, That rates shall not exceed levels that allow for an appropriate saving for the contractor.

(e) To the extent that this section may be in conflict with any other provision of law relating to the marketing and exchange of Navajo surplus, or to the disposition of any revenues therefrom, this section shall control.

SEC. 208. Recognizing the expiration of Colorado River storage project (CRSP) contracts in 1989, prior to final reallocation of CRSP power pursuant to existing law, and within one year after enactment of this Act, the Secretary of Energy, acting through the Western Area Power Administration, shall report, to the Committee on Interior and Insular Affairs of the House of Representatives and the Committee on Energy and Natural Resources of the United States Senate, on all Colorado River storage project (CRSP) power resources, including those presently allocated to the Lower Division States, which may be used to financially support the development of authorized projects in the States of the Upper Division (as that term is used in article II of the Colorado River Compact) of the Colorado River Basin.

AMENDMENTS OFFERED BY MR. UDALL

Mr. UDALL. Mr. Chairman, I offer a series of amendments, and I ask unanimous consent that they be considered en bloc.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Arizona?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendments offered by Mr. UDALL: Page 14, line 25, delete the comma and the words "respectively, for the uprating program and";

Page 15, line 5, delete "as of the beginning" and all that follows through line 10, and substitute in lieu thereof the following: "taking into consideration average market yields on outstanding marketable obligations of the United States with remaining periods to maturity comparable to the reimbursement period of the program during the month preceding the fiscal year in which the costs of the program are incurred. To the extent that more than one interest rate is determined pursuant to the preceding sentence, the Secretary of the Treasury shall establish for repayment purposes an interest rate at a weighted averaged of the rates so determined.".

Page 21, line 5, delete "(d)" and all that follows through p. 22, line 3; and reletter the following subsections accordingly;

Page 22, line 5, change the word "may" to "shall" and delete the words "with appropriated funds or";

Page 22, line 8, after the word "section" delete the comma and the words "or a combination thereof.";

Page 22, line 9, delete the word "Any" and change the word "funding" to "Funding";

Page 24, line 10, delete the word "appropriated" through the words "any funds" on line 12;.

Page 24, line 13, after "purchasers", delete the comma, and insert "for the uprating program".

Page 24, line 15, delete "the installation, except that the" and insert "each segment thereof. The".

Mr. UDALL (during the reading). Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the amendments be considered as read and printed in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Arizona?

There was no objection.

Mr. UDALL. Mr. Chairman, I rise to offer an amendment to title 11.

The amendments do the following:

First, they state that the Hoover uprating program shall be undertaken with funds advanced by the power purchasers. The amendment eliminates the authorization for Federal funds for that program. It will be 100 percent, up front from the power customers. The parties to the Hoover settlement are able to do this, they always intended to advance the funds, and this amendment makes that advance a requirement of the program.

Second, the amendment changes the interest rate formula for repayment of the costs of the improvements to the visitors center at Hoover Dam. The tourist center there receives millions of visitors each year. H.R. 4275 authorizes improvements to that center, and makes the repayment of those costs an obligation of the Boulder Canyon Project. In effect, the Hoover power customers pick up the tab for the improvements. The costs are repaid, with interest, by the power customers. The bill as reported by the committee stated that the interest rate would be a cost rated formula. The administration has recommended a different formula, and I am prepared to accept that change for the repayment of the visitor center costs.

Mr. CHENEY. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike the last word, and I rise in support of the amendment on this side of the aisle. We think it is an excellent amendment, and I would urge my colleagues to support it.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendments offered by the gentleman from Arizona (Mr. UDALL).

The amendments were agreed to.

AMENDMENT OFFERED BY MRS. BOXER

Mrs. BOXER. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mrs. BOXER: On page 15, strike out line 19 and all that follows thereafter through page 24, line 9 and insert in lieu thereof the following:

SEC. 205. The power generated at Hoover Dam that is made available by this Act shall be auctioned off at market rates, with auctions conducted by the Secretary of Energy. The Secretary of Energy is authorized to grant to the highest responsible bidder or bidders by competitive bidding, under regulations promulgated in advance, contracts for such power. Such systems of bid, variables, terms, and conditions which the Secretary determines to be useful to accomplish the purposes and policies of this Act shall be submitted to Congress and published in the Federal Register. Within six months after the end of each fiscal year, the Secretary of Energy, in consultation with the Secretary of the Interior, shall report to the Congress with respect to the recovery from the various bids. The Secretary of Energy shall consider whether to auction winter and summer peaking capacity separately, and firm and non-firm energy separately and develop rules and regulations accordingly.

Mrs. BOXER (during the reading). Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the amendment be considered as read and printed in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentlewoman from California?

There was no objection.

Mrs. BOXER. Colleagues, my good friend from Arizona has referred to the Boxer amendment or the Boxer rebellion, as he affectionally called it, as a bad idea. I would like to give you Members a list of some of the people who are supporting the Boxer amendment, which we consider to be a good idea:

The National Taxpayers' Union, the Environmental Defense Fund, the National Audubon Society, the National Wildlife Federation, the Environmental Policy Institute, the Sierra Club, the American Rivers Conservation Council, Friends of the Earth, Utility Consumer Action Network.

These are just some of the organizations, Mr. Chairman, who are supporting this amendment.

Mr. Chairman, I have good and respected friends on both sides of this issue and that always makes it difficult. But, Mr. Chairman, my amendment, introduced on behalf of many Members of this House, who you will hear from, addresses the issues of fairness, wisdom, and fiscal responsibility in our water and power policy.

The purpose of my amendment is to correct an inequity and to recognize reality in the way the Federal Government is selling power from the Hoover Dam. My amendment would open up this source of power to competitive bid, broadening the Hoover Dam market and lowering the Federal deficit by $3.5 billion over 10 years.

Back when the Boulder Canyon Project Act was passed in 1928, contracts were negotiated to divide up that power that was generated by Hoover Dam, and 50-year contracts were put in place in 1937 to provide for the sale of that power at a cost to a selected group of entities identified in H.R. 4275, which is before us today.

H.R. 4275, without my amendment, Mr. Chairman, continues to subsidize power by renewing these contracts for 30 more years to those same entities.

I come from California which had 6 million people in the 1930's and was the sixth largest State. Now we have 25 million people and we are the largest State. We have grown fourfold.

Lower prices from the Hoover Dam contributed to this growth. And in the days, Mr. Chairman, when the West was being settled, it may have made sense for the Government to promote growth by subsidizing water and power projects.

Today the West has dramatically changed and water and power are in short supply. Without our amendment, Mr. Chairman, energy conservation is discouraged and these valuable resources are squandered due to a pricing policy which is older than most Members in this Chamber.

Without our amendment, H.R. 4275 is wrong environmentally, it is wrong economically, and it is not fair. The power allottees that are identified in this legislation will receive 30-year contracts at depression era prices for a 21st century resource.

My amendment would open up the door for others who were not part of these negotiations 50 years ago and would allow them to make a bid on this resource.

□ 1330

This would also allow all the residents of California, Utah, Colorado, New Mexico, who have never had access to this Hoover power, it would give them a chance to bid on it.

Fifty years of bargain basement benefits would seem long enough for the members of the exclusive Hoover club to tap the Federal Treasury and continue to receive benefits.

The average rate of electricity is 10 times the Hoover price. What is this underpricing of Hoover's energy costing the taxpayers of our Nation? According to reputable studies quoted in the New York Times, in the 8 years, 1980 to 1987, the last few years of the original contract period, the cost to the U.S. Treasury is nearly a billion dollars.

Looking forward for the proposed 30-year contract before us, the subsidy to Hoover's beneficiaries will be even more massive and the loss to the Treasury even more drastic. In 1984 dollars, just for the first 10 years of the proposed contract period, the subsidy is over $3.5 billion.

Mr. Chairman, the San Diego Tribune has summed up the economic argument the best. It says, "The Federal Government, while running a record deficit of $200 billion a year, is preparing to review sweetheart contracts to sell Hoover Dam electric power for peanuts." Our amendment would bring fairness to consumers; revenues to ease the Federal deficit and a sound approach to the Nation's water and power resources.

Quoting from the New York Times, it says, "Unless the House has the courage to put national interests ahead of regional, the giveaway will continue for 30 years."

I thank you and I ask support for this amendment.

Mr. MILLER of California. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike the last word, and I rise in support of the amendment.

Mr. Chairman, this amendment is very straightforward. This amendment simply asks the question: Whether or not we are going to continue a privilege for a few power customers of the Hoover Dam, a privilege that is not shared equally with others, a privilege that others do not have an opportunity to participate in. The cost of that privilege to the rest of the taxpayers of this country could be some $3.5 billion over the next 10 years.

I think at a time when this House has anguished over budgets, when this House has anguished over deficits, when we have cut back health care to get a billion dollars, when we have cut back nutrition programs to get a quarter of a billion dollars, when we have cut back programs for highways, when we have cut back programs for education, for hundreds of millions of dollars, trying to make a downpayment on the deficit, the issue here is: Are we going to continue the policies of 50 years ago and are we today going to plunge ahead long for another 30 years to continue those power policies that will be picked up by every ratepayer, every taxpayer, who is not privileged to belong to the Hoover club?

Let us look at what that means. That means that 30 years from now, we will be selling power based upon practices that are 80 years old. One of the people who is opposing the Boxer amendment, said that the theory is that the Federal Government should not make a profit from the sale of power.

Why not? Why not, when all other ratepayers in the area must pay the going price? And if Hoover power is put out to bid, what will be the results? Those utilities who seek to participate will bid to the point where it reaches the replacement power, which they could generate by building their own facility. That will bring it up to the market rate.

I sat on the Interior Committee for 8 years prior to going to the Budget Committee, and what we are airing here today is basically what has been done behind closed doors. We talked about the Bureau of Reclamation—dams, waterways, and canals—as if they are the sole purview of the Western United States.

I just want to say to my colleagues who come from the rest of the United States, we have enjoyed these programs, that you can see the Western migration of crops and peoples and profits and jobs. We thank you for paying it.

The question you must ask yourselves is: Do you want to continue to send the bill to your ratepayers who are purchasing coal, who are purchasing home heating oil, who are purchasing oil to fire electric generating capacity. Do you want to continue to send them the bill for the next 30 years to perpetuate the privileges for the purchasers of Hoover power? Or should we simply ask these people to do what other utility customers has been required to do; to realize that this is an energy world that is different than it was 50 years ago; to realize that it is a resource-different world than it was 50 years ago. The only thing that the Boxer amendment requires is that those taxpayers pay their fair share. That is all. There is no penalty, there is no prejudice, there is no favoritism.

Some charge this is a break with the past. Yes; it is, and you should look at those past practices. Because if you look at the history of reclamation, if you look at the history of the western dam-building program, those who got there first got the most.

What we have been doing in this Congress is protecting that privilege with 40-year fixed price contracts, with 50-year stretched-out, interest-free repayments, costly privileges that are not extended to anybody else in the rest of the United States.

We have an opportunity to review those pricing practices or to plunge on for the next 30 years, and lock in the practices of 50 years ago. Go home and tell your constituents that you exercised oversight when you vote against this amendment. It will be laughable to call that oversight, because we will have done nothing to correct the pricing policies of 50 years ago.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from California (Mr. MILLER) has expired.

(By unanimous consent, Mr. MILLER of California was allowed to proceed for 2 additional minutes.)

Mr. MILLER of California. When you go home and tell the elderly, when you tell the schoolchildren, the people in nutrition programs how we shared the burden for the downpayment on the deficit, how we shared the price, and the pain, and the suffering. I want you to remind them that there was a select group of people that when we had the opportunity to raise the revenue, to share the cost among millions of ratepayers, we did not have the courage to parcel it out.

I would hope that is not what you would take home this weekend as you go back to your constituents. I would hope that you would be able to say that where we found privilege that could no longer be justified, we sought to make those individuals pay their fair share.

This is in the best interests of the Federal Treasury, it is in the best interests of the power consumption, it is in the best interest of resource use in this country, and I would hope that all Members of this Congress would support the Boxer amendment.

Mr. HUCKABY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MILLER of California. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. HUCKABY. I thank the gentleman.

Mr. Chairman, I would like to commend the gentleman from California for his statement. I think he is right on target with his remarks. I think if anyone in this House considers himself a fiscal conservative, if anyone in this House is seriously concerned about the deficits, the fiscal monetary status of this country, this vote here corrects as much of an injustice as the most glaring of loopholes in our tax code.

Mr. MILLER of California. Mr. Chairman, I thank the gentleman from Louisiana for his remarks. I would like the gentleman to reflect where else we could go in the budget and get $3.5 billion, as we can in this single amendment, as painlessly as this is, by asking the people be treated no differently than others in the United States.

Mr. HUCKABY. The gentleman is exactly right. All we are asking people to do is to pay the fair market price for their electricity.

Mr. MILLER of California. I thank the gentleman.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from California (Mr. MILLER) has expired.

(By unanimous consent, Mr. MILLER of California was allowed to proceed for 1 additional minute.)

Mr. MILLER of California. I yield to the gentleman from California (Mr. PASHAYAN).

Mr. PASHAYAN. I thank the gentleman for yielding.

Is it my understanding from the gentleman that he is advocating that a fair market, a formula that involves fair-market price, supply and demand, competing in a marketplace, that that would determine the cost?

□ 1340

Mr. MILLER of California. That is, in fact, what the Boxer amendment does. And I assume that those utilities who sought to participate in the pool of power that is provided by Hoover Dam would bid up to the point to which it would be the cost of replacing that power. At that point, they would make a determination whether or not to build their own facility, because if the bidding went beyond that level, the economics would dictate that they build their own facility or buy it from another source.

Mr. PASHAYAN. Speaking of economics, the gentleman is aware that a certain water agency in his district pays a cost of $3.50 per acre-foot of water and I am sure the gentleman is aware that if we added the actual operation and maintenance to that, that would raise that by 200 percent and if we added the actual cost of the capital that would raise it again by 200 percent and I have not even calculated what the interest would be——

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from California (Mr. MILLER) has expired.

(By unanimous consent, Mr. MILLER of California was allowed to proceed for 30 additional seconds.)

Mr. MILLER of California. There is one thing about the gentleman, he is always predictable. I am well aware of that water rate in the Contra Costa Water District. And if the gentleman would have listened in the Interior Committee over the years, I have time and again said that when that contract comes up for review, as this one is now, I expect those water rates to be raised to reflect the cost to the Federal Government.

Mr. PASHAYAN. The actual costs?

Mr. MILLER of California. That has been historically my position throughout the debate on the reclamation program, throughout the debate on the Central Valley project.

Mr. PASHAYAN. I accept that. I just wanted to be sure the gentleman was on record that the cost would go up at least $14 an acre-foot, if not more.

Mr. SWIFT. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike the requisite number of words, and I rise in opposition to the amendment.

The gentleman who just left the well said that when the contracts are up on his water he will expect a price rise to the cost to the Federal Government. That is all in the world that is going on with Hoover Dam right now. It is being sold at cost to the Federal Government. So apparently all he will do when his particular interest comes up is agree to the costs going up as much as we are trying to maintain them on this particular project.

We have also used the word "subsidy" rather loosely. The dictionary has the definition of the word "subsidy" and by that dictionary definition I think that the Members will find that there is no subsidy being paid. It gives the impression when they say you are going to save $3½ billion that we are paying $3½ billion out of the Federal Treasury, subsidizing ratepayers in the Southwest. And that is absolutely absurd.

In fact, the ratepayers of the Southwest have paid for Hoover Dam with interest. Now that they have paid for it with interest, this amendment wants to make them pay for it all over again.

We have said that these rates are too low. And then we say that the rates are not adequately shared. So the Boxer amendment comes up with a proposal which will assure that no one will get low rates. And that is done in the name of the consumer, come on.

Mr. McCAIN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SWIFT. I am happy to yield to the gentleman from Arizona.

Mr. McCAIN. I thank the gentleman for yielding.

Also, in addition to that, we are discussing, I believe, a large increase in rates that now somehow we have the perception that is going to be borne by the utilities. Those increases in rates will be passed on to the consumer.

The consumer happens to be the old, the elderly, the handicapped, and others in our society who cannot afford further increases in their utility prices.

I anticipate someone like the previous speaker in the well tells us what to tell our constituents when we go back to our districts, a bit gratuitous I might add. But the fact is that I am not going to go back and tell the older people and the handicapped and the elderly that their rates are going up, that they may not even be able to afford these increases in utility bills because we are going to reduce the deficit and balance the budget.

Would the gentleman agree with that?

Mr. SWIFT. Certainly, I would agree with that. I would agree with the gentleman.

Making one last point, Mr. Chairman, I just said to the chairman of the committee a little while ago you might be able to divide the old people from the young people around here by finding out who knows what the preference clause is. I find myself, under those strictures, an old person.

What this amendment will do, without benefit of any hearings, is change a 60-year-old policy of this country that said that public utilities, in effect cooperatives, utilities owned by consumers shall have preference to publicly generated power.

Now, maybe that is a policy that in some people's judgment is a policy whose time is gone. Some people might argue that is no longer relevant.

If that is the case, then introduce legislation and let us hold hearings and understand it. But we would hear today I think an amendment that is thought out to be something that is going to bring equity, but which simply does not understand what it is tinkering with. We would carelessly eliminate a policy without any serious consideration to what we are doing and the implications of it to publicly owned facilities that serve customers who are their owners. That simply cannot be done on the floor with an amendment such as this that is not thoroughly examined.

If we want to change fundamental policy, there is a process to do that in this country. But let us not change radically a fundamental policy of this century in this Congress, on the floor, with an amendment that has never held any hearings.

Mrs. BOXER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SWIFT. I yield to the gentlewoman from California.

Mrs. BOXER. I thank the gentleman, my good friend from Washington, for yielding.

I would like to point out that the Congress in its wisdom, 50 years ago, said that we, the successors of those Members, have the obligation to take a look at these 50-year-old contracts. We are doing that. I think we are doing it in a thoughtful way because what we are basically saying is an issue of fairness the Hoover club pays one-half cent per kilowatt-hour and everyone else pays 6 cents average.

The fact of the matter is that if we were to use the fairness argument, it would redound to the benefit of taxpayers throughout this country.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Washington (Mr. SWIFT) has expired.

By unanimous consent, Mr. SWIFT was allowed to proceed for 2 additional minutes.)

Mr. SWIFT. Mr. Chairman, I would like to enter into a colloquy with the gentlewoman.

The preference clause. Does the gentlewoman know what the preference clause's purpose was?

Mrs. BOXER. If the gentleman would yield further, the gentleman certainly has explained it to us today. I wanted to point out to the gentleman on that clause that the fact is there are many public power companies in the State of California, in the State of Colorado, who would like to have a shot at that power who are now unable because of the private utilities.

Mr. SWIFT. I understand that, but the gentlewoman's amendment says that you will sell this power to the highest bidder, public or private.

Mrs. BOXER. That is correct.

Mr. SWIFT. That violates the preference clause. That changes U.S. policy with regard to public power and it does so, I think, unintended, but it, nevertheless, does it and that is a radical change in fundamental policy with regard to energy generation in this country.

Mrs. BOXER. I think the gentleman is perfectly right in suggesting that this is a change. It is a change for good reason. This Congress cannot be bound by what Congress did in the 1930's, 50 years ago. This Congress has an obligation to look at policies and I think when we do——

Mr. SWIFT. I am not disagreeing with the gentlewoman on that.

Mrs. BOXER. Oh, I thought the gentleman was.

Mr. SWIFT. No; what I am suggesting is that if we are going to make that fundamental a change, we clearly have the authority to do it and if the majority of us think it is the right thing to do, we can do it. But we should not be doing it in an amendment that was drawn up by someone who did not even know what the preference clause is.

My point is that unintentionally the gentlewoman's amendment does violation to something I do not think the gentlewoman even intended to touch. The processes of this institution provide a mechanism by which we can examine the preference clause and if we want to, sure, we can change it. But we should not be doing it inadvertently by an amendment on the floor.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Washington (Mr. SWIFT) has again expired.

(By unanimous consent, Mr. SWIFT was allowed to proceed for 2 additional minutes.)

Mrs. BOXER. If the gentleman will yield further, the fact of the matter is that we are taking another look as the Congress so instructed us to do way back 50 years ago. If the gentleman is suggesting that by this process today, in which many Members of this House, perhaps more than I have seen on the floor in a long while, can participate and give their views is not an adequate discussion, that the gentleman is right, but I would further say that in the settlement that has been discussed by the fine gentleman from Arizona, only a few Members of Congress were involved in that, in coming up with a settlement.

□ 1350

And I say that this is more democratic, what we are doing here today, taking a look as the Congress asked us to, after 50 years, at these contracts and suggesting that in fairness to the taxpayers from all over this great Nation that we open this up to competitive bid.

Mr. SWIFT. If I can reclaim my time, what the gentleman from Arizona did was to take this legislation through the subcommittee, through the full committee and to the floor of the House in the normal open process that we use regularly in this body. And I am merely suggesting that if the gentlewoman from California wants to eliminate the preference clause, it should go through the same process as well.

Mr. FRANK. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SWIFT. I yield to the gentleman from Massachusetts.

Mr. FRANK. I thank the gentleman from Washington.

Is the gentleman suggesting that the Interior Committee is prepared to bring such legislation to the floor? It is a little hard on us who are not on the committee to tell us we should not try to do things through amendment if that is their only option. It was not my understanding that the Interior Committee was ready to bring such a bill through, but if we were to get some assurances that some such fundamental legislation might come forth, perhaps that might then be a more appropriate forum.

Mr. SWIFT. If the gentleman will allow me to reclaim my time. I think I understood the gentleman. That is always a problem with the gentleman from Massachusetts.

Mr. FRANK. If the gentleman will yield again, I will be glad to repeat it.

Mr. SWIFT. If the gentleman would like to introduce legislation to repeal the preference clause, I am sure the gentleman from Arizona would be happy to discuss it with him and probably hold hearings.

Mr. FRANK. If the gentleman will yield, I have only been here 3½ years, but I do know the difference between discussing, holding hearings, and getting a bill to the floor. I take the gentleman's answer to be the negative pregnant, and that is why we are doing it in an amendment, because the gentleman knows that any bill looking at the whole thing would not see the light of day.

The CHAIRMAN pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from Washington (Mr. SWIFT) has expired.

(By unanimous consent, Mr. SWIFT was allowed to proceed for 30 additional seconds.)

Mr. SWIFT. Mr. Chairman, I am sure that the gentleman from Massachusetts, who is a superb debater, knows he has just made a debating point. But I do not think the gentleman would argue with the principle that a fundamental change in a basic policy that has stood over half a century should not be changed without thoughtful consideration by this body through the normal process. That is all I am saying. As a responsible legislator, I know the gentleman would agree with me.

Mr. FRANK. If the gentleman will yield, does the gentleman not think we are engaging in thoughtful consideration right now? I think the gentleman is.

Mr. SWIFT. Not through the totality of the process, with the special expertise of the committees. If the gentleman argues that we can do everything automatically here on the floor, then we should abolish all of the committees and subcommittees. Is that what the gentleman is saying?

Mr. FRANK. Not automatically.

Mr. MOORHEAD. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike the requisite number of words.

Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to this amendment. The people of California, Arizona, and Nevada and many areas of the West have very serious power and water problems that are not present in many parts of the country. This legislation was designed after many months of negotiations between the water and power leaders of the Western States trying to work out many of their mutual problems with each other. Arizona and Nevada desired more power from Hoover Dam than they had been getting in the past. It was necessary to work out something so that they could get that, which their tremendous growth has entitled them to and which they need.

This amendment really would destroy that agreement that has been prepared. I know many of my friends from the San Francisco area feel that they are not involved, that their interests are not involved by this legislation. But they are. Because if you raise the price of electric power at Hoover Dam, as this amendment would do, you are going to make the cost of pumping the water from the Colorado River to the Los Angeles and San Diego areas and other places extremely expensive, and it will be cheaper for southern California then to get their water through the aqueduct from northern California. The people from northern California will be very definitely affected. They have been trying to get southern California to buy their water from the Colorado River and to get it from that source. But to force the price up beyond the price of northern California water, which this amendment would do, will force us to be in competition with them and to depend upon northern California for a larger share of water than we are now getting.

I do not think that will be beneficial to California or any part of it. And I hope that the Members of the House will realize that this is specifically a Western problem. We try to help other parts of the State with their problems. But to single out Hoover Dam as the only area where we are going to violate the long-time established principle for the sale of electric power and to charge what the market will bear, when that is contrary to all of the principles we have ever followed with federally produced power, would be a mistake, it would be unfair and it would be harmful to the San Francisco area as well as to the rest of the State of California.

Mr. BROWN of California. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike the requisite number of words, and I rise in opposition to the amendment.

Mr. Chairman, I am somewhat reluctant to intervene in this amendment because I have not been on the floor to hear all of the debate and I may have missed some important points. I also am not on the committee and I am not as familiar with all of the details as perhaps I should be. And, of course, I have a very high regard and admiration for the author of the amendment and for the distinguished gentleman from northern California (Mr. MILLER), whose eloquence, as I observed it on the tube, is what drew me over here to participate in the debate.

But although I recognize that the amendment was offered as a matter of high principle, I have not yet figured out what the principle is. I do not know whether it is one aimed at the restoring of free market forces, in which case I am sure the gentlewoman will support the deregulation of natural gas and allow that price to rise astronomically to her constituents, as her amendment would allow electricity prices to do for my constituents. I suspect that the principle that is really at stake in her mind is the one that I think she referred to, whether we should continue to have economic and population growth in California. I think I probably agree with her that we have too many people in California, and I would like to do something about it, but I am not sure that this is the proper vehicle to use in that connection.

I was struck by the eloquence of her arguments and the eloquence of the gentleman from California (Mr. MILLER). I would have been much more struck if they were proposing something that adversely affected their constituents, which it does not. And I would have been much more struck if they were willing to apply this principle of devotion to the free market and its operation to some of the other areas involving energy pricing, which they do not. Since they do not take those positions, I felt that their eloquence perhaps was not quite as effective as it should be.

I have lived in the shadow of Hoover Dam and the Colorado River all my life. I was raised a few miles from the river. My constituents depend upon the dam for both water and for power. I am deeply concerned about the future of this entire operation. As I have indicated many times, there are many problems here, with regard to the distribution and pricing of both power and water, and I would like to approach them and to solve them. But to adopt this amendment at this time is not the proper way to go about resolving the problems of the Southwest. Whether it is pricing problems or growth problems or power distribution problems, or whatever, the kinds of serious policy issues that are raised by this amendment deserve far more consideration. If we were to adopt this amendment, of course, it goes without saying that we would have to look at the pricing of power for the whole of the Northwest. It is going to be affected. We would have to look at the pricing of power for other dams around the country, other Federal projects. All of them would be affected. This is not something the implications of which only involve a few public jurisdictions in southern California. The implications, the ramifications of this, extend throughout the United States.

While I might even agree with the gentlewoman as to the direction in which she is moving, I would not want to move in this direction without the opportunity for full examination of all of the ramifications in every part of the country and for a full exploration of how this could be done in a reasonable and rational way. This amendment does not achieve that.

So I would urge the gentlewoman to press her case—and I am sure that she will after this amendment is defeated—in the form of legislation which will address the whole problem of the pricing of federally generated power throughout the United States. I would be willing to consider some changes. But I am not willing to consider changes which would drastically raise the prices of electrical energy for my constituents, and for 1 million others in southern California, at the same time I am trying to keep natural gas prices down and keep oil prices down and keep other kinds of energy prices down. It flies in the face of practicality and reality.

Mr. UDALL. Mr. Chairman, I see that we have 8 or 10 additional Members that would like to be heard, and I know that some of my colleagues are concerned about getting out at a reasonable hour. This is one of two amendments that will take some time.

Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that all debate on the pending amendment and all amendments——

Mr. ALBOSTA. Mr. Chairman, I object.

The CHAIRMAN. Objection is heard.

Mr. PETRI. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike the requisite number of words.

Mr. Chairman, I support the amendment proposed by our distinguished colleague from California.

Once again, we have an opportunity to put national interests ahead of regional, to reduce the deficit, promote energy conservation, protect the environment, and guarantee fair play for consumers. For 50 years the Federal Government has recovered only operating costs and capital at low interest for power production from the Hoover Dam, while those allotees who got the output have not had to pay the true value of the power.

Today Hoover Dam power is being sold to a few lucky utilities at one-tenth of its value on the open market. This issue is crystal clear. This sweetheart deal has gone on long enough. If we do not put a stop to it, we will be giving away literally billions of dollars that should belong to all the taxpayers of this Nation. Today, we have a real chance to make a dent in the Federal deficit, by having those who benefit from Federal hydroelectric power pay what it is worth.

It makes no sense, nor is it fair, for those who live in Florida, Pennsylvania, Virginia, Wisconsin, or any State or community that is not a beneficiary of a Federal hydropower contract to subsidize the electric bills of those who do.

Furthermore, such subsidies actually discourage energy conservation and foster its waste. When the price of electric power is kept artificially low, the incentive to conserve disappears and waste becomes more likely. Those environmental groups which have worked to make everyone aware of the consequences of this simple truth are to be commended.

Mr. Chairman, I urge the adoption of this amendment which would allocate the energy resources of the Hoover Dam on the basis of open competition at a fair and reasonable price.

Mr. STARK. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike the requisite number of words.

Mr. Chairman, I support the amendment of the gentlewoman from California (Mrs. BOXER) to require that the power generated be auctioned off rather than sold at 1930's prices.

The gentleman from California who preceded me in the well raised some important issues. The most important issue is that he did define the issue, and that is for those few people in southern California to get a ripoff price on a Federal resource. Now, the last person who tried that was Secretary Watt, who attempted to sell the coal under our national parkland at a cheap price to the energy companies, and we put an end to that. I do not think we are creating any new Federal policy today; we are just saying that you cannot steal national, Federal resources for a little group of people and the rest of us are not going to pay the freight.

That includes, as my distinguished colleague, Mr. MILLER, from Contra Costa County indicated, he is willing to see the farmers in the delta pay their full price for the water, and we are all willing to see those corporate farmers who are ripping us off even worse than Los Angeles, in the central valley of California, pay their fair share when that time comes.

So we are establishing a policy here today, and that is no more free lunch for special groups of people to get something that belongs to all of us. I might parenthetically point out that I have been besieged, my office is knee deep in lobbyists right now, looking for a special alternate energy tax credit which will cost us another couple of billion dollars if they have their way, in an upcoming tax conference. Their idea is that they just need this extra couple of billion dollars until they can gets their costs down and they can collect the full price. We cannot have it both ways; we have got a couple of billion dollars for the people of Los Angeles, and a couple of billion dollars for the wind farms in the Altamont Pass in my district, they are all wrong. We ought not, in a country where power is fungible, power can be transmitted from one coast to the other; if it is Federal power and a Federal asset, all Americans ought to share in it at the same price or at the same cost.

I would urge the adoption of the Boxer amendment on the principles of fairness and equity and preserving our national resources.

Mr. FRENZEL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STARK. I yield to the gentleman from Minnesota.

Mr. FRENZEL. I thank the gentleman for yielding.

Mr. Chairman, I think the gentleman's original point was right on. If this House cannot establish policy, who can? I remember last year or the year before last, we established a diesel tax for river operators which undid a 70-year-old policy in the Panama Canal Act. We did not have hearings on the Panama Canal Act; we decided it was good policy to make those people pay for Federal resources they were using, and it is good policy today to do what the gentleman says.

Mr. STARK. I thank the gentleman for his remarks.

AMENDMENT OFFERED BY MR. ALBOSTA

Mr. ALBOSTA. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment to the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. ALBOSTA to the amendment offered by Mrs. BOXER: After the final sentence of the amendment offered by Mrs. BOXER, add the following: "Notwithstanding any other provisions of the Act, any revenue generated from the sale of power at Hoover Dam in excess of expenses of operation and maintenance of said dam incurred by the United States, shall be paid into the United States Treasury.".

The CHAIRMAN pro tempore (Mr. BARNARD). The gentleman from Michigan (Mr. ALBOSTA) is recognized for 5 minutes.

Mr. ALBOSTA. Mr. Chairman, I believe that the amendment offered by the gentlewoman from California, BARBARA BOXER, is in the general interest of the public. The amendment I am offering to Congresswoman BOXER's amendment perfects and clarifies her amendment, and will increase the probability of my colleagues' amendment passing. Members from both sides of the aisle agree with me that we have to reduce the Federal deficit. I do not believe that any one area of the country should unfairly benefit from a Federal facility. The 50-year agreement signed in 1937 gave the utilities that participated in the Hoover project 50 years of cheap electricity. These contracts should not have been signed in the first place. By selling this power at cost we have already lost billions of dollars in revenue. The giveaway has to stop now.

Some Members have questioned whether the Boxer amendment should be discussed before the full House. My colleagues have suggested that this is a matter for the Interior and Insular Affairs Committee. As the gentleman from Massachusetts said, this issue needs to be discussed before the full House because regional interests would prevent the committee from reporting out legislation containing this amendment to the House floor for consideration.

Let me point out a few other things, Mr. Chairman, that I believe are very important. I believe all Americans should benefit from our Nation's natural resources. We need to construct and expand hydroelectric facilities, putting our rivers to work to benefit all citizens.

The Hoover Dam, one of the largest dams in the United States was built with tax payers' money. Michigan taxpayers, Massachusetts taxpayers, taxpayers from all over the country contributed to the building of this dam. Why should not the people who paid for this dam, benefit from the power this dam produces? Why should just residents of California, Arizona, and Nevada receive all of the benefits? They should not. I strongly oppose giving cheap power to this small region of the country while the rest of the Nation pays over 1,000 percent more for their electricity. To meet the future energy needs in my State consumers power has begun building a nuclear plant in Midland, Mich., but we can no longer finance it. We need the power. There is no question about that. Some people have suggested that we go to Canada and buy it. Fine, Canada is a good neighbor, but Michigan does not want to become reliant upon Canada for electricity even though it is less expensive. America should rely on resources within our own boundaries.

For example, Mr. Chairman, in my own particular we are paying approximately 11 cents per kilowatt-hour. In addition to paying outrageous utility bills, my State is facing a possible energy shortage in 1990.

I suggest that we find a way to help build nuclear plants in this country. It is a source of natural energy that can benefit all of us. Those of us who do not have the facilities like the Hoover Dam in our States, should be able to benefit somehow from other sources of energy. We should develop a national energy policy that benefits all areas of our country.

Michigan is looking at a 60-percent rate increase if this plant is built. That is what they are talking about right now, a 60-percent rate increase. Businesses and homeowners alike cannot already afford these increases, several groups of business people in Michigan, including General Motors and Ford are saying that they do not want that plant finished, they want to buy the power from Canada instead. If they get power from Canada, Michigan will lose thousands of jobs and become dependant on Canada for our energy needs.

I believe, Mr. Chairman, that we should adopt Congresswoman BOXER's as amended by my amendment. I would hope that the gentlewoman from California would accept my amendment. After she accepts or rejects my amendment, I would like to continue my discussion of her amendment.

Mrs. BOXER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ALBOSTA. I would yield to the gentlewoman from California.

Mrs. BOXER. I thank the gentleman for yielding.

Mr. Chairman, I think the gentleman's amendment is a perfecting amendment. Basically, it says that the taxpayers who paid for the Hoover Dam, once we have covered all the costs to maintain that great facility, anything above that would go into the Federal Treasury.

I want to say on the record that I appreciate this amendment. It is what we had in mind. I think it makes our amendment stronger. I definitely accept it.

Mr. ALBOSTA. I thank the gentlewoman for accepting my amendment. I would move for adoption of my amendment.

Mr. PASHAYAN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ALBOSTA. I yield to the gentleman from California.

Mr. PASHAYAN. I thank the gentleman for yielding.

Mr. Chairman, would the gentleman mind covering the point again that he was making on the nuclear installation in his district, or near his district, that would increase rates by 60—was that percent? I did not quite get that.

Mr. ALBOSTA. By 60 percent. Commercial rates in Michigan right now in most utilities are about 11 cents per kilowatt-hour. The Hoover power is being sold at about six-tenths of 1 cent per kilowatt-hour. I am talking about the prospect of our rates being raised from 11 cents a kilowatt-hour to about 17 or 18 cents per kilowatt-hour.

Mr. PASHAYAN. All right. I just wanted to ask the gentleman if he is in favor of raising it?

Mr. ALBOSTA. I am not in favor of raising rates. What I am saying is that we should be able to find a way to share all of our natural resources.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Michigan (Mr. ALBOSTA) has expired.

(By unanimous consent, Mr. ALBOSTA was allowed to proceed for 4 additional minutes.)

Mr. PASHAYAN. If the gentleman will yield further, if the gentleman is not in favor of raising rates by 60 percent in Michigan, why is he in favor of supporting an amendment that will raise rates in California? That is why I thought the gentleman was in favor of raising the rates.

Mr. ALBOSTA. Mr. Chairman, the time is mine, and I would reclaim it and answer the gentleman from California.

Michigan is in a dilemma. There is no question about it. We do not have a public powerplant, such as Hoover Dam, that generate large amounts of electricity at unbelievably low rates.

Mr. PASHAYAN. That is why you build utilities.

Mr. ALBOSTA. That is very true. A good example of Federal funds being used to increase our country's energy production is the Tennessee Valley Authority. I believe that energy projects are a wise use of Federal funds.

Clearly Michigan's residents are going to have to pay more for our electricity one way or the other. What I fear is the mass exodus of businesses from Michigan to States such as, Arizona, California, and Nevada who have dramatically lower electricity rates. Utility rates are one of the main factors businessmen consider when choosing a State to set up their business.

Michigan or Ohio or some other State that does not have that access to these natural resources, will experience a huge increase in unemployment. For every percentage point unemployment increases the Federal Government spends $28 billion in financing efforts to help people who are unemployed. It makes no sense at all to continue that process, an energy policy, that increases unemployment in my State.

Not only are we in trouble in that sense, but problems will arise. When businesses move to those particular areas, wherever those areas might be, we will find that the infrastructure is not large enough to meet the increased demand. Soon my colleagues from these areas will come back to the Federal Government and say "Now we have to have more water canals, and now we have to have more natural gas or we have to have more streets or roads," or something else.

It does not make any sense. Hospitals in my State have been built to accommodate a certain population as were the schools and the educational institutions. All of these things are in place. Why displace thousands of people because the Federal Government provides one region of the country with low-cost electricity attracting businesses from other areas of the country.

Mr. PASHAYAN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield further?

Mr. ALBOSTA. I will yield to the gentleman from California for a moment. I am running out of time and I want to yield time to my colleagues on this side.

Mr. PASHAYAN. I understand. Just one more point, if I may.

Mr. Chairman, I still am a bit confused by the position of the gentleman when he says it is fair not to raise the rate in Michigan by 60 percent, but it is fair to raise the cost in California by whatever percent. I just do not understand that the gentleman is being consistent.

Mr. ALBOSTA. I believe that the Boxer amendment would create a fair energy policy and let those utility companies bid on this power, and if it would generate another $3½ billion, put that back into the Federal Treasury to help reduce our deficits. I think that is very important that we concentrate on that and stop subsidizing cheap electricity paid for by my constituents for the benefit of California and other Western States.

Mr. LUJAN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ALBOSTA. I yield to the gentleman from New Mexico.

Mr. LUJAN. I thank the gentleman for yielding.

Mr. Chairman, I would like to correct some statements that have been made here.

Both the gentleman in the well and the gentlewoman from California said that those who paid for the dams should get the benefit of the dams and that it was the taxpayers of the United States generally who built dams in the Western part of the United States.

Let me tell the gentleman that that is not correct. The ones who end up paying for those dams are the users. There is a reimbursement to the Federal Government and, as a matter of fact, in the case of Hoover Dam, it has been paid for already by the users, not by the general taxpayers.

Mr. ALBOSTA. Mr. Chairman, I am running out of time. I reclaim my time.

Let me say to the gentleman from New Mexico that I am on the Public Works Committee and I know how we use the cost-benefit ratios. I know how we build water projects. There is no question about it. The money does come from the taxpayers, my constituents in Michigan. This is one of the reasons, Michigan is 49 out of 50 States in terms of how much the State gets back compared to how much tax dollars are sent to Washington from Michigan. This has to stop and one of the best ways to start is by ending the subsidy for cheap public power. My State will no longer be sacrificed on the altar of economic development for the West. Enough is enough and I urge passage of the Boxer amendment.

Mr. UDALL. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that all debate on the pending Boxer amendment and all amendments thereto close at 3 o'clock.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Arizona?

Mr. FRENZEL. Mr. Chairman, reserving the right to object, under my reservation, I have been seeking the Chair's recognition for some time and I think there are others who have also been trying to get their 5 minutes.

I wonder if I might ask the chairman if he would defer that motion for another 10 or 15 minutes and see how the land lies. I think when a Member is not a member of the committee, it becomes very difficult to get a word in. So I wonder if you could hold up on your request.

Mr. UDALL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FRENZEL. I would be glad to yield to the gentleman from Arizona.

Mr. UDALL. I would be glad to accede to his request. I thought that there was a general feeling that a number of Members only wanted a minute or two to get on the record. I will agree with the gentleman's request and withhold.

I will send all the Members who are worried about getting to the airport over to him for comfort.

Mr. FRENZEL. I thank the chairman for his cooperation, and I will lend any of them my car who need special transportation. It is only 14 years old.

Mr. UDALL. Mr. Chairman, I withdraw my unanimous-consent request.

□ 1420

Mr. FRANK. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike the requisite number of words.

Mr. Chairman, I hope that both the amendments, the amendment offered by the gentleman from Michigan (Mr. ALBOSTA) and the underlying amendment offered by the gentlewoman from California (Mrs. BOXER) are adopted.

This is a difficult issue for many of us who count ourselves as liberals. On the one hand, we have some important principles of truth and fairness and equity, and on the other hand we have the enormous respect and affection we feel for the gentleman from Arizona.

I would just say, Mr. Chairman, at this point to those who have found me insufficiently supportive of the principle of prayer in public places that I guess I am almost ready to address a prayer to my friend, the gentleman from Arizona, who has been my leader on so many issues for so many years: Lead us not into temptation any longer on the question of water projects.

The principle that the gentlewoman from California is adopting is one which in most circumstances would not be controversial, that energy today, in 1984, not in 1934, ought to be priced at its cost. This is not meant in denigration of the great works that were done in the New Deal or in the immediate post-New Deal periods. This is no denigration of the important role that public power played as a yardstick. It is no denigration of the need to promote through collective activity Government sponsorship of development in places where it is difficult.

I welcome the latter day conversion of many of the more conservative Members of this House to what was once deemed a terribly radical set of policies. We all now agree that those played a very important role. But today conditions are different, and it is not a repudiation of the past to understand that things have changed. It is simply a recognition of change.

What we are saying is that today the kind of prodevelopment policies, the kind of regional subsidy that was embodied in this particular policy, is no longer relevant. That does not mean that it was originally erroneous. We are not here to lament the growth of California, albeit one or two of our old congressional districts out in California now—and maybe I might be considered almost an honorary California myself for these purposes.

But those things succeeded. The question today is, with an energy crisis, with an understanding of the scarcity of resources, and with an enormous budget deficit, should we ask that energy here be priced at the price the market will bear, which means that we will get a more efficient use of the energy if we do not subsidize it and we will get some reduction in the deficit?

I was glad to hear—not glad, but interested to hear that the Reagan administration is against this amendment. Once again we have—and I think the technical term for it is a "choke" on the part of the administration when it comes to putting into practice the principles they preach to the poor: The virtues of austerity, the virtues of the free market, the virtues of self-sufficiency, and the virtues of cutting the deficit. They are apparently to be very selectively applied because we are being told by this administration that they oppose an amendment which would apply free market principles and garner revenues to cut the deficit in this particularly apparently politically favored spot.

The elderly can pay more for medicare, young people can pay more to go to school and in some cases not be able to go to school, we cannot afford adequate funds to deal with hazardous waste, we cut back on social security cost of living, but we subsidize power for this particular group of people to the detriment of a rational energy policy and to the detriment of efforts to reduce the deficit.

The Grace Commission appears to be a Commission that will go down in history as an entity which received more praise and less support from this administration than anything else. It is going to rank with the virtue of chastity as one of those things about which much is said and little is done when it gets right home, because here we have a vote on one of the principles in the Grace Commission. and I am not a believer in everything the Grace Commission said, and maybe not in most of what they said—I have not read the whole thing yet—but here I think they are making sense. They are saying that we ought not to have, at the expense of the entire Treasury of the United States, a substantial subsidy to one particular group of people who benefit from this dam. Yet they have had it for 50 years.

It has never seemed to me that having provided for people a very significant benefit for 50 years, we are somehow now to be obligated to continue to provide it to them in the future. Those who, having once benefited from a policy, argue that because they once benefited, we have to continue to give it to them, seem to me to not have a great deal of logic on their side. I understand they would rather have it than not have it, but I do not understand why the rest of us feel that that subsidy should be made available.

Mr. VENTO. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FRANK. I yield to the gentleman from Minnesota.

Mr. VENTO. Mr. Chairman, I thank the gentleman for yielding.

I think you can make money by selling this power today at today's rates. I think that there is no question about that. But could that same argument be carried to other types of powerplants that were built in the thirties or forties which now provide the cheaper base of power that each of us has in our various jurisdictions?

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Massachusetts (Mr. FRANK) has expired.

(On request of Mr. VENTO, and by unanimous consent, Mr. FRANK was allowed to proceed for 2 additional minutes.)

Mr. VENTO. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman will yield further, I mean that seriously, because there is a problem here. We are not really talking in this instance about the cost of building this particular project. It has been built. We are really talking about what we are going to do with the power in the future that is generated from it.

As someone who has worked on utility rate regulation at the State level and other places, I think all of us have to recognize that in each of our constituencies, we have a low-cost base of power. If we were to take that power today which is being sold in this instance at a very reasonable rate, about a cent a thousand kilowatts, and bring it to the marketplace at 5 or 6 cents, surely we could raise a lot more revenue.

The question is, of course, that I do not hear anyone on the floor offering it. I am certainly not offering it to my constituency and our power rate base on that basis. And they have benefited in not precisely the same way. I think the gentleman from Massachusetts and I agree about a lot of water projects, but, after all, we are really not talking about a water project in this instance.

Mr. FRANK. Mr. Chairman, I understand that, and I think an appropriate degree of regulation ought to come in.

The point that I would make here, though, is that this is different from all those other power projects, at least any of the ones that I am familiar with in my area. They were not built under the same circumstances. They were not built with the same kind of advantages and subsidies in terms of interest loans and tax-free interest, et cetera. So what you get is bad energy policy, and I do not know of any utility or any State utility regulatory body that would apply to its own State the principles that apply here.

Mr. VENTO. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. UDALL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FRANK. I yield to the gentleman from Arizona.

Mr. UDALL. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Massachusetts has been very kind to me, and as he knows, he is one of my favorite legislators around here. I know that he would not mind if I try to clear up a little bit of the inconsistency here. Let me ask the gentleman a question.

Does the gentleman agree that the deregulation of natural gas is a bad idea for consumers because it might drive the rates up?

Mr. FRANK. I believe that total deregulation would be a bad idea, yes.

Mr. UDALL. Well, it seems to me that you cannot have it both ways. You cannot say that jacking up the cost to consumers out in the Southwest for these big hydroelectric projects is a good thing and that holding down the price of natural gas is a bad thing.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Massachusetts (Mr. FRANK) has again expired.

(By unanimous consent, Mr. FRANK was allowed to proceed for 1 additional minute.)

Mr. FRANK. Mr. Chairman, I will use this extra time just to respond to my friend, the gentleman from Arizona.

Mr. Chairman, I think in the first place we are talking about a very different level of prices with the deregulation of natural gas. We are talking about a very different beneficiary, the Federal Treasury versus some private companies, and I think there is a certain advantage there.

I would just like to point out that we are talking on the one hand about gettig benefits to the Federal Treasury. The Reagan administration is apparently opposing, I am told, a proposal by the Appropriations Subcommittee which they talked about to put another $60 million in for the homeless, a subject the gentleman from Minnesota has done great work on. The amount of money we are talking about here annually would be greater than the amount for the homeless.

How do we begrudge that to people who are literally homeless but say instead that we can give many times that in availability to subsidize the particular power rates.

Let me say this to the gentleman. If he is saying that the ultimate goal is that it be completely unregulated, no, I do not think that is necessarily the case, and if the committee would like to bring in some legislation that says, well, maybe there is some median here, maybe there is some form of regulation with the Treasury benefiting, and we can take into account lifeline and other things, I think that would be perfectly reasonable. But I do not think it is analogous to natural gas when we are talking about the Treasury benefiting versus private companies.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Massachusetts (Mr. FRANK) has expired.

The Chair would like to know if there are additional Members who would like to be heard on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Michigan (Mr. ALBOSTA) to the amendment offered by the gentlewoman from California (Mrs. BOXER).

Mr. UDALL. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the Albosta amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Arizona (Mr. UDALL) is recognized for 5 minutes.

Mr. UDALL. Mr. Chairman, I do this partly for technical reasons. I think the gentlewoman from California (Mrs. BOXER) is entitled to have her amendment presented in any way she wants, and I would defer to her if she wants to accept the Albosta amendment. But I think a couple of things ought to be said before we get to a vote on that issue.

Let me straighten out one thing, if I can. I have heard this said this afternoon at least 20 times: They talk about a subsidy. There is no subsidy involved. What is involved here is that the whole philosophy of Federal power production is that get cost recovery. We payback the cost of the dam plus interest we payback the cost of transmission lines, and we payback all the costs out of the power generation. That is the whole idea. The idea is, let us build a big dam and the revenues of that dam will build canals to get out of the water, they will build electric transmission lines, and they will give us recreation.

The multipurpose dams in the West and all over this country have been a great success. The Albosta an endment which has come in today written on the back of an envelope has never been to our committee. It upsets very complicated arrangements between seven Colorado River Basin States.

For example, in the Lower Colorado Basin project, legislation which authorizes the Central Arizona project provides that after you have paid off the necessary costs, the money goes into the Treasury and then into the Lower Colorado development fund to have salinity programs and to have augmentation of the river, in addition to paying off the cost of the project.

So I think that anybody who has got an irrigation project where payment is underway in any part of the country ought to know that the Albosta amendment does not just take the money back to the Treasury; it destroys complicated financial arrangements that have been made over a long period of time and have been counted on by a lot of people.

□ 1430

I fear, my friends, as I look around these last few months that I see a kind of regional polarization in America and the debate is taking on that cast here today, that here is a privileged few in the Sunbelt out in California, Arizona, and Nevada, who are getting a big ripoff from the Treasury and all of that.

Well, you pass this thing today, you have not just affected Arizona. Let me warn some of you of what is coming up. Upstate New York has a public power system, Niagara and some other rivers up there. this Boxer amendment deals with that.

The Western Power Marketing Administration, which has California and Arizona, has a counterpart in Texas.

The whole Bonneville system, too—anybody here from the Northwest, you are crazy if you vote for the Boxer amendment, because if Hoover power ought to be sold at cost to the highest bidder, then Bonneville power ought to be sold at cost. If the city of Chicago can outbid you, if you are in the Missouri basin with all these great hydroelectic dams in the Missouri basin, somebody in the city of Detroit or Chicago may outbid the local folks.

The whole idea of these western projects, of TVA and Franklin Roosevelt, was to have a yardstick, to have some public power generated.

We have a preference clause which says that it is good for municipalities and local governments and rural electric co-ops who want to provide cooperative service to the customers to get a preference on public power, on power generated in public facilities; so you are going to make a big mistake if you pass Boxer and it is compounded by adding Albosta. You are going to make a big mistake. You are going to change a major national policy.

Our committee has never refused to have hearings. Introduce a bill that makes the Boxer amendment national policy for everbody, not just for the southwest. We will hold hearings on it. We will give the committee a chance to vote it out; but to do this in this forum today, this week, with no hearings and no understanding, I have not even seen the Albosta amendment to this moment, but I am told by those who have been privileged to have a look at it that it has devastating consequences that could upset arrangements in all the seven States and eventually all over the country.

So let us take a rational view. There are 11 million people who are going to benefit from this. They are not a privileged few, there are 11 million at least involved in this one amendment at this time.

I had an old Democrat who used to say about Ronald Reagan that he changed the slogan, "Power to the People," to read, "Power to the Following People."

Well, the people involved in this set of amendments here are all the American people and we are going to make a big mistake if we change in this drastic way an established public policy.

I would urge defeat for the Boxer amendment.

Mrs. BOXER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield to me?

Mr. UDALL. I yield to my friend.

Mrs. BOXER. Mr. Chairman, I thank my friend for yielding. I would just like to thank the gentleman very much for agreeing to allow me to make the Albosta amendment part of my amendment. It would be helpful to us. I appreciate that, and to say that the New York Times really picked up the gentleman's theme of power to the people when they described the current bill pending, they called it "Power to Some of the People" and I think that is part of the problem.

Mr. UDALL. I regret to say that the New York Times is wrong.

Mr. VENTO. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike the requisite number of words.

Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the Albosta amendment and in opposition to the Boxer amendment.

Mr. Chairman, I have stood on this floor and argued against water projects from time to time because I felt that they were an improper use of the fiscal resources of this Nation, but the issue that we have before us today is not the water projects. In other words, the Hoover Dam has been built. It is being utilized.

The issue today is whether or not we ought to take the power generated from the Hoover Dam, and I guess in a broader sense from a whole host of nationally funded and financed dams and projects that generate electric power.

I suppose we could carry this to the conclusion with respect to where we allowed depreciation, where indeed the National Government through various tax expenditures has benefited utilities in the construction of their power generating facilities, and therefore, suggest that really these facilities that are being used in a sense, although markedly different, I admit from the genesis of the Hoover Dam and for instance the REA and other projects that we have assisted from a national perspective, but really this power ought to be rated and sold at what are market rates today, then to sell them; but we are doing that with a select group today. We are not doing it across the line.

I do not hear anyone rising to support this amendment saying that we are going to take our low cost base of power and share that and put that up for bid on a bid basis for everyone else that needs power and the extra revenue generated from that then can go to reduce the deficit.

Well, it is a great idea. If we were doing it on a national basis, we might want to look at that thing. Most of us recognize that there are problems with regard to the existing revenue code and that obviously tax and revenue may very well be needed if we do not get the growth and we do not limit the spending in terms of our various programs, that we are going to need a significant increase in the injection of revenue.

But is this really the way to do it? Do we want to solve our deficit problems by increasing utility rates so that we can pay for our national debt?

That is really what the gentleman from Michigan is suggesting, that ought to be the source in terms of which we attempt to come to reconcile expenditures and spending programs and taxing programs by virtue of placing that particular responsibility on utilities and on consumers.

I guess I am troubled by that and by the nature of what has been happening here in the discussion.

Mr. ALBOSTA. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. VENTO. I would be happy to yield to my good friend.

Mr. ALBOSTA. Mr. Chairman, I appreciate the gentleman yielding.

I want to express my concern that I do not come down to the floor with this amendment to attack any one particular area of the county or to aline myself against that particular area of the country.

I respect the gentleman from Arizona (MO UDALL) as much as I do any Member of this body and I understand where he is coming from; but I would say to the gentleman from Minnesota, would the gentleman be willing and would all the other people that support these projects wherever they may be where you are getting cheap power, would the gentleman be willing to help us in some way to reduce our power costs in terms of building nuclear plants? Would that be agreeable to the gentleman?

Maybe we can find a common ground where we can all agree somehow.

Mr. VENTO. Well, if I can reclaim my time, I think the gentleman raises a concern. I think we have to look for ways to try to bring down the costs of the construction of various types of power plants. In spite of the heavy subsidies that we have provided for nuclear power, to this date we still find the costs exorbitant. That is generally true across the line because of the tremendous new capital costs that are associated. I mean, interest rates have gone up.

Mr. ALBOSTA. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield further?

Mr. VENTO. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. ALBOSTA. The gentleman said subsidies for nuclear power, do I understand correctly?

Mr. VENTO. That is right. The assistance that is provided, and I would be happy to yield to the gentleman.

Mr. ALBOSTA. Where do we get any subsidies in building a nuclear power plant?

Mr. VENTO. Well, the National Government has absorbed considerable cost. There are a variety of resources, and I would be happy to share them with the gentleman, with regard to the inspections we provide, the licensing process; in fact, the gentleman from Minnesota has in various instances attempted to try to isolate those costs to pass them on indeed and to allocate them properly so that we get a true picture.

Indeed, the total cost of nuclear power today has almost made it prohibitive, I guess it is one of the reasons that we have not had new construction of nuclear powerplants, in spite of everything that this Congress and this national policy has led to; but I am just suggesting to my colleagues that they ought to take a look at what they are doing here with respect to this issue.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Minnesota has expired.

(At the request of Mr. BROWN of California and by unanimous consent, Mr. VENTO was allowed to proceed for 1 additional minute.)

Mr. BROWN of California. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. VENTO. I would be happy to yield to the gentleman from California.

Mr. BROWN of California. Mr. Chairman, on the question of subsidies for nuclear power, the whole industry has been subsidized since its inception. There is probably $1 billion or more in this year's budget subsidizing research and development to improve the efficiency of nuclear powerplants, and the taxpayer is paying that bill completely.

Mr. VENTO. I appreciate the gentleman's comments. I just did not want to get into a debate on that. I am just trying to point out that we have in various ways tried to, and I think we are going to have to continue to try to reduce the costs of new powerplants.

The question is what we do with the old ones. I think it is unfair, we know it is tighter or it is cheap, but it is unfair just to limit this to one group that we are going to take away their old plants, reduce costs, have a lower cost base, and at the same time everyone else is not similarly affected.

Mr. FRENZEL. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike the requisite number of words.

I will cancel my request for your ophthalmologist.

I take a look at this bill, Mr. Chairman, from the standpoint of the budget and our current economic distress. I am not an expert in environmental work or developmental work, nor in energy nor power. But I have listened to the debate with great interest. I came here with a bias in favor of the Boxer amendment and that bias has merely been strengthened.

The arguments in favor of the current system that is against the Boxer amendment are, one, that we have always done it. I do not think we need to discuss that particular argument. The second one is that it is public power and in quotation marks, and we should somehow genuflect. Unfortunately, most of us do not have public power, and to those of us who do not, it seems ridiculous that a taxpayer subsidy should go to the lucky few that do.

The third argument is that it is not a subsidy. Generally, it is said that when it looks like a subsidy, has webbed feet like a subsidy, feathers like a subsidy, and quacks like a subsidy, it is likely to be a subsidy, and until somebody can show me something different, I am going to consider it a subsidy.

Another argument is that we will soak the consumers if we pass the Boxer amendment. In my judgment, we would unsoak the taxpayers by liberating a multibillion-dollar figure over a number of years from our deficit and save us all from the standpoint of high interest rates and inflation.

Another argument against it was that there might be a poor person somewhere who is taking advantage of this subsidized rate. There probably are, just as there are poor people in other high-cost energy districts of the country who are also paying rates that are too high.

Our job is not to preserve the status quo unless the status quo happens to be the best policy.

I think the gentlewoman from California has shown quite clearly that it is not.

I am very sorry that it was the gentleman from California (Mr. STARK) who had to repeat the old Republican formula that there is no such thing as a free lunch. Unfortunately, there is. What he should have said was that there should not be such a thing as a free lunch.

For those who believe in a free market and believe that energy from whatever source ought to be freely priced in that market, it seems to me that they can do nothing else than to vote for the Boxer amendment.

It comes to me as a matter of some surprise that folks who around here have exposed that theory now believe that somehow it is invalid because the subsidies go to their district. I suppose that is normal and it should not be a matter of concern. A subsidy by any other name would still be a subsidy.

And if Members of this House happen to be on the gravy train or the Hoover Club or however they are recipients of public power benefits, I am sure that they will vote against this.

On the other hand, for those Members who believe that it is important to reduce the deficit, that it is important when we are distributing subsides around the United States that they be faced head-on in the appropriations process and that the benefits go to the most deserving, I think they will want to vote for the amendment of the gentlewoman from California (Mrs. BOXER).

I believe that often we are consumed with our regional urges, our baser instincts to take care of our constituents to the misfortune or to the lower estate of other national taxpayers. Normally, the majority in this body is able to overcome those baser instincts and certainly none of us is without stain; none of us is perfect in this area. We want to do the best we can for our own constituents and our own taxpayers.

However, in my judgment, this is one time when we ought to think of the larger issue. Can we sustain in our own minds that this subsidy is not a subsidy, that these recipients are especially deserving, more so than the other 200 million Americans who are not getting them?

In my judgment, there has been no showing.

It is time to change the policy and I urge this body to accept the Boxer amendment.

Mr. BROWN of California. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FRENZEL. I yield to the distinguished gentleman from California.

Mr. BROWN of California. I thank the gentleman for yielding and I appreciate the logic of his remarks. I hope that his stand is not based upon the fact that he does not have any subsidized power projects in his district, which he probably does not.

But I would like to point out to the gentleman that he does have extensive rural electrification facilities in his district. He probably has wheat or corn or other farmers.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Minnesota (Mr. FRENZEL) has expired.

(By unanimous consent, Mr. FRENZEL was allowed to proceed for 1 additional minute.)

Mr. FRENZEL. I yield to the gentleman from California.

Mr. BROWN of California. The principle the gentleman is supporting on the Hoover Dam could be applied precisely to rural electrification. We could market that power going to your farmers in the same fashion and their rates would go up. I trust the gentleman will support that when the measure comes before the House.

Mr. FRENZEL. I thank the gentleman for his contribution and would repeat I do not want to take anything away from anybody. But I am terribly concerned about our deficit, about our willingness to give things without thought of cost to various beneficiaries because they happen to be our friends.

I think it is time, at least in one instance, to stand up and say, let us take this money in for the benefit of all of the taxpayers of the United States.

I yield back the balance of my time.

Mr. DELLUMS. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike the requisite number of words.

Mr. Chairman, I have a few remarks that I normally have made in support of the amendment offered by my distinguished colleague from California (Mrs. BOXER). But time does not necessarily permit that and most of these arguments have already been made.

But I would much prefer to use the balance of my time to focus in upon the major argument that has been established on this floor in opposition to the amendment offered by the distinguished gentlewoman from California, and that argument has primarily been a procedural argument. This is an argument that was raised by a number of our colleagues, including the distinguished chairman of the committee. That is that this amendment affects policy in a very profound and dramatic way and that it should not be done on the floor of Congress and, indeed, the chairman of the subcommittee indicated a willingness to hold hearings and allow the subcommittee to work its will on a major piece of national policy.

But let us look further. This piece of legislation will approve contracts for 30 years into the future, the year 2014. Many of us, unfortunately, will probably not even be alive and well in the year 2014. Thirty years into the future is an enormous amount of time to make a decision.

So if there is significant good will with respect to the offer of allowing debate to go forward on this policy, then I would ask the Members of the subcommittee in general on both sides of the aisle, and the chairman of the subcommittee in specific: Would you not accept an amendment that would allow these contracts to go forward, not for 30 years precluding an opportunity for any significant debate on these matters, but in good faith and as an expression of good will accept an amendment that would allow these contracts to go forward for only 1 year? And during the course of that 1 year, you would then hold hearings and work your will on a piece of national policy.

If you really do not want to challenge the gentlewoman's amendment except on procedural grounds, then it would seem to me in the spirit of fairness, in the spirit of high integrity, that you would accept an amendment that would say the provisions of this bill would only apply for 12 months.

If the gentlewoman's amendment did not prevail in attempting to affect national policy in a dramatic way, then bring a piece of legislation to extend it for the additional 29 years. A number of my colleagues who said procedure is the issue here, if you are talking about procedure and efficacy and ethics, then it would seem to me that we would not be talking about a piece of legislation into the year 2014. If you would agree that there ought to be some honest way to significantly debate these matters, then I would ask the Chair would he be willing, and the other gentleman who also made a procedural argument, as to whether they would agree to an amendment reducing the impact of this legislation to 12 months as opposed to 30 years.

It would seem to me that would be in the spirit of fairness and openness.

Mr. UDALL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DELLUMS. I yield to the gentleman.

□ 1450

Mr. UDALL. I wish the suggestion had been made earlier. There might have been some ability on our part to accede.

I wish the gentleman made the suggestion earlier, we might have worked something out. I doubt it, however. Long negotiations, years of negotiations involving your State, my State, the key water people in the Governor's office and everybody, have resulted 3 or 4 years ago in a bunch of lawsuits; Nevada sued Arizona and California; we sued you, you were going to sue back against us. Some delicate negotiations carried out among the three States and it is all agreed to.

I cannot upset contracts, major negotiations with a suggestion of this kind. I had promised, and I reiterate to the gentleman, we will try to get to this. If someone will introduce a bill along the lines of the Boxer amendment, hearings will be held, the committee will have a chance to vote. But to put a 12 months' stay on this thing would confuse and perhaps could badly damage the complicated arrangement.

Mr. DELLUMS. If I may ask just for clarification: If, for example, there were hearings, the subcommittee and the full committee decided in their wisdom to act favorably.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

(By unanimous consent, Mr. DELLUMS was allowed to proceed for 2 additional minutes.)

Mr. DELLUMS. I would not prolong this, but I want to get this one clarification. And if the gentlewoman's concept prevailed, the gentleman saying that that would have no effect on the contracts that are presently being entered into at this moment?

Mr. UDALL. If the Boxer amendment is passed, in my judgment it will create chaos and utter confusion in California and Arizona, but in the whole country because there are millions of Americans who rely on public power. We are saying, unlike private utilities, we are going to have a new rule and we are going to get all the traffic can bear.

PG&E does not operate on that principle. The Government would be required to operate on getting all the traffic would bear for all of the Federal power.

Mr. DELLUMS. I appreciate the gentleman's response. But I am assuming your response is to the amendment offered on the floor.

The question I am raising is if the gentlewoman were to prevail in a major policy change, if I heard the gentleman's earlier response, is he suggesting that even in that context that would preclude any of the contracts that are presently being inked. In other words, if she came to the committee and won, is he really saying that the practical effect would be that it would have no impact on the contracts being signed now for 30 years?

Mr. UDALL. No; favorable action on the Albosta amendment would destroy the Lower Colorado River Basin fund for one thing, and would destroy the arrangements that have made between Arizona, California, and Nevada.

Mr. DELLUMS. I thank the gentleman.

I yield to my colleagues from Illinois.

Mr. EVANS of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, the time has come for the beneficiaries of the Federal water and power programs to pay their way. No longer can the Nation afford to subsidize one small group of people at the expense of fiscal responsibility for a goal of dubious value.

The original intent of the legislation before us, like most reclamation legislation in the Western States, was to promote growth. This was certainly a valid goal 50 years ago when this legislation's 50-year contracts were signed into law. But look around—how many more people can California, Nevada, or Arizona accommodate? How much more in benefits can this Government afford for the goal of Western population growth? This legislation was written as if the past 50 years never happened.

In the days when the West was being settled, it may have made sense for such a program to exist. But this is the 1980's—the days of $200 billion deficits—the days of record high unemployment and decaying infrastructure in the Northeast and Midwest.

Even though there is no direct cash coming from the taxpayers, does not selling power at one-tenth the market price constitute a subsidy?

If in the next 10 years of the contracts for this power we could receive $3.5 billion more by charging market rates rather than charging rates based on the cost of production, so be it. This Nation cannot afford to continue such unsound programs, where the few are subsidized at the expense of the many.

For the record, Mr. Chairman, I would also like to include an excellent editorial on the Hoover Dam which appeared in the New York Times on May 2, and I recommend it to our colleagues.

I urge my colleagues to support the Boxer amendment.

The editorial follows:

[From the New York Times, May 2, 1984]

POWER TO SOME OF THE PEOPLE

Who owns the Hoover Dam, and the electricity it produces?

In theory, the answer is the American people who built the great dam on the Colorado River a half-century ago. In practice, however, the answer is only some of the people, a few million lucky residents of Arizona, California and Nevada who are permitted to buy the power for a fraction of its value.

Unless the House has the courage this week to put national interests ahead of regional, the give-away will continue for 30 more years.

When Boulder Dam (later renamed to honor Herbert Hoover) was completed in 1937, the Federal Government signed a long-term contract to sell the hydroelectricity for prices near cost to public and private power authorities in the region. That contract doesn't expire until 1987. But Senator Laxalt of Nevada and Representative Morris Udall of Arizona, the chairman of the House Interior Committee, saw the Presidential election year as an ideal time to ram through a 30-year renewal.

"If there's one kind of energy we need," argues Mr. Udall in support of his bill, "it's hydroelectric power." He is right, of course, that clean, infinitely renewable hydropower is an ideal energy source. But since no one suggests abandoning Hoover Dam, that's hardly relevant. The issue is who gets the power, and at what price.

According to the Environmental Defense Fund, Hoover customers are currently charged a half-cent a kilowatt hour, roughly one-tenth the price of electricity from new coal-fired plants in the region. Under the proposed concessionary renewal terms, the Federal Government would lose an estimated $6 billion in revenues over the next decade.

That means $6 billion more in Federal deficits. Worse, it means that users of Hoover power will have little or no incentive to conserve tens of billions of kilowatts of scarce electricity.

These arguments were rejected by an Administration currying favor with Western voters. And they had no effect on the Senate, which passed the renewal bill last August by voice vote. That leaves it to the House to represent the interests of the rest of the nation.

Mr. DELLUMS. Mr. Chairman, with the few remaining seconds I would simply say there is one additional area of concern that we have. For example, before one of the distinguished committees of this House, a bill on the Tuolumme River, as to whether or not it will be a wild and scenic river is now being acted upon. This legislation puts that in great jeopardy in extraordinary danger. This is one of the great wonders of this country. Certainly one of the great wonders of the State of California.

To act on this legislation, it seems to me, would have dramatic and negative impact on our ability to preserve that river.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

(On request of Mr. ALBOSTA and by unanimous consent, Mr. DELLUMS was allowed to proceed for 1 additional minute.)

Mr. DELLUMS. I yield to the gentleman from Michigan (Mr. ALBOSTA).

Mr. ALBOSTA. I thank the gentleman.

I think it is important to understand that the Albosta amendment simply says that the money that is not needed for the maintenance, operation, and whatever else is required there at that particular unit of Hoover Dam, to keep it in proper repair, would go to the U.S. Treasury. It does nothing else than that. It is that simple; it simply says those funds in excess of all maintenance costs from the contractual agreements reached from the Boxer amendment would then go to the U.S. Treasury.

That would be about $3.5 million and that would reduce the deficits hopefully by about $3.5 million.

Mr. DELLUMS. Mr. Chairman, I rise in support of the amendment offered by Representative BOXER for several reasons: First, because it fairly compensates the taxpayers of America; second, because it treats all potential customers of power from Hoover Dam equally, and third, because it will assure that the power generated at Hoover Dam is not wasted by being priced at less than one-tenth its market value.

More particularly, I also support the amendment because if it is not passed, the result would be great potential harm to San Francisco Bay, the Sacramento/San Joaquin Delta, and California's north coast rivers, which are now federally designated wild and scenic rivers. It simply is unfair to ask taxpayers in my district to subsidize the price that the Metropolitan Water District of Southern California pays for power to pump its water so that the Metropolitan Water District can take away from northern California water that is needed in my region for municipal, industrial, agricultural, recreational, and esthetic uses.

H.R. 4275, as written, does require the Metropolitan Water District to use its subsidized Hoover power to pump Colorado River water rather than northern California water when water is available from the Colorado, but that too will result in the waste of water in Metropolitan Water District's service area.

Members of the House, only if the power from Hoover is auctioned will the resources Hoover produces be used in a proper and efficient manner.

I thank the gentleman. I thank the committee for their indulgence.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Arizona (Mr. UDALL).

Mr. UDALL. Mr. Chairman, I renew my unanimous-consent request that all debate on the pending amendment and all amendments relating thereto close in 10 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Arizona?

There was no objection.

Mr. UDALL. Could I ask the Chair to recognize Mr. BERMAN, who has a time problem, first on the limitation.

The CHAIRMAN. All Members standing at the time of the unanimous-consent request will be recognized for 30 seconds each.

The Chair recognizes the gentleman from California (Mr. BERMAN).

Mr. BERMAN, Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the gentlewoman's amendment. It is important that we recognize that it is the consumer who has the biggest stake in today's debate.

Should the benefits of public projects be auctioned off to the highest bidder? The answer is "yes" only if you want to stick electricity customers with $4.5 billion rate hike over the next 10 years. If southern California's share of electric power from Hoover Dam is put out to bid, power and water costs will be inflated by as much as $400 million a year.

The Federal Government is not in the power business to make a profit—but to stimulate private development of energy resources. The purpose of the Federal power program has never been to maximize revenue but to sell power from public projects at the lowest possible rates that will recover the Government's investment and pay all operating expenses. The projects should pay their own way—and Hoover does.

Proponents of this amendment contend that the Government should charge whatever the buyer will pay in order to dampen electric demand. In the past decade, the cost of electricity has risen nearly 57 percent. Consumers do not need skyrocketing prices to conserve—they have already had that message and they are conserving. Energy growth has slowed from 7 percent annually to approximately 1.2 percent.

There is no doubt that California, Arizona, and Nevada have particularly benefited from Hoover Dam. But it is not without a price. Without commitments from these States to purchase the power Hoover Dam produces, the project would never have been built. Furthermore, they have operated the facility since its construction.

We should adopt today a power-allocation plan that will allow the original contractors to substantially retain their Hoover supplies while making additional power available to other utility companies. This is what H.R. 4275 does.

What we do not want to do is embark on a course that will not only break the backs of western consumers but will open the gates to market pricing nationwide. The end result will be drastically inflated electricity costs for consumers of every region.

I strongly urge my colleagues to reject market pricing and vote against the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from California (Mr. PATTERSON).

Mr. PATTERSON. Mr. Chairman, it is hard to say in 30 seconds what one needs at least 5 minutes for. But let me say I support the Chairman, Mo UDALL, this is an important bill; the Boxer amendment defeats the bill. Those who oppose the bill support the Boxer amendment. It makes consumers pay more; it will apply to 50 States.

The bill itself applies to only three. There is no Government subsidy. Let us remember our consumers, forget your regional differences; let us vote against the Boxer amendment and for the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Arizona (Mr. MCCAIN).

Mr. MCCAIN. We are not talking about Arizona here or California and Nevada; we are talking about TVA, Bonneville Power, Niagara, and every other public power source in this Nation. We are talking about an increase in utility rates of dramatic fashion to the consumers of these States and all others throughout the Nation.

I urge strongly the rejection of the Boxer amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Louisiana (Mr. HUCKABY).

Mr. HUCKABY. Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

I rise in support of the Boxer amendment. I think what we are talking about here, as the chairman from Arizona has pointed out, is a major change in policy, a change that is long overdue. It is time that all of the American taxpayers had the opportunity to quit subsidizing the privileged few who happen to live in an area where they receive public power. This bill only applies to the Hoover Dam. It sets a good precedent.

(By unanimous consent, Mr. LUJAN yielded his time to Mr. CHENEY).

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from California (Mr. LEVINE).

Mr. LEVINE of California. Mr. Chairman, as difficult as it is for me to oppose any amendment offered by the gentlewoman from California (Mrs. BOXER), I do rise in opposition to her amendment.

I include in the RECORD at this point a very good article by Carl Boronkay from yesterday's Los Angeles Times:

HOOVER DAM BENEFITS COULD CRUMBLE FOR SOUTHLAND

(By Carl Boronkay)

California consumers have an enormous stake in the answer to a question being considered in Congress this week: Should the benefits of public projects be auctioned off to the highest bidder?

At this issue is allocation of the electric power that will be generated by Hoover Dam for the next 30 years. If Southern California's share of that power is put out to bid, power and water costs here will be inflated by as much as $400 million a year, and the concept that the benefits of public projects should be distributed in a not-for-profit manner will be undermined.

For a half-century Hoover Dam has been part of the Southwest's lifeblood. That mass of concrete poured across the Colorado River near Boulder City, Nev., tamed the river's floods, opening vast tracts of downstream land to productive use. Water stored behind the dam irrigates millions of acres of farmland and quenches thirsts in California, Arizona and Nevada. Billions of kilowatt-hours of electricity produced by Hoover's hydroelectric turbines meet the needs of business and industry and millions of urban dwellers.

Southern California has particularly benefited from Hoover. But these benefits didn't come without a price. When the dam was proposed at the depths of the Great Depression, the federal government needed assurances that the costs of construction would be repaid. Utilities in Southern California—including the Metropolitan Water District, which uses electricity from the dam to pump water into the Southland—agreed to purchase two-thirds of the power produced at Hoover. The remaining one-third was assigned to utilities in Arizona and Nevada.

These power purchases, pledged in renewable 50-year contracts, have been paying for the dam down through the years. In 1987 these payment obligations will have been substantially satisfied. The utilities that underwrote the project then are now seeking to renew for 30 years their rights to purchase Hoover's power. This is power that by today's standards is considered inexpensive. The savings are realized by utilities serving many millions of people: In Southern California alone more than 13 million water and electricity customers enjoy lower bills because of the commitment made 50 years ago by the utilities.

A Berkeley-based group is proposing a plan that would inflict an economic injustice on the people of Southern California and possibly establish a precedent of private-public competition. The Environmental Defense Fund is suggesting that Hoover's inexpensive hydroelectric power should be priced at the same level as power produced at considerably more expensive coal or fossil-fuel plants, causing water and power rates to increase drastically. The EDF would pinch the consumer in an attempt to force further energy conservation.

Arbitrarily raising the price of Hoover's power would be inflationary. It would drive up electricity and water bills and raise prices of goods and services produced in Hoover's three-state distribution area. Even the EDF acknowledges that Hoover's customers would pay over a 10-year period $3.5 billion in additional costs if the price of the dam's electrical output were artificially increased. Most of these added costs would be borne by the Greater Los Angeles area. It is not likely that Southern Californians are ready to accept these economic hardships being proposed by a handful of self-appointed guardians of the public purse. Nor is it likely that government free enterprise, once established, would stop at Hoover. There are hundreds, perhaps thousands, of government projects that could, if Hoover power is free-marketed, be free-marketed themselves.

Congress should enact a power-allocation plan that will allow the original contractors to substantially retain their Hoover supplies while making some additional power available to other utility companies. Such a plan is now before Congress.

Hoover Dam was financed by the Southwest and is part of this area's utility infrastructure. Its benefits should remain here—helping the people served by the utilities that made it all possible 50 years ago.

□ 1500

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from California (Mr. PASHAYAN).

Mr. PASHAYAN. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the Boxer amendment. It is going to cost the consumers too much.

Mr. Chairman, there are many aspects of the amendment that might be addressed, but I should like to touch on only two. Both of them shall make it clear that this amendment should be defeated.

We have developed in this country a diverse network of entities supplying electrical energy. Some are owned by shareholder-owned companies. Some are owned by agencies created by the U.S. Government. Others are owned by State and local agencies.

Philosophical arguments may rage over whether the municipal systems or the investor-owned systems better serve the public interest. What is important for purposes of considering this amendment, however, is that uniformly all the power systems are required to assess their rates on the cost of service. The regulatory bodies that set the rates for the investor-owned utilities determine what it costs the utilities to deliver the service and then allow an additional increment for rate of return. In no event is the utility allowed to charge whatever the traffic will bear, which is what the proposed amendment would do.

There is a popular economic fiction that in some way, costs to a provider of goods of services can be increased—whether in the form of taxes or whatever—without the costs being passed on to the purchasers of the goods or services. It simply cannot be done. And in the case of the amendment now under consideration, the increased costs will be passed on to the users of the service—in other words, the home owners who need electricity to run their television sets, their air conditioners, and all their other appliances that are so much a part of their lives.

The customers are captives of the suppliers in this situation and have no other place to turn for their electricity; now is there any other commodity that they can substitute for electrical energy. If the price of beef gets too high, the homeowner can substitute chicken or fish, but if the price of electricity gets too high, the homeowner cannot run his television set on natural gas or sawdust.

This brings me to the second point I should like to make: The absence of a market in the accepted sense of the word. For most commodities and services, a market exists. The buyer of the service has many suppliers from which to choose, and competition will keep prices at the optimum level. Enough will be produced to meet the demand at a profitable level if the demand is strong enough. Furthermore, the consumers have paid for the facilities at Hoover—the consumers have paid through electric rates.

In the case of utilities, however, there is no market in that sense. We do not have competing local telephone companies with duplicate sets of poles all over town. We do not have competing cable television companies. We do not have competing natural gas companies servicing the same area; nor do we have competing local electric service. It has been determined that the public interest is best served by institutions that are granted monoply rights to serve a given area; and in return for this right the rates they charge for the service are regulated to the cost of service plus an additional amount for return on investment, in the case of the investor-owned companies.

This amendment now before us will result in increases in the cost of power to some areas served by municipal systems by as much as 440 percent. Privately owned utilities will also be hit with staggering increases. And who will pay the increased costs? It is the homeowners that will pay and pay and pay.

I urge a "no" vote on the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Arizona (Mr. McNULTY).

Mr. McNULTY. Mr. Chairman, the Members who support the amendment do so out of a sense of pain of their constituents. But I say to the Members this: You cannot address somebody's pain by inflicting pain on anybody else any more than you can make somebody rich by making somebody else poor.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair recognizes the gentlewoman from Nevada (Mrs. VUCANOVICH).

Mrs. VUCANOVICH. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the Boxer amendment.

(By unanimous request, Mrs. VUCANOVICH yielded her time to Mr. CHENEY).

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Delaware (Mr. CARPER).

Mr. CARPER. Mr. Chairman, notwithstanding the respect and affection I have for the chairman of the committee, the gentleman from Arizona, I rise in strong support of the amendment by the gentlelady from California. I also stand in support of reasonable development of our hydroelectric resource in this country—a clean, renewable energy supply whose importance rises with every pulse of unrest in the Middle East.

Our need for this power, however, does not mean that we should continue to practically give it away to privileged users. The sale of Hoover Dam power by the Federal Government for one-tenth the cost of electricity provided by other sources is an aberration—indeed some would call it an abomination—in a free market society facing $200 billion to $300 billion deficits.

If the proposed giveaway continues for 30 more years, the Federal Government could in the first decade alone, lose over $3.5 billion. That is no small potatoes.

This amendment also addresses the equity question head on. The auctioning of this energy will provide all utilities with an opportunity to share in the allocation of power from Hoover Dam.

Furthermore, this amendment would provide the natural incentive for energy conservation—a higher, unsubsidized price.

I applaud this commendable proposal, and urge my colleagues to vote yes on the Boxer amendment.

● Mr. CONTE. Mr. Chairman, I want to express my strong support for the amendment to be offered by the gentlewoman from California to reform the manner in which power at the Hoover Dam is marketed.

Mr. Chairman, under current law, power produced at Federal projects is sold at rates set to recover only project costs. Municipalities and irrigation districts are given preference in allocation of the power.

The policy of only recovering project costs—and in the case of Hoover Dam, of selling power at less than one-tenth of its market value—can only be regarded as a special interest plum for certain select users in the area. The days when cheap power was essential to the development of the West are long gone. By allowing local authorities to repay project costs over several decades at artificially low interest rates, the Government is encouraging overconsumption of energy—and at a subsidized rate.

The amendment to be offered by the gentlewoman from California would auction off this power to the highest bidder. It would break the stranglehold over this cheap power that has been held by a few select interests over the years. Realistic, market pricing would provide the proper market signals so that people would use energy only in an amount that is needed. And perhaps best of all, as we continue to seek ways of reducing the deficit, this amendment would result in an additional $3.5 billion flowing into the Treasury over the first 10 years of the new contract.

Mr. Chairman, this amendment is supported by a diverse group of taxpayer, environmental, and energy conservation groups as an effort to reform and rationalize our hydroelectric power sales policy. It has been endorsed by a diverse group of newspapers, including the New York Times, the San Diego Union, and the Sacramento Bee.

I am pleased to support this amendment, and urge my colleagues to do the same.●

(By unanimous consent, Mr. GREGG and Mr. COATS yielded their time to Mr. CHENEY).

(By unanimous consent, Mr. SWIFT yielded his time to Mr. UDALL).

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair recognized the gentleman from Wyoming (Mr. CHENEY).

Mr. CHENEY. Mr. Chairman, I rise as the ranking Republican on the Water and Power Subcommittee in opposition to the Boxer amendment.

I think the gentlewoman's amendment is well intentioned, but if she really wants to pursue this line of argument, perhaps what she ought to suggest is that we sell off these kinds of assets such as the Hoover Dam and the Bonneville Power Administration, and the TVA to the highest bidder. There is no reason to keep the public interest in or the Federal Government involved at all in operating that.

Of course, the last time anybody suggested that it was the distinguished Presidential candidate of my own party, Senator GOLDWATER, in 1964.

I think it is a singularly bad idea at this point. I think the gentleman from Arizona stated the case very well, you will not save any money by adopting that amendment.

The bill does not involve a subsidy. It does involve the reallocation of power that was paid for in a project that was developed by the people of the Southwest.

My State does not benefit directly from this project, but I rise in strong opposition to the Boxer amendment and would urge my colleagues to support the bill and the position of the gentleman from Arizona.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Arizona (Mr. UDALL).

Mr. UDALL. Mr. Chairman, I suspect the vote will come first on Albosta. And as I said earlier, I do not care one way or the other. If the gentlewoman wants the amendment—she says she does—I think it ought to be passed by voice vote and I would have no objection.

This is not an environmental bill, it is a consumer bill, if it is anything. I will put all of these in the record at the appropriate time.

The Consumer Federation of America says it would be outrageous and unconscionable to go to a system for the Federal of all the traffic will bear when the investor owned utilities do not do that. All they ask is for cost recovery.

The National League of Cities, a strong letter in support of the public power laws and against the Boxer amendment and in favor of the bill.

The National Rural Electric Co-op people think this is a very bad idea, the Boxer amendment, and say so at some length in their letter.

The American Public Power Association believes this is one of the most important issues and I think they would agree with me that this would destroy the whole idea of public power as a yardstick and would destroy the perference clause that has served us so well.

I urge defeat of the Boxer amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. All time has expired.

The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Michigan (Mr. ALBOSTA) to the amendment offered by the gentlewoman from California (Mrs. BOXER).

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentlewoman from California (Mrs. BOXER), as amended.

The question was taken; and the Chairman announced that the noes appeared to have it.

RECORDED VOTE

Mrs. BOXER. Mr. Chairman, I demand a recorded vote.

A recorded vote was ordered.

The Clerk announced the following pair:

On this vote:

Mr. Breaux for, with Mr. Leland against.

Messrs. DASCHLE, SAWYER, GLICKMAN, BARNARD, and ERDREICH changed their votes from "aye" to "no."

Messrs. SILJANDER, BILIRAKIS, HERTEL of Michigan, and Mrs. COLLINS changed their votes from "no" to "aye."

So the amendment as amended, was rejected.

The result of the vote was announced as above recorded.

AMENDMENT OFFERED BY MR. WYDEN

Mr. WYDEN. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. WYDEN: Page 27, after line 11, insert the following new section:

SEC. 209. The Secretary of the Interior, acting pursuant to Federal reclamation law (Act of June 17, 1902, 32 Stat. 388, and Acts amendatory thereof and supplementary thereto) and in accordance with the Pacific Northwest Electric Power Planning and Conservation Act (94 Stat. 2697) is authorized to design, construct, operate, and maintain fish passage facilities within the Yakima River Basin, and to accept funds from any entity, public or private, to design, construct, operate, and maintain such facilities.

Mr. WYDEN (during the reading). Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the amendment be considered as read and printed in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Oregon?

There was no objection.

Mr. WYDEN. Mr. Chairman, this amendment authorizes the Secretary of the Interior acting pursuant to Federal reclamation law and in accordance with the Pacific Northwest Electric Power Planning and Conservation Act to design, construct, operate, and maintain fish passage facilities within the Yakima River basin, and to accept funds from any entity, public or private, to design, construct, operate, and maintain such facilities.

This amendment will clarify the congressional purposes in section 4(h) of the Pacific Northwest Power Act and involves no expenditures of taxpayer funds.

The 1980 Northwest Power Act, recognizing the national economic and social importance of fish and wildlife in the Pacific Northwest, directs the development of a fish and wildlife program for the Columbia River basin and its tributaries. The program, adopted by the Northwest Power Council, in November of 1982, prescribes fish and wildlife measures to be implemented by appropriate Federal agencies throughout the Columbia River basin.

The Bureau of Reclamation is a key Federal player in the implementation of the council's fish and wildlife program. To carry out the program in a sound, business-like manner, cooperation of the Bureau of Reclamation is essential as the program contains measures prescribing fish and wildlife improvements at Bureau of Reclamation owned and operated facilities. These improvements will be funded by the citizens of the Northwest through the Bonneville Power Administration. However, the Bureau believes it needs the authority to accept transfers of funds from the Bonneville Power Administration and authorities to carry out the Bureau's protection, mitigation, and enhancement responsibilities, at projects where it currently lacks a fish and wildlife authorization.

This amendment removes any such impediments and is vitally important to the salmon and steelhead of the Columbia River basin, the Pacific Northwest, and the Nation as a whole. It provides the necessary authority to the Bureau of Reclamation so it may expeditiously fulfill the mandates of the Pacific Northwest Power Act.

Let me reiterate that this amendment will not increase the burden to the national taxpayer. The Columbia basin fish and wildlife program is a regionally funded program. The Northwest Power Act directs the Bonneville Power Administration to use its fund and authorities to protect, mitigate, and enhance fish and wildlife to the extent affected by any hydroelectric project of the Columbia River and its tributaries in a manner consistent with the fish and wildlife program.

Finally, I wish to note that no additional authority is required for Bonneville to transfer funds to the Bureau of Reclamation. The Northwest Power Act authorizes the Bonneville Power Administration to use its authorities to transfer funds, as necessary, to carry out protection, mitigation, and enhancement activities for fish and wildlife in the Columbia River basin.

Bonneville obtains congressional approval to fund major fish protection, mitigation, and enhancement projects through appropriations acts. That is how Congress intended such approval would be obtained, thus no authorizing legislation is necessary for Bonneville to carry out their responsibility to fund and otherwise implement the fish and wildlife program under the Northwest Power Act.

I wish to include in the RECORD at this point a fuller explanation of Congress' intent that the act of Congress that BPA is required to obtain, pursuant to 4(h)(10)(B) of the Northwest Power Act, is an appropriations act.

CONGRESSIONAL APPROVAL PURSUANT TO § 4(h)(10)(B) OF THE NORTHWEST POWER ACT

The Northwest Power Act requires Bonneville to use the BPA fund and other authorities available to the Administrator to implement to Fish and Wildlife Program. In certain circumstances, BPA is additionally required to abide by the processes for funding major transmission facilities established in the Transmission Act. Section 4(h)(10)(B) of the Northwest Power Act provides:

SEC. 4(h)(10)(B). The Administrator may make expenditures from such fund which shall be included in the annual or supplementary budgets submitted to the Congress pursuant to the Federal Columbia River Transmission System Act. Any amounts included in such budget for the construction of capital facilities with an estimated life of greater than 15 years and an estimated cost of at least $1,000,000 shall be funded in the same manner and in accordance with the same procedures as major transmission facilities under the Federal Columbia River Transmission System Act. 16 U.S.C. § 8396(h)(10)(B).

Section 4 of the Federal Columbia River Transmission System Act provides:

SEC. 4. The Secretary of the Interior, acting by and through the Administrator, shall operate and maintain the Federal transmission system within the Pacific Northwest and shall construct improvements, betterments, and additions to and replacements of such system within the Pacific Northwest as he determines are appropriate and required to:

(a) Integrate and transmit the electric power from existing or additional Federal or non-Federal generating units;

(b) provide service to the Administrator's customers;

(c) provide interregional transmission facilities; or

(d) maintain the electrical stability and electrical reliability of the Federal system: Provided, however, That the Administrator shall not construct any transmission facilities outside the Pacific Northwest, excepting customer service facilities within any contiguous areas, not in excess of seventy-five airline miles from said region, which are a part of the service area of a distribution cooperative which has (i) no generating facilities, and (ii) a distribution system from which it serves both within and without said region, nor shall he commence construction of any major transmission facility within the Pacific Northwest, unless the expenditure of the funds for the initiation of such construction is specifically approved by Act of Congress. 16 U.S.C. § 8386.

Congress envisioned that the "Act of Congress" necessary to approve commencement of major transmission facility construction would be obtained in an Appropriation Act.

"The requirement for approval by Congress of initial expenditures preserves Congressional control over major investment decisions which has historically been exercised through the appropriations process. The Committee understands that the annual budget of Bonneville Power Administration will hereafter be submitted to Congress as provided by the Government Corporations Control Act. Except for approval of major new facility construction no affirmative action by Congress is required. However, Congressional approval of such major new starts will be required to be included in the Appropriation Act. Expenditures for construction in subsequent years will not require Congressional approval."

H.R. Rep. No. 93-1375, 93rd Cong. 2nd Sess., reprinted in 1974 U.S. Code Cong. and Ad. News 5810, 5813.

Indeed, BPA has typically obtained such approvals through the appropriations process. For instance, in 1981 Congress approved construction of the Buckley-Summer Lake transmission line through an appropriation act, 94 Stat. 1334.

The phrase "Act of Congress" includes both authorizing legislation and appropriation acts. Friends of the Earth v. Armstrong, 485 F.2d I, (10th Cir. 1973) (en banc); Sierra Club v. Andrus, 610 F.2d 581, 601 (9th Cir., 1979); rev'd on other grounds 451 U.S. 287 (1981).

Consequently, the only "Act of Congress" that BPA is required to obtain, pursuant to section 4(h)(10)(B) of the Northwest Power Act, is an appropriations act specifically identifying the capital fish and wildlife facility.

Mr. UDALL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WYDEN. I yield to the gentleman from Arizona.

Mr. UDALL. Mr. Chairman, I have been asked by a number of my colleagues about the schedule for the completion of the bill. It is always hard to predict, but, Mr. WYDEN of Oregon has an amendment that is not controversial and I intend to accept it. The only other major amendment of which I am aware will be by Mr. BATES of California, dealing with the problems of San Diego in this legislation, and he agrees with me that that will not take more than 15 or 20 minutes. I will have to oppose it; the committee opposes it.

Mr. Chairman, I have an amendment on conservation that I do not think is controversial, and my guess is that we can be out of here in the next hour the way things are pending now. Members who want to make plans might want to know that.

I thank the gentleman for yielding.

Mr. MORRISON of Washington. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WYDEN. I yield to the gentleman from Washington.

Mr. MORRISON of Washington. I thank the gentleman for yielding, and commend him for his leadership on this matter. It is noncontroversial and follows the direction set by this Congress a number of years ago regarding the number of salmon fisheries within the Columbia River system.

Mr. Chairman, I would like to take this moment to engage in a colloquy with the gentleman from Oregon (Mr. WYDEN) regarding the impact of this amendment on water rights.

First, it is my understanding that there is nothing in this amendment that would provide for the appropriation of water by any entity and any derogation of water rights currently established under State water law. Is that correct?

Mr. WYDEN. It is.

Mr. MORRISON of Washington. It is also my understanding that nothing in this amendment would alter or establish the respective water rights of the States, the United States, Indian tribes, or any other individual with respect to any water or water-related rights. Is that correct?

Mr. WYDEN. It is.

Mr. MORRISON of Washington. I thank the gentleman for his responses and for clarifying these points and urge support for this amendment.

Mr. WYDEN. I thank the gentleman, and I just in particular want to thank the distinguished chairman of the full committee, the gentleman from Arizona, for his graciousness and for helping us with this amendment.

Mr. UDALL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WYDEN. I yield to the gentleman from Arizona.

Mr. UDALL. This amendment will allow the Bureau of Reclamation to accept funds from public or private entities to finance the fish program in the Yakima River Basin. The program is designed to rehabilitate the fishing industry that is so important in the Northwest.

I support that program and this amendment.

Mr. WYDEN. I thank the chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Oregon (Mr. WYDEN).

The amendment was agreed to.

AMENDMENT OFFERED BY MR. BATES

Mr. BATES. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. BATES: On page 18, immediately before line 1, insert the following new subparagraph:

(D) Notwithstanding the provisions of subparagraphs B and C, contracts for capacity and associated energy generated at Hoover Dam as a result of the uprating program shall be offered to public and private power entities not presently served by the Boulder Canyon Project Act as specified in this subparagraph. In allocating the uprated power, preference shall first be given to those entities in those states eligible for expenditures from the Reclamation Fund (43 USC 391) serving large residential loads without regard to whether these entities own their own transmission and distribution facilities. Preference shall also be given to entities serving those areas where the retail electric rate for residential use is higher than the average for the state in which the entity or its major service area is located. As a condition for receiving the uprated power, the entity shall be required to certify that the power received will be resold at cost.

□ 1530

Mr. BATES. Mr. Chairman, one minor point of clarification. This amendment is slightly different than the amendment which was printed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD on May 1.

The Bates-Hunter amendment affects only new or upgraded power in section 205 of H.R. 4275. This upgraded power, 503,000 kilowatts, will be available when the Hoover Dam is upgraded.

This amendment would make available this new power to both private and public utilities in the 17 reclamation States which were excluded from this power in the 1928 Boulder Canyon Project Act. The amendment will save consumers money. In the case of San Diego, residents could save from $26 to $43 million per year if this amendment is adopted.

The Hoover Dam power selis for less than one-half cent per kilowatt. San Diego Gas & Electric Co. pays 6 cents a kilowatthour for the electricity it currently buys from Arizona and New Mexico. By the time this energy reached San Diego, residents must pay an average of $76 per month, the highest rate in the Southwest, and the second highest rate in the Nation.

I think the key provision that we are attempting to deal with has to do with the preference clause, which does not allow private utilities without the ability to directly distribute the power to have access to it. Nevada Power Co. has a lot of the power and is a private utility.

Since 1930, power entities in California, Idaho, Wyoming, Arizona, and Nevada have been eligible for this power. The electricity has been sold at bargain prices. In the first 45 years, the price of energy averaged below 1½ mills per kilowatthour, or less than 0.15 per kilowatthour. So although the Western Area Power Administration continues to give preference to government agencies and public utilities, there are private utilities such as Nevada Power that have the benefit of obtaining cheap power for 50 years.

San Diego Gas & Electric attempted to recover some of Hoover's power, and they were told Western is mandated by reclamation law to recognize preference in the sale of Federal power and preference is given to public bodies, cooperatives, State, and Federal governments, and municipalities. Needless to say, most of this power is gone.

Unlike the previous amendment, which I think went to the fundamental issue of national energy policy, we are simply asking of the new power that becomes available, that San Diego Gas & Electric be able to bid on that and receive some of that power.

Mr. HUNTER. Mr. Chairman, will my colleague yield?

Mr. BATES. I yield to my colleague from California.

Mr. HUNTER. I thank the gentleman for yielding.

Mr. Chairman, I commend the gentleman for drafting this amendment. What we are really talking about here is not the existing power that is allocated through the Hoover Dam system but, rather, the upgraded power or the new power that we will be receiving due to upgrading in the power generation system in the dam.

Is that not accurate? We are talking about essentially new power here.

Mr. BATES. That is true.

Mr. HUNTER. What we are really talking about is the criteria that was laid down in the early part of this century whereby most private entities were not allowed to participate in the system. At least one private entity was allowed to participate. Southern California Edison, for example, go in in the 1930's. Southern California Edison, I understand, is a private utility company and yet they do participate, so this is not a matter of having a pure-as-driven snow policy that should never be changed because it already has been changed to some degree.

If we break it down to the human level, we are really talking about people who live in other parts of the State, like those who live in our area in San Diego, who are paying about 11 cents a kilowatthour as compared to other places in the State that are receiving this very cheap Hoover power who are paying abut 6½ cents a kilowatthour, like the Los Angeles area.

So all we are saying is that we want a chance, not at the power that has already been allocated over the years, but at some of this new, upgraded power. We want to have an opportunity to come out and at least have a chance to secure some of that power and to allow our people who are on fixed incomes and who are paying, I believe, the second highest utility cost in the Nation in San Diego County and in other areas around the State, let us give them a chance at bidding on the new power.

I thank the gentleman. I commend him for drafting this amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. For what purpose does the gentleman from California (Mr. HUNTER) rise?

Mr. HUNTER. Mr. Chairman, I rise in support of the amendment offered by the gentleman from California (Mr. BATES).

Mr. Chairman, I yield first to my colleague from California if he has additional statements, and then I would yield to the gentleman from Arizona, the chairman of the committee.

Mr. BATES. I thank the gentleman for yielding.

Mr. Chairman, I would just add to the debate that I think the chairman of the committee is in a difficult position. The negotiations have taken place and the compromises have been reached, and San Diego comes in at the last minute and would, in effect, upset that.

I have to say that we should have been in earlier on these negotiations, and perhaps we could have been more effective. But the point remains that it is at this time unfair to not allow, because of a catch 22 in the preference clause that says if you do not have the ability to directly distribute the energy, you cannot even wait at the end of the line and have preference. It would require that we would go through another entity and, in effect, wheel the energy in order to get it to San Diego.

Because of that, I think we are being unfairly penalized and were not considered in the negotiations and would ask the House to attempt to rectify this inequity.

Mr. HUNTER. I thank the gentleman and I yield to the gentleman from Arizona (Mr. UDALL), the chairman of the committee.

Mr. UDALL. I thank the gentleman. I was seeking time to oppose the amendment. The gentleman has been very active in this and if he needs additional argument, I will be glad to wait until he is through. I think the gentleman ought to make whatever arguments he has first.

Mr. HUNTER. I appreciate the gentleman stating that.

Mr. Chairman, I have no further need for time and I yield back the balance of my time.

Mr. UDALL. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the amendment offered by the gentleman from California (Mr. BATES).

Mr. Chairman, I am sympathetic to the problems of the good people in San Diego and the fine representation they have here in the House.

It seems hard to believe that back in 1937 the Federal Government was begging people to come in and sign up for this cheap hydropower. The city of Los Angeles took a big chunk, and Southern California Edison took some when they did not really need it, thinking that they might in the future. San Diego, for reasons that probably looked valid to them at the time, did not apply for a block of Hoover power.

I do not suppose that that mistake should be pressed down upon them forever, but it explains why we are where we are.

One of my great difficulties in doing anything for San Diego, and I think we can and I want to try, I hope the amendment is defeated and we can then try to work something out, but I do not think it is up to Arizona or people from other States to impose some kind of a settlement on the State of California. When there is war in California between north and south, or San Diego and Los Angeles, we hope for a hard, tough fight with no survivors.

But the officials of California, the Governor, the power people, and the water people negotiated for the last several years what we were going to do when 1987 comes and the contracts run out, and they agreed upon a distribution. It is up to California to change that, as far as I am concerned. If we can work out some arrangement where San Diego gets a piece of this action, it would make me very happy, and I would be glad to participate in negotiations.

It may comfort my friends from San Diego to know one thing, however. One of the major purposes of the hydroelectric power produced at Hoover Dam has been to use the power to pump the water to Los Angeles and San Diego, and the tremendous increase in population in San Diego and Los Angeles has been possible only because during all of these years they were taking a huge chunk of Colorado River water and pumping it up over the mountains and through tunnels and downhill to San Diego and Los Angeles.

Thirteen percent of the whole Hoover power output—I repeat that—today and for the last 30 years, 13 percent of all the Hoover power output has gone to pump water to San Diego. So it is not as though San Diego were getting no benefit whatever from this project. They have benefited somewhat already.

Mr. Chairman, as I say, I would like to try to work out with the California people, maybe acting as a peacemaker, some kind of participation in this, but at this time I have to oppose this amendment.

Mr. McCAIN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike the requisite number of words, and I rise in reluctant opposition to the amendment.

It is with reluctance, I say to my good friends from San Diego, that I rise in opposition to the amendment because I have great respect for and understanding of the problems that are facing a city that is growing as San Diego is, with the increasingly high costs for utilities and energy. But I just do not believe, as our distinguished chairman of the committee has said, that this is the vehicle for solving that problem.

I believe that it must be settled within the State of California. I would, along with the committee chairman, assist in any way to see that these agreements are made so that San Diego would receive its share. They are receiving 13 percent of the Hoover power output now which is pumping the very badly needed water to San Francisco.

Finally, the consequences of an amendment of this sort would be terribly disruptive to the agreements that have been made throughout the West, not to mention this very carefully crafted agreement over a long period of time. It could drive all three States back into court again, with the very serious prospects of litigation rather than benefiting from the meaningful negotiations that have taken place.

Mr. Chairman, I yield back the balance of my time.

Mr. LOWERY of California. Mr. Chairman, I rise in support of this amendment and my constituents who shoulder some of the highest utility rates in America. The rates, dependent as they are on fossil fuel and nuclear sources, are appalling.

San Diego, the second largest city in California, receives no direct allocation of hydroelectric power despite the fact that 65 percent of all Hoover Dam electricity is transmitted to California.

Why? Because the orginal allocation formula which has developed 50 years ago—and perpetuated by this bill—and does not meet today's energy realities.

A new allocation mechanism is needed and this amendment provides it. The inequitable distribution of hydropower will be corrected.

I urge your "aye" vote for the consumers of our community—a community that has long since outgrown the Depression-era allocation for Western hydropower.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from California (Mr. BATES).

The question was taken, and on a division (demanded by Mr. UDALL), there were—ayes 6, noes 33.

So the amendment was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. Are there further amendments to title II?

AMENDMENT OFFERED BY MR. UDALL

Mr. UDALL. Mr. Chairman, I have an amendment at the desk which adds a new title III, and I will offer it now if this is the appropriate time.

The CHAIRMAN. First the Chair will inquire, are there further amendments to title II?

If not, are there further amendments?

Mr. UDALL. Mr. Chairman, I have an amendment at the desk adding a new title III, and I offer it at this time.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. UDALL: Page 27, (Union Calendar No. 368), after line 11, add the following:

TITLE II

SEC. 301. (a) Each long-term firm power service contract entered into or amended subsequent to one year from the date of enactment of this Act by the Secretary of Energy acting by and through the Western Area Power Administration (hereinafter "Western"), shall contain an article requiring the development and implementation by the purchaser thereunder of an energy conservation program. A long-term firm power service contract is any contract for the sale by Western of firm capacity, with or without energy, which is to be delivered over a period of more than one year. The term "purchaser" includes parent-type entities and their distribution or user members. If more than one such contract exists with a purchaser, each such contract article shall:

(1) contain time schedules for meeting program goals and delineate actions to be taken in the event such schedules are not met, which may include a reduction of the allocation of capacity or energy to such purchaser as would otherwise be provided under such contract; and

(2) provide for review and modification of the energy conservation program at not to exceed five year intervals.

(b) For purposes of this title, an energy conservation program shall:

(1) apply to all uses of energy and capacity which are provided from any federal project;

(2) contain definite goals;

(3) encourage customer consumption efficiency improvements and demand management practices which ensure that the available supply of hydroelectric power is used in an economically efficient and environmentally sound manner.

SEC. 302. (a) Within one year after the date of enactment of this Act, Western shall amend its existing regulations (46 Fed. Reg. 56140) to reflect—

(1) the elements to be considered in the energy conservation programs required by this title, and

(2) Western's criteria for evaluating and approving such programs.

Such amended regulations shall be promulgated only after public notice and opportunity to comment in accordance with the Administrative Procedure Act (5 U.S.C. 551-706).

(b) The following elements shall be considered by Western in evaluating energy conservation programs:

(1) energy consumption efficiency improvements;

(2) use of renewable energy resources in addition to hydroelectric power;

(3) load management techniques;

(4) cogeneration;

(5) rate design improvements, including;

(i) cost of service pricing;

(ii) elimination of declining block rates;

(iii) time of day rates;

(iv) seasonal rates; and

(v) interruptible rates; and

(6) production efficiency improvements.

(c) Where a purchaser is implementing one or more of the foregoing elements under a program responding to Federal, State, or other initiatives that apply to conservation and renewable energy development, in evaluating that purchaser's energy conservation program submitted pursuant to this title Western shall make due allowance for the incorporation of such elements within the energy conservation program required by this title.

Mr. UDALL (during the reading). Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the amendment be considered as read and printed in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Arizona?

There was no objection.

Mr. UDALL. Mr. Chairman, when this bill first came to our committee for hearing, some objections were made, particularly by the Environmental Defense Fund group, that we did not have adequate measures for conservation, and that the effect of all this cheap power was encouragement for consumers to waste power.

I have strongly believed in energy conservation. I think the American people have gotten the message. We have slowed down the growth of electric power, and I think in large part that is due to conservation.

So this amendment requires that each contract for long-term power supply contain a provision stating that the power customer will develop and implement a conservation program. And that "customer" means the utility or the public power group. And in evaluating the energy program, the Federal Marketing Agency shall look at energy consumption efficiency improvements, use of renewable energy resources, load management techniques, cogeneration, and rate design improvement.

In other words, they do not get any of this Hoover hydropower unless the company or the utility has in place a conservation program that meets these tests.

Mr. Chairman, I believe this strengthens the conservation program, and that this amendment will enable us to stretch out the benefits of hydropower further than at the present time, and I urge the adoption of the amendment.

Mr. EDGAR. Mr. Chairman, I rise in strong support of the amendment.

Mr. Chairman, I would like to commend the gentleman from Arizona (Mr. UDALL) for including title III in this legislation at this time. This amendment has strong conservation provision and forces those who are in use of this power to take a look at ways in which they can conserve that resource.

I note as part of the amendment that it indicates in paragraph (b) that "the following elements shall be considered by Western in evaluating energy conservation programs:" The first is energy consumption efficiency improvements; second, the use of renewable energy resources in addition to hydroelectric power; third, load management techniques; fourth, cogeneration; fifth, rate design improvements, including cost of service pricing, elimination of declining block rates, time of day rates, seasonal rates, and interruptible rates; and, sixth, production efficiency improvements.

I believe that this amendment drafted by the chairman of this committee adds a new feature to this legislation and begins to move in a positive policy direction for the distribution of the power. I commend the gentleman for his leadership on this conservation amendment.

Mr. BROWN of California. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. EDGAR. I yield to the gentleman from California.

Mr. BROWN of California. Mr. Chairman, may I join with the gentleman from Pennsylvania in commending the gentleman from Arizona for offering the amendment. I think it has far-reaching implications.

I would like to see the gentleman consider the possibility that similar language could be added in connection with other public power projects, and that this be called to the attention of all of the State utility regulatory commissions as a possible feature to include in their own regulatory programs in connection with requests for rate increases from private utilities throughout the country. I think the country would be considerably better off if this kind of approach were used on a widespread basis throughout the United States.

Mr. EDGAR. Mr. Chairman, I thank the gentleman from California.

Mr. UDALL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. EDGAR. I yield to the gentleman from Arizona.

Mr. UDALL. Mr. Chairman, I want to thank the gentleman from California (Mr. BROWN) for his kind remarks, and I thank the gentleman from Pennsylvania (Mr. EDGAR) for working on this conservation amendment. It is a real step forward and it is a tribute to his tenacity that we are where we are today on energy conservation. I look forward to working with him on this kind of thing in the future.

Mr. EDGAR. Mr. Chairman, I thank the chairman of the committee very much.

Mr. LUJAN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. EDGAR. I yield to the gentleman from New Mexico.

Mr. LUJAN. Mr. Chairman, I thank the gentleman for yielding, and I take this time only to commend the gentleman from Arizona (Mr. UDALL) for offering this amendment. This is the kind of amendment every Member ought to support. Everybody wins with conservation of energy, and I again compliment the gentleman from Arizona for offering the amendment.

Mr. EDGAR. Mr. Chairman, I thank the gentleman from new Mexico (Mr. LUJAN).

Just in conclusion, Mr. Chairman, I would like to point out that this conservation amendment is a policy initiative that is placed on this legislation.

□ 1550

Earlier we had some discussion about the need to have some policy discussions and hearings on the issue of cost sharing. There is a need to have policy discussions on a whole host of issues and I really commend the chairman for at least taking the first step in this area of conservation. I hope all our colleagues will support this amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Arizona (Mr. UDALL).

The amendment was agreed to.

AMENDMENT OFFERED BY MR. HUNTER

Mr. HUNTER. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. HUNTER: On Page 18, immediately before line 1, insert the following new subparagraph:

(D) Notwithstanding the provisions of subparagraphs (B) and (C), contracts for 10 Megawatts of the California share of capacity and associated energy generated at Hoover Dam as a result of the uprating program shall be offered to public and private power entities not presently served by the Hoover Powerplant as specified in this subparagraph. In allocating 10 Megawatts of the uprated power, preference shall be given to entities servicing those areas where the retail electric rate for residential use is higher than the average for the state in which the entity, or its major service is located, without regard to whether these entities own their own transmission and distribution facilities. As a condition for receiving the uprated power, the entity shall be required to certify that the power received will be resold at cost plus distribution costs. The remaining California share of the uprated power shall be allocated proportionately to California entities which would be entitled to receive such power under existing law as amended by this Act.

POINT OF ORDER

Mr. McCAIN (during the reading). Mr. Chairman, I have a point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state the point of order.

Mr. McCAIN. I believe that that amendment is to title II which we have completed in the regular course of considering legislation. I believe the amendment is out of order at this time.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from California wish to be heard on the point of order?

Mr. HUNTER. I wish to be heard, Mr. Chairman.

It is true that after the amendment before last, I rose. The chairman, the gentleman from Arizona, rose also and was heard and his amendment went into title III.

Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent—and I think the chairman would speak to this issue—I would ask unanimous consent that this amendment be considered. I was on my feet and apparently was overlooked, so I ask unanimous consent that this amendment be made in order.

The CHAIRMAN. An amendment adding a new title having been adopted. The gentleman from California can only offer this amendment by unanimous consent. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from California?

There was no objection.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will complete the reading of the amendment.

The Clerk continued the reading of the amendment.

Mr. HUNTER (during the reading). Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the amendment be considered as read and printed in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from California?

There was no objection.

Mr. HUNTER. Mr. Chairman, I appreciate being allowed to offer this amendment. I will make it very brief. This amendment deals with the problem that we have again in California and I know the gentleman from California (Mr. BATES) and the gentleman from California (Mr. LOWERY) and the gentleman from California (Mr. PACKARD) have been contributing to this effort. This amendment deals with the fact that in California generally speaking private entities, like San Diego Gas & Electric, and many others throughout the State, are not allowed to participate in Hoover power simply because the original enacting legislation back in the thirties set the preference only to public entities.

I realize that a system has been built up, that deals have essentially been executed and everybody knows what their share of the pie is going to be, including a number of California communities.

So this amendment would cut down the scale of the attempt that was made in several other amendments to open the bill up to some degree. There would be no effect whatsoever on the State of Arizona, on the State of Nevada, or any other State except California, and the only effect of the bill is this. Essentially upgrading our power and we are going to be producing some 500 extra megawatts because of the upgrading in power. Of those 500 extra megawatts, about 127 of them will go to California and these communities, Anaheim, Banning, Colton, Riverside, Azusa, Pasadena, Glendale, and Burbank, under the negotiations that have been undertaken will participate and will receive and split up those 127 megawatts; so all that we are asking in this amendment is to take 10 of those 127 megawatts and allow those 10 to be applied for by entities throughout the State, whether they are public or private, who happen to have high rates for energy. For example, in San Diego it is now 11 cents a kilowatthour. Many of our senior citizens are in very difficult shape, are paying a lot of money for energy. Other parts of the State have very high energy costs.

So this would only take about 5 percent of that upgraded power, 10 megawatts, and make it available to those entities in the State that have high energy costs. The remaining 117 megawatts for the State of California would be divided with exactly the same apportionment as has already been entered into; so that means, for example, if one of these cities, Anaheim, Banning, Colton, or Riverside, was going to receive maybe 9½ megawatts, they might receive 8.5 megawatts instead, or 8.7 megawatts. They will not have a drastic reduction. Nobody will be eliminated, but it will give these communities with very high power costs a chance to participate.

I would ask the chairman of the committee if he would comment on this amendment.

Mr. UDALL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HUNTER. Certainly.

Mr. UDALL. I appreciate the difficulties the gentleman and his colleagues in southern California, the gentleman from California (Mr. BATES) are in and I appreciate the aggressive way the gentleman has tried to take on the problems of San Diego and do something about them in this legislation; but this amendment has all the vices of the Bates amendment.

I am not going to referee a California water fight or electric power fight. If I were in California, I think I would sit down and see if I could not find some way along this line where we might get some power for San Diego; but long and tedious negotiations were held inside California, intra-California, before they ever came out to deal with Arizona and Nevada.

I will help the gentleman all I can down the road in the future to try to get something done. The suggestion the gentleman makes does not bother me; you take a little bit here and a little bit there and add up to a small block for San Diego; but this again would destroy the preference clause, would destroy the agreement reached by the California interests and heavily impact on the three-State agreement that brings us here today.

Mr. HUNTER. I thank the chairman for his comments. Perhaps I should not have asked for them; but in the least it would not affect Arizona and it would not affect Nevada.

Mr. UDALL. Exactly, and we do not care. If there is an agreement in California, fine; if there is a war, not so fine.

Mr. McCAIN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HUNTER. I yield to my friend, the gentleman from Arizona.

Mr. McCAIN. Mr. Chairman, I also rise in opposition with great regret.

I only wish we could have had this kind of dialog during the committee hearings and markups as we went through this bill. I think we could have addressed it a lot better. I would hope there is some vehicle we could have to address the serious concerns of the city of San Diego on this issue.

Mr. HUNTER. Mr. Chairman, I thank the gentleman.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from California (Mr. HUNTER).

The amendment was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. Are there further amendments? If not, the question is on the committee amendment in the nature of a substitute, as amended.

The committee amendment in the nature of a substitute, as amended, was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. Under the rule, the Committee rises.

Accordingly the Committee rose; and the Speaker pro tempore (Mr. LONG of Louisiana) having assumed the chair, Mr. FLIPPO, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the State of the Union, reported that that Committee, having had under consideration the bill (H.R. 4275) to authorize the Secretary of the Interior to construct, operate, and maintain hydroelectric powerplants at various existing water projects, and for other purposes, pursuant to House Resolution 491, he reported the bill back to the House with an amendment adopted by the Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under the rule, the previous question is ordered.

Is a separate vote demanded on any amendment to the committee amendment in the nature of a substitute adopted by the Committee of the Whole? If not, the question is on the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, and was read the third time.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the passage of the bill.

The question was taken; and the Speaker pro tempore announced that the ayes appeared to have it.

RECORDED VOTE

Mrs. BOXER. Mr. Speaker, I demand a recorded vote.

A recorded vote was refused.

Mrs. BOXER. Mr. Speaker, I object to the vote on the ground that a quorum is not present and make the point of order that a quorum is not present.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Evidently a quorum is not present.

The Sergeant at Arms will notify absent Members.

The vote was taken by electronic device, and there were—yeas 279, nays 95, not voting 59, as follows:

The Clerk announced the following pair:

On this vote:

Mr. Jones of Tennessee for, with Mr. Breaux against.

Messrs. HUGHES, SCHEUER, FOGLIETTA, WEAVER, HERTEL of Michigan, ECKART, D'AMOURS, TOWNS, LONG of Maryland, SLATTERY, PEASE, and RANGEL changed their votes from "yea" to "nay."

Mr. WHITTEN changed his vote from "nay" to "yea."

So the bill was passed.

The result of the vote was announced as above recorded.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

Mr. UDALL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the Committee on Interior and Insular Affairs be discharged from further consideration of the Senate bill (S. 268) to authorize the Secretary of the Interior to construct, operate, and maintain hydroelectric powerplants at various existing water projects, and for other purposes, a measure similar to the bill just passed, and ask for its immediate consideration.

The Clerk read the title of the Senate bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Arizona?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the Senate bill, as follows:

S. 268

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled,

TITLE I

SEC. 101. The Secretary of the Interior, acting pursuant to the Federal reclamation laws (Acts of June 17, 1902, 32 Stat. 388 and Acts amendatory thereof and supplemental thereto), is authorized to construct, operate, and maintain hydroelectric powerplants at existing reclamation project facilities at locations and in the approximate capacities set forth in section 104 of this Act: Provided, That construction by the Secretary of the Interior of a powerplant designated in subsection (a), (c), or (g) of section 104 of this Act may not proceed prior to October 1, 1985, or if a license has been issued prior to such date to a non-Federal entity pursuant to section 4(e) of the Federal Power Act (16 U.S.C. 797) to construct such powerplant. In carrying out the purposes of title I of this Act, the Secretary of the Interior is authorized to modify the capacity of a powerplant designated in section 104 as determined to be necessary or desirable during postauthorization study and design, and after consultation with the Secretary of Energy.

SEC. 102. The Secretary of Energy is authorized to construct, operate, and maintain transmission facilities as required physically to connect the hydroelectric powerplants authorized in section 104 of this Act to existing power systems and as he determines necessary to accomplish distribution and marketing of power generated by powerplants constructed pursuant to section 104 of this Act, and to purchase replacement capacity, energy, or both in order to maintain contractual deliveries to customers during unit outages which result from Federal construction of the powerplants authorized in section 104 of this Act.

SEC. 103. During Federal construction of powerplants authorized in section 104 of this Act, the Secretary of the Interior and the Secretary of Energy shall seek to minimize the loss of capacity, energy, or both to power customers due to unit outages which result from such construction. The Secretary of Energy shall seek to maintain contractual deliveries of capacity, energy, or both at contract prices to customers affected by unit outages resulting from such Federal construction.

SEC. 104. (a) Whiskeytown powerplant unit, Central Valley project, California, consisting of a turbine generator unit of three thousand kilowatts on the outlet works of Whiskeytown Dam.

(b) Yellowtail Afterbay powerplant unit, Pick-Sloan Missouri Basin program, Montana, consisting of a turbine generator unit of ten thousand kilowatts on the outlet works of Yellowtail Afterbay Dam.

(c) Red Bluff powerplant unit, Central Valley project, California, consisting of four turbine generator units of two thousand five hundred kilowatts each at Red Bluff Diversion Dam.

(d) Palisades Powerplant enlargement, Palisades project, Idaho-Wyoming, consisting of one or more turbine generator units so as to increase the powerplant capacity by ninety thousand kilowatts.

(e) Anderson Ranch powerplant unit, Boise project, Idaho, consisting of a turbine and generator unit to increase the powerplant capacity by thirty thousand kilowatts.

(f) Minidoka powerplant rehabilitation and enlargement, Minidoka project, Idaho-Wyoming, consisting of two turbine generator units of fifteen thousand kilowatts each in replacement of existing units one through six.

(g) Guernsey powerplant enlargement, North Platte project, Wyoming, consisting of one turbine generator unit to increase the powerplant capacity by fifteen thousand kilowatts.

SEC. 105. (a) Hydroelectric power generated by Federal facilities constructed pursuant to section 104 of this Act shall be delivered to the Secretary of Energy for distribution and marketing through existing Federal hydroelectric power marketing programs in accordance with existing law and policy consistent with the provisions of title I of this Act.

(b) The Federal powerplants constucted pursuant to section 104 of this Act shall be financially integrated with and the power marketed under rate schedules in effect for the several programs as follows:

(1) Whiskeytown and Red Bluff powerplant units shall be marketed through the Central Valley project power marketing program;

(2) Yellowtail Afterbay powerplant unit shall be marketed through the Pick-Sloan Missouri Basin program power marketing program;

(3) Palisades powerplant enlargement, Anderson Ranch powerplant unit, and Minidoka powerplant rehabilitation and enlargement shall be marketed through the Federal Columbia River Power System; and

(4) Guernsey powerplant unit shall be marketed through the Western Division, Pick-Sloan Missouri Basin program marketing program.

SEC. 106. Powerplants authorized in section 104 of this Act shall be designed, constructed, and operated in such a manner as to be compatible with valid existing water rights or water delivery to the holder of any valid water service contract.

SEC. 107. The interest rate used for computing interest during construction and interest on the unpaid balance of the reimbursable cost of a powerplant authorized in section 104 of this Act shall be determined by the Secretary of the Treasury, as of the beginning of the fiscal year in which construction of such powerplant commenced, on the basis of the computed average interest rate payable by the Treasury upon its outstanding marketable public obligations which are neither due nor callable for fifteen years from the date of issue.

SEC. 108. (a) There are hereby authorized to be appropriated beginning October 1, 1983, to the Secretary of the Interior for construction of the powerplants authorized in section 104 of this Act the amounts set forth in subsection (b), on the basis of October 1983 price levels, plus or minus such amounts as may be justified by reason of ordinary fluctuations of construction cost indexes applicable to the type of construction involved herein. There are also authorized to be appropriated to the Secretary of Energy such sums as may be necessary for the purposes of sections 102 and 103 of this Act, and to the Secretary of the Interior such additional sums as may be necessary for the operation and maintenance of the Federal powerplants authorized in section 104 of this Act.

(b)(1) Whiskeytown powerplant unit, $3,780,000.

(2) Yellowtail Afterbay powerplant, $25,600,000.

(3) Red Bluff powerplant unit, $42,100,000.

(4) Palisades powerplant enlargement, $76,000,000.

(5) Anderson Ranch powerplant unit, $14,317,000.

(6) Minidoka powerplant rehabilitation and enlargement, $73,437,000.

(7) Guernsey powerplant enlargement, $22,337,000.

SEC. 109. The provisions of this title I shall not apply to any project authorized or affected by title II of this Act.

TITLE II

SEC. 201. (a) The Secretary of the Interior is authorized to increase the capacity of existing generating equipment and appurtenances at Hoover Powerplant (hereinafter "Uprating Program"); and to improve parking, visitor facilities, and roadways and to provide additional elevators, and other facilities that will contribute to the safety and sufficiency of visitor access to Hoover Dam and Powerplant (hereinafter "Visitor Facilities Program").

(b) The Secretary of the Interior is authorized to construct a Colorado River bridge crossing, including suitable approach spans, immediately downstream from Hoover Dam for the purpose of alleviating traffic congestion and reducing safety hazards. This bridge shall not be a part of the Boulder Canyon Project and shall neither be funded nor repaid from the Colorado River Dam Fund or the Lower Colorado River Basin Development Fund.

SEC. 202. (a) Clause (1) of subsection (c) of section 403 of the Colorado River Basin Project Act of 1968 (43 U.S.C. 1543(c); 82 Stat. 894) is revised to read as follows:

"(1) all revenues collected in connection with the operation of facilities authorized in Title III in furtherance of the purposes of this Act (except entrance, admission, and other recreation fees or charges and proceeds received from recreation concessionaires), until completion of repayment requirements of the Central Arizona Project;".

(b) Clause (2) of said subsection (c) is revised by inserting immediately preceding the existing proviso: "Provided, however, That for the Boulder Canyon Project commencing June 1, 1987, and for the Parker-Davis Project commencing June 1, 2005, and until the end of the repayment period for the Central Arizona Project described in section 301(a) of this Act, the Secretary of Energy shall provide for such surplus revenues by including the equivalent of 4½ mills per kilowatt-hour in the rates charged to purchasers in Arizona for application to the purposes specified in subsection (f) of this section and by including the equivalent of 2½ mills per kilowatt-hour in the rates charged to purchasers in California and Nevada for application to the purposes of subsection (g) of this section as amended and supplemented: Provided further, That after the repayment period for said Central Arizona Project, the equivalent of 2½ mills per kilowatt-hour shall be included by the Secretary of Energy in the rates charged to purchasers in Arizona, California and Nevada to provide revenues for applications to the purposes of said subsection (g) of this section:".

SEC. 203. The Boulder Canyon Project Act of 1928 (43 U.S.C. 617 et seq.; 45 Stat. 1057), as amended and supplemented, is further amended:

(a) In the first sentence of section 2(b), by striking out "except that the aggregate amount of such advances shall not exceed the sum of $165,000,000", and by replacing the comma after the word "Act" with a period.

(b) In section 3, by deleting "$165,000,000" and inserting in lieu thereof "$242,000,000, of which $77,000,000 (October 1983 price levels) shall be adjusted plus or minus such amounts as may be justified by reason of ordinary fluctuations of construction costs as indicated by engineering cost indices applicable to the type of construction involved herein. Said $77,000,000 represents the additional amount required for the Uprating Program and the Visitor Facilities Program.".

SEC. 204. The Boulder Canyon Project Adjustment Act of 1940 (43 U.S.C. 618 et seq.; 54 Stat. 774), as amended and supplemented, is further amended:

(a) In section 1 by deleting the phrase "during the period beginning June 1, 1937, and ending May 31, 1987" appearing in the introductory paragraph of section 1 and in section 1(a), and inserting in lieu thereof "beginning June 1, 1937".

(b) In section 1(b) by deleting the phrase "and such portion of such advances made on and after June 1, 1937, as (on the basis of repayment thereof within such fifty-year period or periods as the Secretary may determine) will be repayable prior to June 1, 1987" and inserting in lieu thereof "and such advances made on and after June 1, 1937, over fifty-year periods".

(c) In section 1 by deleting the word "and" at the end of subsection (c); deleting the period at the end of subsection (d) and inserting in lieu therof "; and", and by adding subsection (e) to read:

"(e) To provide revenues from and after June 1, 1987, for application to the purposes specified in section 403(c)(2) of the Colorado River Basin Project Act of 1968, as amended and supplemented.".

(d) In section 2:

(1) By deleting the first sentence and subsection (a) and inserting in lieu thereof:

"All receipts from the project shall be paid into the Colorado River Dam Fund and shall be available, without further appropriation, for:

"(a) Defraying the costs of operation (including purchase of supplemental energy to meet temporary deficiencies in firm energy which the Secretary of Energy is obligated by contract to supply), maintenance and replacements of, and emergency expenditures for, all facilities of the project, within such separate limitations as may be included in annual appropriations Acts;" and

(2) By deleting existing section 2(e) and inserting in lieu thereof a new section 2(e) reading:

"(e) Transfer to the Lower Colorado River Basin Development Fund established by Title IV of the Colorado River Basin Project Act of 1968, as amended and supplemented, of the revenues referred to in section 1(e) of this Act.".

(e) By deleting the final period and placing a colon at the end of section 6 and adding: "Provided, That on appropriated funds advanced, respectively, for the Uprating Program and for the Visitor Facilities Program as defined in section 201(a) of [S. 268], the rate of interest for advances for each shall be determined by the Secretary of the Treasury, as of the beginning of the fiscal year in which the initial advance for the particular program involved is made, on the basis of the computed average interest rate payable by the Treasury upon its outstanding marketable public obligations which are neither due nor callable for fifteen years from the date of issue.".

(f) In section 12, in the paragraph beginning with "Replacements", by deleting "during the period from June 1, 1937, to May 31, 1987, inclusive" and inserting in lieu thereof "beginning June 1, 1937".

SEC. 205. (a) Capacity resulting from the Uprating Program and associated energy shall be allocated for use in Arizona, California, and Nevada in the respective amounts specified in the applicable power marketing criteria promulgated by the Secretary of Energy. Such allocated capacity and associated energy shall be disposed of only pursuant to contracts effective June 1, 1987, and expiring on September 30, 2017, between the Secretary of Energy and purchasers in Arizona, California, and Nevada eligible to enter into such contracts under section 5 of the Boulder Canyon Project Act: Provided, however, That in the case of Arizona and Nevada, such contracts shall be made with the agency designated by State law as the agent of such State for purchasing power from the Boulder Canyon Project.

(b) The Uprating Program authorized under section 201(a) of this Act may be undertaken with appropriated funds or with funds advanced under contracts made with the Secretary of the Interior by non-Federal purchasers described in subsection (a) of this section, or a combination thereof. Any funding provided by non-Federal purchasers shall be advanced to the Secretary of the Interior pursuant to the terms and conditions of such contracts.

(c) Notwithstanding any other provisions of the law, funds advanced by non-Federal purchasers for use in the Uprating Program shall be deposited in the Colorado River Dam Fund and shall be available for the Uprating Program.

(d) Those amounts advanced by non-Federal purchasers shall be financially integrated as capital costs with other project costs for rate-setting purposes, and shall be returned to those purchasers advancing funds throughout the contract period through credits which include interest costs incurred by such purchasers for funds contributed to the Secretary of the Interior for the Uprating Program.

SEC. 206. Reimbursement of funds appropriated for construction of facilities authorized under section 201(a) of this Act, inclusive of any funds advanced by non-Federal purchasers, shall be a repayment requirement of the Boulder Canyon Project beginning with the first day of the month following completion of the installation, except that the costs of the Visitor Facilities Program as defined in section 201(a) of this Act shall become a repayment requirement beginning June 1, 1987, or when substantially completed, as determined by the Secretary of the Interior, if later.

SEC. 207. This Act shall not be construed to either support or prejudice—

(a) claims concerning the existence or scope of any right to renew a contract in effect on the date of this Act for purchase of electrical energy generated at Hoover Dam, including, but not limited to, any right to increased capacity resulting from the Uprating Program,

(b) claims concerning the existence or scope of preference in the purchase of electrical energy generated at Hoover Dam, including, but not limited to, any right to increased capacity resulting from the Uprating Program, or

(c) any right to determine by arbitration or court proceedings any dispute or disagreement as to the interpretation or performance of any provisions of this Act or any other laws of the United States in effect on the date of this Act, or the Criteria or Regulations, either to be published or subsequently amended relating in any way to allocation of energy generated at Hoover Dam from capacity existing on the date of this Act or increased capacity resulting from the Uprating Program.

MOTION OFFERED BY MR. UDALL

Mr. UDALL. Mr. Speaker, I offer a motion.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. UDALL moves to strike out all after the enacting clause of the Senate bill, S. 268, and to insert in lieu thereof the provisions of the bill, H.R. 4275, as passed, as follows:

S. 268

SECTION 1. This Act may be cited as the "Hoover Powerplant Act of 1984".

TITLE I

SEC. 101. (a) The Secretary of the Interior is authorized to increase the capacity of existing generating equipment and appurtenances at Hoover Powerplant (hereinafter in this Act referred to as "uprating program"); and to improve parking, visitor facilities, and roadways and to provide additional elevators, and other facilities that will contribute to the safety and sufficiency of visitor access to Hoover Dam and Powerplant (hereinafter in this Act referred to as "visitor facilities program").

(b) The Secretary of the Interior is authorized to construct a Colorado River bridge crossing, including suitable approach spans, immediately downstream from Hoover Dam for the purpose of alleviating traffic congestion and reducing safety hazards. This bridge shall not be a part of the Boulder Canyon project and shall neither be funded nor repaid from the Colorado River Dam Fund or the Lower Colorado River Basin Development Fund.

SEC. 102. (a) Section 403(b) of the Colorado River Basin Project Act of 1968 (82 Stat. 894, as amended, 43 U.S.C. 1543) is amended by inserting "(1)" after "(b)" and adding the following new paragraph at the end thereof:

"(2) Except as provided in subsection 309(b), as amended, sums advanced by non-Federal entities for the purpose of carrying out the provisions of title III of this Act shall be credited to the development fund and shall be available without further appropriation for such purpose.".

(b) Paragraph (1) of section 403(c) of the Colorado River Basin Project Act of 1968 (82 Stat. 894, as amended, 43 U.S.C. 1543(c)) is revised to read as follows:

"(1) all revenues collected in connection with the operation of facilities authorized in title III in furtherance of the purposes of this Act (except entrance, admission, and other recreation fees or charges and proceeds received from recreation concessionaires), until completion of repayment requirements of the Central Arizona project;".

(c) Paragraph (2) of section 403(c) is revised by inserting immediately preceding the existing proviso: "Provided, however, That the Boulder Canyon project commencing June 1, 1987, and for the Parker-Davis project commencing June 1, 2005, and until the end of the repayment period for the Central Arizona project described in section 301(a) of this Act, the Secretary of Energy shall provide for surplus revenues by including the equvalent of 4½ mills per kilowatthour in the rates charged to purchasers in Arizona for application to the purposes specified in subsection (f) of this section and by including the equivalent 2½ mills per kilowatthour in the rates charged to purchasers in California and Nevada for application to the purposes of subsection (g) of this section as amended and supplemented: Provided further, That after the repayment period for said Central Arizona project, the equivalent of 2½ mills per kilowatthour shall be included by the Secretary of Energy in the rates charged to purchasers in Arizona, California, and Nevada to provide revenues for application to the purposes of said subsection (g) of this section:".

SEC. 103. (a) The Boulder Canyon Project Act of 1928 (45 Stat. 1057, as amended, 43 U.S.C. 617 et seq.), as amended and supplemented, is further amended:

(1) In the first sentence of section 2(b), by striking out "except that the aggregate amount of such advances shall not exceed the sum of $165,000,000", and by replacing the comma after the word "Act" with a period.

(2) In section 3, by deleting "$165,000,000." and inserting in lieu thereof "$242,000,000, of which $77,000,000 (October 1983 price levels) shall be adjusted plus or minus such amounts as may be justified by reason of ordinary fluctuations of construction costs as indicated by engineering cost indices applicable to the type of construction involved herein. Said $77,000,000 represents the additional amount required for the uprating program and the visitor facilities program.".

(b) Except as amended by this Act, the Boulder Canyon Project Act of 1928 (45 Stat. 1057, as amended, 43 U.S.C. 617 et seq.), as amended and supplemented, shall remain in full force and effect.

SEC. 104. (a) The Boulder Canyon Project Adjustment Act of 1940 (54 Stat. 774, as amended, 43 U.S.C. 618), as amended and supplemented, is further amended:

(1) In section 1 by deleting the phrase "during the period beginning June 1, 1937, and ending May 31, 1987" appearing in the introductory paragraph of section 1 and in section 1(a) and inserting in lieu thereof "beginning June 1, 1937".

(2) In section 1(b) by deleting the phrase "and such portion of such advances made on and after June 1, 1937, as (on the basis of repayment thereof within such fifty-year period or periods as the Secretary may determine) will be repayable prior to June 1, 1987" and inserting in lieu thereof "and such advances made on and after June 1, 1937, over fifty-year periods".

(3) In section 1 by deleting the word "and" at the end of subsection (c); deleting the period at the end of subsection (d) and inserting in lieu thereof "; and", and by adding after subsection (d) the following new subsection (e):

"(e) To provide, by application of the increments to rates specified in section 403(c)(2) of the Colorado River Basin Project Act of 1968, as amended and supplemented, revenues, from and after June 1, 1987, for application to the purposes there specified.".

(4) In section 2:

(i) by deleting the first sentence and subsection (a) and inserting in lieu thereof: "All receipts from the project shall be paid into the Colorado River Dam Fund and shall be available, without further appropriation, for:

"(a) Defraying the costs of operation (including purchase of supplemental energy to meet temporary deficiencies in firm energy which the Secretary of Energy is obligated by contract to supply), maintenance and replacements of, and emergency expenditures for, all facilities of the project, within such separate limitations as may be included in annual appropriations Acts;" and

(ii) by amending subsection (e) to read as follows:

"(e) Transfer to the Lower Colorado River Basin Development Fund established by title IV of the Colorado River Basin Project Act of 1968, as amended and supplemented, of the revenues referred to in section 1(e) of this Act.".

(5) By deleting the final period at the end of section 6 and inserting in lieu thereof the following: ": Provided, That the respective rates of interest on appropriated funds advanced for the visitor facilities program, as described in section 201(a) of the Federal Reclamation Hydroelectric Powerplants Authorization Act of 1983, shall be determined by the Secretary of the Treasury, taking into consideration average market yields on outstanding marketable obligations of the United States with remaining periods to maturity comparable to the reimbursement period of the program during the month preceding the fiscal year in which the costs of the program are incurred. To the extent that more than one interest rate is determined pursuant to the preceding sentence, the Secretary of the Treasury shall establish for repayment purposes an interest rate at a weighted average of the rates so determined.".

(6) In section 12, in the paragraph beginning with "Replacements", by deleting "during the period from June 1, 1937, to May 31, 1987, inclusive" and inserting in lieu thereof "beginning June 1, 1937".

SEC. 105. (a)(1) The Secretary of Energy shall offer:

(A) To each contractor for power generated at Hoover Dam a renewal contract for delivery commencing June 1, 1987, of the amount of capacity and firm energy specified for that contractor in the following table:

SCHEDULE A: LONG TERM CONTINGENT CAPACITY AND ASSOCIATED FIRM ENERGY RESERVED FOR RENEWAL CONTRACT OFFERS TO CURRENT BOULDER CANYON PROJECT CONTRACTORS

Contractor	Contingent capacity (kW)	Firm energy (thousand of kWh)		Total
		Summer	Winter
Metropolitan Water District of Southern California	247,500	904,382	387,592	1,291,974
City of Los Angeles	490,875	488,535	209,658	698,193
Southern California Edison Company	277 500	175,486	75,208	250,694
City of Glendale	18,000	47,398	20,313	67,711
City of Pasadena	11,000	40,655	17,424	58,079
City of Burbank	5,125	14,811	6,347	21,158
Arizona Power Authority	189,000	452,192	193,797	645,989
Colorado River Commission of Nevada	189,000	452,192	193,797	645,989
United States, for Boulder City	20,000	56,000	24,000	80,000
Totals	1,448,000	2,631,651	1,128,136	3,759,787

(B) To purchasers in the States of Arizona, Nevada and California eligible to enter into such contracts under section 5 of the Boulder Canyon Project Act, contracts for delivery commencing June 1, 1987, or as it thereafter becomes available, of capacity resulting from the uprating program and for delivery commencing June 1, 1987, of associated firm energy as specified in the following table:

SCHEDULE B: CONTINGENT CAPACITY RESULTING FROM THE UPRATING PROGRAM AND ASSOCIATED FIRM ENERGY

State	Contigent capacity (kW)	Firm energy (thousands of kWh)
		Summer	Winter	Total
Arizona	188,000	148,000	64,000	212,000
California	127,000	99,850	43,364	143,214
Nevada	188,000	288,000	124,000	412,000
Totals	503,000	535,850	231,364	767,214

Provided, however, That in the case of Arizona and Nevada, such contracts shall be offered to the Arizona Power Authority and the Colorado River Commission of Nevada, respectively, as the agency specified by State law as the agent of such State for purchasing power from the Boulder Canyon project: Provided further, That in the case of California, no such contract under this subparagraph (B) shall be offered to any purchaser who is offered a contract for capacity exceeding 20,000 kilowatts under subparagraph (A) of this paragraph; and

(C) To the Arizona Power Authority and the Colorado River Commission of Nevada and to purchasers in the State of California eligible to enter into such contracts under section 5 of the Boulder Canyon Project Act, contracts for delivery commencing June 1, 1987, of such energy generated at Hoover Dam as is available respectively to the States of Arizona, Nevada, and California in excess of 4,501.001 million kilowatthours in any year of operation (hereinafter called excess energy) in accordance with the following table:

SCHEDULE C: EXCESS ENERGY

Priority of entitlement to excess energy	State
First: Meeting Arizona's first priority right to delivery of excess energy which is equal in each year of operation to 200 million kilowatthours: Provided, however, That in the event excess energy in the amount of 200 million kilowatthours is not generated during any year of operation, Arizona shall accumulate a first right to delivery of excess energy subsequently generated in an amount not to exceed 600 million kilowatthours, inclusive of the current year's 200 million kilowatthours. Said first right of delivery shall accrue at a rate of 200 million kilowatthours per year for each year excess energy in the amount of 200 million kilowatthours is not generated, less amounts of excess energy delivered.	Arizona.
Second: Meeting Hoover Dam contractual obligations under schedule A of section 205(a)(1)(A) and under schedule B of section 205(a)(B) not exceeding 26 million kilowatthours in each year of operation.
Third: Meeting the energy requirements of the three States, such available excess energy to be divided equally among the States.	Arizona, Nevada, California.

(2) The total obligation of the Secretary of Energy to deliver firm energy pursuant to schedule A of section 105(a)(1)(A) and schedule B of section 105(a)(1)(B) is 4,527.001 million kilowatthours in each year of operation. To the extent that the actual generation at Hoover Powerplant in any year of operation (less deliveries thereof to Arizona required by its first priority under schedule C of section 105(a)(1)(C) whenever actual generation in any year of operation is in excess of 4,501.001 million kilowatthours) is less than 4,527.001 million kilowatthours, such deficiency shall be borne by the holders of contracts under said schedules A and B in the ratio that the sum of the quantities of firm energy to which each contractor is entitled pursuant to said schedules bears to 4,527.001 million kilowatthours. At the request of any such contractor, the Secretary of Energy will purchase energy to meet that contractor's deficiency at such contractor's expense.

(3) Subdivision E of the "General Consolidated Power Marketing Criteria or Regulations for Boulder City Area Projects" published in the Federal Register May 9, 1983 (48 Federal Register commencing at 20881), hereinafter referred to as the "Criteria" or as the "Regulations" shall be deemed to have been modified to conform to this section. The Secretary of Energy shall cause to be included in the Federal Register a notice conforming the text of said Regulations to such modifications.

(4) Each contract offered under subsection (a)(1) of this section shall:

(A) expire September 30, 2017;

(B) not restrict use to which the capacity and energy contracted for by the Metropolitan Water District of Southern California may be placed within the State of California: Provided, That to the extent practicable and consistent with sound water management and conservation practice, the Metropolitan Water District of Southern California shall use such capacity and energy to pump available Colorado River water prior to using such capacity and energy to pump California State water project water; and

(C) conform to the applicable provisions of subdivision E of the Criteria, commencing at 48 Federal Register 20881, modified as provided in this section. To the extent that said provisions of the Criteria, as so modified, are applicable to contracts entered into under this section, those provisions are hereby ratified.

(b) Nothing in the Criteria shall be construed to prejudice any rights conferred by the Boulder Canyon Project Act, as amended and supplemented, on the holder of a contract described in subsection (a) of this section not in default thereunder on September 30, 2017.

(c)(1) The Secretary of Energy shall not execute a contract described in subsection (a)(1)(A) of this section with any entity which is a party to the action entitled the "State of Nevada, et al. against the United States of America, et al." in the United States District Court for the District of Nevada, case numbered CV LV '82 441 RDF, unless that entity agrees to file in that action a stipulation for voluntary dismissal with prejudice of its claims, or counterclaims, or crossclaims, as the case may be, and also agrees to file with the Secretary a document releasing the United States, its officers and agents, and all other parties to that action who join in that stipulation from any claims arising out of the disposition under this section of capacity and energy from the Boulder Canyon project. The Attorney General shall join on behalf of the United States, its officers and agents, in any such voluntary dismissal and shall have the authority to approve on behalf of the United States the form of each release.

(2) If after a reasonable period of time as determined by the Secretary, the Secretary is precluded from executing a contract with an entity by reason of paragraph (1) of this subsection, the Secretary shall offer the capacity and energy thus available to other entities in the same State eligible to enter into such contracts under section 5 of the Boulder Canyon Project Act.

(d) The uprating program authorized under section 201(a) of this Act shall be undertaken with funds advanced under contracts made with the Secretary of the Interior by non-Federal purchasers described in subsection (a)(1)(B) of this section. Funding provided by non-Federal purchasers shall be advanced to the Secretary of the Interior pursuant to the terms and conditions of such contracts.

(e) Notwithstanding any other provisions of the law, funds advanced by non-Federal purchasers for use in the uprating program shall be deposited in the Colorado River Dam Fund and shall be available for the uprating program.

(f) Those amounts advanced by non-Federal purchasers shall be financially integrated as capital costs with other project costs for rate-setting purposes, and shall be returned to those purchasers advancing funds throughout the contract period through credits which include interest costs incurred by such purchasers for funds contributed to the Secretary of the Interior for the uprating program.

(g) The provisions of this section constitute an exercise by the Congress of the right reserved by it in section 5(b) of the Boulder Canyon Project Act, as amended and supplemented, to prescribe terms and conditions for the renewal of contracts for electrical energy generated at Hoover Dam. This section constitutes the exclusive method for disposing of capacity and energy from Hoover Dam for the period beginning June 1, 1987, and ending September 30, 2017.

(h)(1) Notwithstanding any other provision of law, any claim that the provisions of subsection (a) of this section violates any rights to capacity or energy from the Boulder Canyon project is barred unless the complaint is filed within one year after the date of enactment of this Act in the United States Claims Court which shall have exclusive jurisdiction over this action. Any claim that actions taken by any administrative agency of the United States violates any right under this Title or the Boulder Canyon Project Act or the Boulder Canyon Project Adjustment Act is barred unless suit asserting such claim is filed in a Federal court of competent jurisdiction within one year after final refusal of such agency to correct the action complained of.

(2) Any contract entered into pursuant to section 105 or section 107 of this Act shall contain provisions by which any dispute or disagreement as to interpretation or performance of the provisions of this title or of applicable regulations or of the contract may be determined by arbitration or court proceedings. The Secretary of Energy or the Secretary of the Interior, as the case may be, if authorized to act for the United States in such arbitration or court proceedings and, except as provided in paragraph (1) of this subsection, jurisdiction is conferred upon any district court of the United States of proper venue to determine the dispute.

(i) It is the purpose of subsections (c), (i), and (j) of this section to ensure that the rights of contractors for capacity and energy from the Boulder Canyon project for the period beginning June 1, 1987, and ending September 30, 2017, will vest with certainty and finality.

SEC. 106. Reimbursement of funds advanced by non-Federal purchasers for the uprating program shall be a repayment requirement of the Boulder Canyon project beginning with the first day of the month following completion of each segment thereof. The cost of the visitor facilities program as defined in section 101(a) of this Act shall become a repayment requirement beginning June 1, 1987, or when substantially completed, as determined by the Secretary of the Interior, if later.

SEC. 107. (a) Subject to the provisions of any existing layoff contracts, electrical capacity and energy associated with the United States' interest in the Navajo generating station which is in excess of the pumping requirements of the Central Arizona project and any such needs for desalting and protective pumping facilities as may be required under section 101(b)(2)(B) of the Colorado River Basin Salinity Control Act of 1974, as amended (hereinafter in this Act referred to as "Navajo surplus") shall be marketed and exchanged by the Secretary of Energy pursuant to this section.

(b) Navajo surplus shall be marketed by the Secretary of Energy pursuant to the plan adopted under subsection (c) of this section, directly to, with or through the Arizona Power Authority and/or other entities having the status of preference entities under the reclamation law in accordance with the preference provisions of section 9(c) of the Reclamation Project Act of 1939 and as provided in part IV, section A of the Criteria.

(c) In the marketing and exchanging of Navajo surplus, the Secretary of the Interior shall adopt the plan deemed most acceptable, after consultation with the Secretary of Energy, the Governor of Arizona, and the Central Arizona Water Conservation District (or its successor in interest to the repayment obligation for the Central Arizona project), for the purposes of optimizing the availability of Navajo surplus and providing financial assistance in the timely construction and repayment of construction costs of authorized features of the Central Arizona project. The Secretary of the Interior, in concert with the Secretary of Energy, in accordance with section 14 of the Reclamation Project Act of 1939, shall grant electrical power and energy exchange rights with Arizona entities as necessary to implement the adopted plan: Provided, however, That if exchange rights with Arizona entities are not required to implement the adopted plan, exchange rights may be offered to other entities.

(d) For the purposes provided in subsection (c) of this section, the Secretary of Energy, or the marketing entity or entities under the adopted plan, are authorized to establish and collect or cause to be established and collected, rate components, in addition to those currently authorized, and to deposit the revenues received in the Lower Colorado River Basin Development Fund to be available for such purposes and if required under the adopted plan, to credit, utilize, pay over directly or assign revenues from such additional rate components to make repayment and establish reserves for repayment of funds, including interest incurred, to entities which have advanced funds for the purposes of subsection (c) of this section: Provided, however, That rates shall not exceed levels that allow for an appropriate saving for the contractor.

(e) To the extent that this section may be in conflict with any other provision of law relating to the marketing and exchange of Navajo surplus, or to the disposition of any revenues therefrom, this section shall control.

SEC. 108. Recognizing the expiration of Colorado River storage project (CRSP) contracts in 1989, prior to final reallocation of CRSP power pursuant to existing law, and within one year after enactment of this Act, the Secretary of Energy, acting through the Western Area Power Administration, shall report, to the Committee on Interior and Insular Affairs of the House of Representatives and the Committee on Energy and Natural Resources of the United States Senate, on all Colorado River storage project (CRSP) power resources, including those presently allocated to the Lower Division States, which may be used to financially support the development of authorized projects in the States of the Upper Division (as that term is used in article II of the Colorado River Compact) of the Colorado River Basin.

SEC. 109. The Secretary of the Interior, acting pursuant to Federal reclamation law (Act of June 17, 1902, 32 Stat. 388, and Acts amendatory thereof and supplementary thereto) and in accordance with the Pacific Northwest Electric Power Planning and Conservation Act (94 Stat. 2697) is authorized to design, construct, operate, and maintain fish passage facilities within the Yakima River Basin, and to accept funds from any entity, public or private, to design, construct, operate, and maintain such facilities.

TITLE II

SEC. 201. (a) Each long-term firm power service contract entered into or amended subsequent to one year from the date of enactment of this Act by the Secretary of Energy acting by and through the Western Area Power Administration (hereinafter "Western"), shall contain an article requiring the development and implementation by the purchaser thereunder of an energy conservation program. A long-term firm power service contract is any contract for the sale by Western of firm capacity, with or without energy, which is to be delivered over a period of more than one year. The term "purchaser" includes parent-type entities and their distribution or user members. If more than one such contract exists with a purchaser, only one program will be required for that purchaser. Each such contract article shall—

(1) contain time schedules for meeting program goals and delineate actions to be taken in the event such schedules are not met, which may include a reduction of the allocation of capacity or energy to such purchaser as would otherwise be provided under such contract; and

(2) provide for review and modification of the energy conservation program at not to exceed five year intervals.

(b) For purposes of this title, an energy conservation program shall—

(1) apply to all uses of energy and capacity which are provided from any Federal project;

(2) contain definite goals;

(3) encourage customer consumption efficiency improvements and demand management practices which ensure that the available supply of hydroelectric power is used in an economically efficient and environmentally sound manner.

SEC. 202. (a) Within one year after the date of enactment of this Act, Western shall amend its existing regulations (46 Fed. Reg. 56140) to reflect—

(1) the elements to be considered in the energy conservation programs required by this title, and

(2) Western's criteria for evaluating and approving such programs.

Such amended regulations shall be promulgated only after public notice and opportunity to comment in accordance with the Administrative Procedure Act (5 U.S.C. 551-706).

(b) The following elements shall be considered by Western in evaluating energy conservation programs:

(1) energy consumption efficiency improvements;

(2) use of renewable energy resources in addition to hydroelectric power;

(3) load management techniques;

(4) congeneration;

(5) rate design improvements, including—

(i) cost of service pricing;

(ii) elimination of declining block rates;

(iii) time of day rates;

(iv) seasonal rates; and

(v) interruptible rates; and

(6) production efficiency improvements.

(c) Where a purchaser is implementing one or more of the foregoing elements under a program responding to Federal, State, or other initiatives that apply to conservation and renewable energy development, in evaluating that purchaser's energy conservation program submitted pursuant to this title Western shall make due allowance for the incorporation of such elements within the energy conservation program required by this title.

The motion was agreed to.

The Senate bill was ordered to be read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

The title of the Senate bill was amended so as to read: "An Act to authorize the Secretary of the Interior to construct, operate, and maintain hydroelectric powerplants at various existing water projects, and for other purposes."

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

A similar House bill (H.R. 4275) was laid on the table.

AUTHORIZING THE CLERK TO MAKE CHANGES IN ENGROSSMENT OF H.R. 4275.

Mr. UDALL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the Clerk in the engrossment of the bill, H.R. 4275, be authorized to make numerical, clerical, and technical changes.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Arizona?

There was no objection.

GENERAL LEAVE

Mr. UDALL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that all Members may have 5 legislative days in which to revise and extend their remarks, and to include extraneous material, on H.R. 4275, the bill just passed.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Arizona?

There was no objection.

FURTHER MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT

A further message in writing from the President of the United States was communicated to the House by Mr. Saunders, one of his secretaries.

FURTHER MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE

A further message from the Senate, by Mr. Sparrow, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had passed a bill and a concurrent resolution of the following titles, in which the concurrence of the House is requested:

S. 2085. An act to provide continuing authority to the Secretary of Agriculture for recovering costs associated with cotton classing services to producers and to authorize the Secretary of Agriculture to invest funds derived from fees for certain voluntary grading and inspection services; and

S. Con. Res. 107. Concurrent resolution authorizing the rotunda of the Capitol to be used from May 25, 1984, through May 28, 1984, for the unknown American of the Vietnam era to lie in state.

PERSONAL EXPLANATION

Mr. GILMAN. Mr. Speaker, I inadvertently missed one of yesterday's suspension votes, that of H.R. 4952, which would aid Indian tribes in Nevada and Utah relating to the planned deployment of the MX missile. I would like to go on record as favoring passage of this measure. I would have voted "yea" on rollcall No. 124.

PERSONAL EXPLANATION

Mr. WEISS. Mr. Speaker, because I was unable to be in Washington on April 24, 25, and 26, I missed several votes on the House floor. Had I been present, I would have voted as follows:

Rollcall No. 91, "aye."
Rollcall No. 92, (quorum call).
Rollcall No. 93, "no."
Rollcall No. 94, "no."
Rollcall No. 95, "aye."
Rollcall No. 96, "aye."
Rollcall No. 97, "aye."
Rollcall No. 98, "no."
Rollcall No. 99, "aye."
Rollcall No. 100, "aye."
Rollcall No. 101, (quorum call).
Rollcall No. 102, "aye."
Rollcall No. 103, "no."
Rollcall No. 104, "aye."
Rollcall No. 105, "no."
Rollcall No. 106, "aye."

REMOVAL OF NAME OF MEMBER AS COSPONSOR OF H.R. 953

Mr. CORCORAN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that my name be removed as a cosponsor of the bill, H.R. 953.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Illinois?

There was no objection.

MARY WOODARD LASKER CENTER FOR HEALTH RESEARCH AND EDUCATION

Mr. WAXMAN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the immediate consideration of the bill (H.R. 5576) to designate certain land and improvements of the National Institutes of Health as the "Mary Woodard Lasker Center for Health Research and Education."

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from California?

Mr. WALKER. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Speaker, could someone tell me when this bill was introduced?

Mr. WAXMAN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WALKER. I yield to the gentleman from California.

Mr. WAXMAN. Mr. Speaker, I thank the gentleman for yielding.

This bill was introduced today and it designates certain land at the National Institutes of Health as the Mary Woodard Lasker Center for Health Research and Education.

Mr. WALKER. Further reserving the right to object, Mr. Speaker, it sounds to me like the kind of bill that would normally be on the Consent Calendar, that would come up through the regular processes on the Consent Calendar and would give some of us a chance to review the legislation before it comes to the floor.

Can the gentleman tell me why we are using this procedure rather than going the route of the Consent Calendar?

Mr. WAXMAN. Mr. Speaker, I have been requested and given the honor by both the Speaker of the House and the chairman of the Committee on Energy and Commerce, the gentleman from Michigan (Mr. DINGELL), to make this request. It was suggested to bring it up in this way.

I have no knowledge of the Consent Calendar or any other way. This is, I believe, a noncontroversial proposal.

Mr. WALKER. Further reserving the right to object, it simply seems to me an unusual procedure to be using, that the bill is introduced on the same day, brought to the House floor before those of us who would typically be reviewing the Consent Calendar would have an opportunity to look at it.

The gentleman assures me it is a noncontroversial matter, and so on, that has been cleared by the Speaker.

Has there been clearance on this side of the aisle?

Mr. WAXMAN. If the gentleman will yield further, I am informed that the administration, as well, supports the proposal.

Mr. WALKER. What about our side of the aisle?

Mr. WAXMAN. The gentleman from North Carolina (Mr. BROYHILL) and the gentleman from Illinois (Mr. MADIGAN) also agree.

Mr. COATS. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WALKER. I yield to the gentleman from Indiana.

Mr. COATS. Mr. Speaker, I thank the gentleman for yielding.

I just want to assure the gentleman, and I just checked. Both the gentleman from North Carolina (Mr. BROYHILL), the ranking Republican member of the committee, and the gentleman from Illinois (Mr. MADIGAN), the ranking Republican member of the appropriate subcommittee, have cleared the request.

Mr. WALKER. Mr. Speaker, I thank the gentleman, and I withdraw my reservation of objection.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from California (Mr. WAXMAN)?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the land and improvements purchased from the Order of the Visitation for the National Institutes of Health and located at 9001 Old Georgetown Road in Bethesda, Maryland, is designated as the "Mary Woodard Lasker Center for Health Research and Education". Any reference in a law, map, regulation, document, record, or other paper of the United States to such land and improvements shall be deemed to be a reference to the "Mary Woodard Lasker Center for Health Research and Education".

Mr. WAXMAN. Mr. Speaker, this legislation would do honor to a gracious and significant woman. In 1942 Mary Lasker and her late husband Albert began a crusade for this Nation to assume world leadership in biomedical research.

Mary Lasker is an unusual philanthropist. Many philanthropists direct their funds to worthy groups and at that point stop. But Mary Lasker has become one of America's most sophisticated leaders in the medical research field. She brings to the health sciences not only her generosity but also her keen intelligence and visionary gifts.

Few Americans realize that many of our country's most important medical research projects have their origins in the pioneering work initiated at the urging and with the help of Albert and Mary Lasker. It is only in the past few decades that the Federal Government has reflected the Laskers' view that research to diminish human suffering is deserving of massive government support.

Mary has championed this cause in the Halls of Congress and has prodded Presidents to recognize that investments in health research can yield enormous dividends.

Her accomplishments are legion. She is noted for her work with the American Cancer Society and advocacy on behalf of a commitment to cancer research. She has also been a leader in recognizing the benefits of preventing heart disease through hypertension screening. Most recently, Mary Lasker focused public and congressional attention on the need to expand our Nation's research commitment to the disease of arthritis. The House adopted her suggestion and last year passed legislation establishing a National Institute of Arthritis and Musculoskeletal Diseases.

To me Mary Lasker is not just a key figure in the history of biomedical research but a valued personal friend. During my years as chairman of the Subcommittee on Health and the Environment, she has been a source of wisdom, guidance, and inspiration.

H.R. 5576 would designate a parcel of land, newly purchased for the NIH campus in Bethesda, Md., as the Mary Woodard Lasker Center for Health Research and Education. The naming of this facility is a small token of a debt this country can never fully repay her. It is a fitting and long overdue recognition of Mary's incalculable contribution to our Nation.

I urge support for the legislation.

● Mr. O'NEILL. Mr. Speaker, today I lead my colleagues in offering a fine tribute to a beautiful lady.

Mary Lasker is a giver, not just of what she has, but of herself. Through the Mary and Albert D. Lasker Foundation, she has given millions to the urgent work of health research. But she has given far more of what cannot be measured. Through her tireless efforts and generous determination, she has given spirit and guts to the battle against cancer and other diseases.

The Mary Woodard Lasker Center for Health Research and Education will be a fitting tribute to this wonderful person. I cannot count the number of times Mary has come to me championing the cause of health research. Whenever she comes, I know it is for a vital and important reason. I know that she wants to contribute not just her resources but her courage and her spirit and her love of people.

The center dedicated by this bill will be of great value in the development of the National Institutes of Health clinical and laboratory research program. It will be a fine tribute to a person who has given her whole life to the cause of her fellow man.●

● Mr. DINGELL. Mr. Speaker, Mary Woodard Lasker (Mrs. Albert Lasker) has contributed more to the prevention and cure of disease and to the promotion of biomedical research than any other private citizen in the history of this country. The Lasker Foundation, which she founded with her husband, has aided medical research and public health. She has worked tirelessly for the American Cancer Society and dozens of other health groups. The National Institutes of Health are what they are today in large part because she was able to galvanize the efforts of health organizations across the country to support research.

Last year the National Institutes of Health acquired the convent located on the northwest corner of the campus. The bill we are considering today would rename these buildings the Mary Woodard Lasker Center for Health Research and Education. It would give me great pleasure if the Congress were to honor this great American in this way and do it at the institution she dearly loves, the National Institutes of Health.●

● Ms. MIKULSKI. Mr. Speaker, I rise in support of the legislation.

Mary Lasker is a woman in whom we can all be proud. Although not a scientist, her contributions to the fields of science and medicine are too numerous to mention.

She is a woman who dedicated her life to one of humankind's noblest pursuits—the prevention and treatment of human illness.

She began her efforts at a time before there was a National Institutes of Health. Today, NIH is regarded as the finest biomedical research agency in the world.

Every American can take great pride in its accomplishments. Every American can take pride in the role Mary Lasker played in its growth and success. Its fitting, in fact long overdue, that we honor her with the passage of this legislation.

Mary Lasker demonstrates that one woman can make a difference. The difference she made cannot be measured in terms of dollars, but must be judged by the thousands of Americans alive today due to advances in medicine brought about through the research and researchers Mary Lasker motivated.

Designation of the Mary Woodward Lasker Center for Health, Research, and Education recognizes Mary Lasker's contribution to science. More importantly, it represents a lasting tribute to the selfless causes to which Mary Lasker has dedicated her life.

I urge support for the legislation.●

GENERAL LEAVE

Mr. WAXMAN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that all Members may have 5 legislative days in which to revise and extend their remarks on H.R. 5576, the bill just passed.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from California?

There was no objection.

FOR THE RELIEF OF MARINA KUNYAVSKY

Mr. RODINO. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the Committee on the Judiciary be discharged from further consideration of the bill (H.R. 3131) for the relief of Marina Kunyavsky, and ask for its immediate consideration.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New Jersey?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

H.R. 3131

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That Marina Kunyavsky shall be held and considered to have satisfied the requirements of section 316 of the Immigration and Nationality Act relating to required period of residence and physical presence within the United States and, notwithstanding the provisions of section 310(d) of that Act, may be naturalized at any time after the date of enactment of this Act if otherwise eligible for naturalization under the Immigration and Nationality Act.

Mr. RODINO. Mr. Speaker, Ms. Kunyavsky is a 19-year-old refugee who escaped from the Soviet Union with her family fleeing possible persecution under that repressive Government. After many years of attempting emigration, the family left the Soviet Union and entered the United States in 1981 under provisions of the Refugee Act of 1980. Since arrival Ms. Kunyavsky has attended school and diligently worked in both her scholastic and athletic endeavors.

Ms. Kunyavsky has demonstrated exceptional talent as a rhythmic gymnast and has qualified in various competitions for final Olympic tryouts and seeks to participate as a U.S. citizen. She placed fourth at the 1983 USA national championships and second in the country hoop events as well as winning first place in certain club routines. I submit for the record statements from the U.S. Olympic Committee and U.S. Gymnastics Federation outlining her accomplishments. There is every indication Ms. Kunyavsky possesses the unique skills and determination which would enable her to represent our country in a most outstanding manner.

As you may recall, Mr. Speaker, the House has precedent for action to waive certain naturalization requirements. Just this year, the Congress moved expeditiously to grant U.S. citizenship on behalf of an Olympic skier, Auden Endestad, so that he could compete in the winter games.

While the committee is always reluctant to take this extraordinary step, the precedent set earlier this year cannot be ignored. I believe Ms. Kunyavsky represents a compelling case for favorable congressional action.

At this point in the RECORD I include the following:

U.S. OLYMPIC COMMITTEE,
Colorado Springs, Colo., February 20, 1984.

Re Marina Kunyavsky, Citizenship.
Hon. HENRY A. WAXMAN,
House of Representatives, Washington, D.C.

DEAR CONGRESSMAN WAXMAN: I am the volunteer chairman for the United States Olympic Committee in Southern California, and have been fortunate to meet Marina at many demonstrations, the gymnastic team has given at our fund raising events, including a luncheon we had with President Reagan last March.

She is a fine young lady and I'm sure she would make a fine United States citizen . . . thus should be given high consideration from our country. I would personally be pleased to see Marina, a new citizen, perform in the 1984 Olympics representing her new country . . . another showcase to the world.

Make 1984 an outstanding year for Marina—citizenship and an Olympian . . . dreams come true.

Thank you for your consideration.

Sincerely yours,

DONALD P. CRIVELLONE.

U.S. GYMNASTICS FEDERATION,
November 5, 1982.

To: Mr. HENRY WAXMAN.

This letter is being written in support of the application of Marina Kunyavsky for citizenship in the United States. Miss Kunyavsky has worked diligently as an athlete in the United States in the area of Rhythmic Gymnastics. She has shown a great deal of promise as an outstanding athlete and through she diligence is doing very well, learning rapidly, accomplishing much and is definitely an Olympic potential.

At the present time, Miss Kunyavsky is studying under the tutelage of Ms. Alla Svirsky who is the United States National Coach for Rhythmic Gymnastics in California. Any consideration that can be given to Miss Kunyavsky's application would be greatly appreciated and a gesture of support for American Olympic efforts. I thank you in advance for your consideration in this matter.

Sincerely,

ROGER L. COUNSIL,
Executive Director.

LOS ANGELES
SCHOOL OF GYMNASTICS,
Culver City, Calif., February 16, 1984.

To: Congressman HENRY A. WAXMAN, 2418 Rayburn House Office Building, Washington, D.C.

From: Alla Svirsky, 1984 USA Olympic Coach, Executive Director, LASG.

Re Marina Kunyavsky.

DEAR CONGRESSMAN WAXMAN: It is with deep concern that I write to you about Marina Kunyavsky. She is one of the finest young Rhythmic gymnasts that I have had the opportunity to work with. Her exceptional talent and unrelenting drive and determination led her to a 4th place All-Around finish at the 1983 USA National Championships. At these championships she placed 2nd in the country in the Hoop event, 3rd in the ribbon, and won the 1st place Gold medal with her spectacular Clubs routine. Few athletes work as long and as hard as Marina does. But without her United States Citizenship she will be barred from further competition. If only you could help her obtain these important papers. It would be a final stimulation she would need to reach the highest goals.

Unlike a doctor who can wait for a license to be issued without any loss to his skills, age and time is very limited for an athlete of this caliber. If Marina cannot compete at the 1984 National Championships May 2, 1984, a lifetime of dedication and hard work may be forfeited, for Marina is nearing the peak of her abilities. To lose her chance of representing the United States at the 1984 Olympic Games would shatter a life-long dream and certainly break the spirit of this thoroughbred among the athletes in this sport.

If there is any way you can help Marina, I would be in your debt. It would certainly be a sponsorship that will make you proud. I know in my heart that Marina will someday make all of us very glad to have helped her with her citizenship.

Sincerely,

ALLA SVIRSKY,
1984 USA Olympic Coach,
Executive Director, LASG.

REPORT ON RESOLUTION PROVIDING FOR THE CONSIDERATION OF H.R. 5119, INTERNATIONAL SECURITY AND DEVELOPMENT COOPERATION ACT OF 1984

Mr. WHEAT, from the Committee on Rules, submitted a privileged report (Rept. No. 98-731) on the resolution (H. Res. 497) providing for the consideration of the bill (H.R. 5119) to authorize international development and security assistance programs and Peace Corps programs for fiscal year 1985, and for other purposes, which was referred to the House Calendar and ordered to be printed.

PROVIDING FOR CONSIDERATION OF H.R. 3457, SOIL CONSERVATION ACT OF 1984

Mr. WHEAT. Mr. Speaker, by direction of the Committee on Rules, I call up House Resolution 493 and ask for its immediate consideration.

The Clerk read the resolution, as follows:

H. RES 493

Resolved, That at any time after the adoption of this resolution the Speaker may, pursuant to clause 1(b) of rule XXIII, declare the House resolved into the Committee of the Whole House on the State of the Union for the consideration of the bill (H.R. 3457) to prohibit the payment of certain agriculture incentives to persons who produce certain agricultural commodities on highly erodible land; to allow farmers who plant perennial grasses and legumes as a means of building soil quality, rotating crops, or protecting land from wind and water erosion, to enter a certified voluntary set-aside program; and to allow the Secretary of Agriculture to enter into long-term contracts with farmers to remove certain erosion-prone lands from cultivation, and the first reading of the bill shall be dispensed with. All points of order against the consideration of the bill for failure to comply with the provisions of sections 401(a) and 402(a) of the Congressional Budget Act of 1974 (Public Law 93-344) are hereby waived. After general debate, which shall be confined to the bill and shall continue not to exceed one hour, to be equally divided and controlled by the chairman and ranking minority member of the Committee on Agriculture, the bill shall be considered for amendment under the five-minute rule. It shall be in order to consider the amendment in the nature of a substitute recommended by the Committee on Agriculture now printed in the bill as an original bill for the purpose of amendment under the five-minute rule, said substitute shall be considered for amendment by titles instead of by sections, and each title shall be considered as having been read. At the conclusion of the consideration of the bill for amendment, the Committee shall rise and report the bill to the House with such amendments as may have been adopted, and any Member may demand a separate vote in the House on any amendment adopted in the Committee of the Whole to the bill or to the committee amendment in the nature of a substitute. The previous question shall be considered as ordered on the bill and amendments thereto to final passage without intervening motion except one motion to recommit with or without instructions.

□ 1630

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Missouri (Mr. WHEAT) is recognized for 1 hour.

Mr. WHEAT. Mr. Speaker, for the purposes of debate only, I yield 30 minutes to the gentleman from Missouri (Mr. TAYLOR), pending which I yield myself such time as I may consume.

Mr. Speaker, House Resolution 493 is an open rule providing for the consideration of H.R. 3457, the Soil Conservation Act of 1984. The rule provides for 1 hour of general debate to be divided equally between the chairman and ranking minority member of the Committee on Agriculture and makes in order an amendment in the nature of a substitute which is recommended by the Committee on Agriculture and is now printed in the bill. This amendment in the nature of a substitute shall be considered as original text for the purpose of amendment under the 5-minute rule. The bill shall be considered by title instead of by section for amendment and each title shall be considered as having been read.

In addition, Mr. Speaker, the rule waives all points of order against the bill for failure to comply with sections 401(a) and 402(a) of the Budget Act.

Section 401(a) of the Budget Act prohibits the consideration of any measure which provides new contract authority unless such authority is limited to amounts provided in advance in an appropriation act.

Title IV of H.R. 3457, as introduced, authorizes the Secretary of Agriculture to enter into contracts for the purpose of carrying out a conservation reserve program.

Since this contract authority is not limited to amounts provided in advance in an appropriation act, the bill violates section 401(a) of the Budget Act and a waiver is necessary.

Section 402(a) of the Budget Act prohibits the consideration of any bill which authorizes the enactment of the new budget authority for a fiscal year, unless the bill was reported on, or before May 15, preceding the beginning of such fiscal year.

H.R. 3457, as introduced, authorizes appropriations for the purposes of carrying out the act effective upon enactment.

Since the bill was not reported by May 15, 1983, it violates section 402(a) of the Budget Act and again, a waiver is necessary.

Finally, Mr. Speaker, the rule provides for one motion to recommit with or without instructions.

Mr. Speaker, one of the Nation's growing concerns is the erosion of our farmlands. In 1977, the Soil Conservation Service (SCS) conducted a study and found that 41 million of the country's 413 million acres of cropland consisted of highly erodible soil.

H.R. 3457 attempts to remedy this problem. First, the legislation provides that a farmer who plows land which was previously uncultivated and that is determined by the SCS to be highly erodible, shall be ineligible for certain agricultural benefits. There are, however, certain exceptions to this provision and they are enumerated in the bill. The exceptions were deemed necessary because Federal farm policy since 1973 has at times encouraged farmers to plant as much of their land as they could.

The bill also provides that a cropland base protection study be conducted by the Secretary of Agriculture and that a soil conservation reserve program be established.

Mr. Speaker, I urge that we adopt the rule so that we may proceed to consideration of this important legislation.

Mr. TAYLOR. Mr. Speaker, I yield myself such time as I may consume.

Mr. Speaker, House Resolution 493 is an open rule under which the House will consider legislation to promote soil conservation by penalizing farmers who plant on highly erodible land.

The bill made in order by this rule, H.R. 3457, is somewhat controversial because of the extent to which it seeks to stop the so-called practice of sodbusting.

This rule is an open rule, allowing germane amendments under the 5-minute rule, so the rule itself is not controversial.

The rule does waive two provisions of the Budget Act, in order to allow the House to consider the bill.

The waivers are for section 401(a) and section 402(a) of the Budget Act, and were provided in the rule by the Committee on Rules because the amendment to be offered by the Committee on Agriculture cures the violations.

Mr. Speaker, the major Budget Act problem raised by the bill deals with contract authority. A provision of H.R. 3457, as introduced, authorizes the Secretary of Agriculture to enter into contracts for a new, conservation reserve program. Since this contract authority is not limited to amounts that may have been provided for in advance by an appropriation, the bill would be subject to a point of order.

The committee substitute cures this violation by limiting the contract authority of the Secretary of Agriculture to amounts as provided in appropriations acts.

The other Budget Act problem with this bill has to do with the reporting date of this bill from the Committee on Agriculture. As introduced, the bill authorizes appropriations effective upon enactment; that is during fiscal year 1984. The bill was not reported prior to May 15, 1983, and thus violates the Budget Act.

Mr. Speaker, for the past several years, farm groups and others interested in soil conservation have been attempting to deal with the issue of sodbusting, a practice whereby highly erodible land is used to produce crops.

Most of the farmers in this country support the idea of preventing sodbusting by prohibiting various forms of Government assistance for commodities grown on highly erodible land.

As reported by the Committee on Agriculture, however, H.R. 3457 goes beyond this concept and expands that prohibition to all commodities produced by an individual if any commodity is grown on highly erodible land.

As a result, some farmers—most notably the American Farm Bureau Federation—oppose this legislation.

Mr. Speaker, the rule provides for 1 hour of general debate, equally divided, and provides for an open amendment process. I urge adoption of the rule, so the House may consider this bill next week.

Mr. Speaker, I have no requests for time, and I yield back the balance of my time.

Mr. WHEAT. Mr. Speaker, I have no requests for time, and I move the previous question on the resolution.

The previous question was ordered.

The resolution was agreed to.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

LEGISLATIVE PROGRAM

(Mr. REGULA asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute.)

Mr. REGULA. Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman from Texas (Mr. WRIGHT) for the purpose of getting the program for next week.

Mr. WRIGHT. I thank the gentleman for yielding.

Mr. Speaker, we will have soon completed the legislative schedule for this week. There are two pending unanimous consent requests of which I am aware, and perhaps others. Having completed those, we will adjourn and adjourn to meet on Monday next, there being no legislative business for tomorrow.

On Monday, the House will meet at noon and recess for a brief period to receive former Members of Congress. This is an annual ceremony which has become a matter of some considerable interest to our former colleagues.

After the completion of that, the House will reconvene and take up two suspensions. H.R. 5278, the Federal Reserve Bank Directors Act of 1984, and House Joint Resolution 548, subpena power for the President's Commission on Organized Crime.

Then under an open rule, with 1 hour of general debate, the House will take up the general debate on the Soil Conservation Service Act of 1984. All we plan to do on Monday is to complete general debate on that bill.

On Tuesday, the House will meet at 9 a.m. Let us bear in mind that Tuesday is the day of primary elections in many States, Ohio being one of them, North Carolina being another, Indiana being a third, and various others being involved as well. Therefore, we will hope not to have votes until perhaps 2 o'clock on Tuesday in order that Members may be home Monday evening, vote Tuesday, and come back if they desire to vote on bills up for consideration on that day.

We will recess early for a 10 a.m. Truman centennial ceremony. Our colleague, the gentleman from Missouri, has been preparing, along with a committee, a very interesting program for us. I hope all Members will find it worthwhile for them to be in attendance on the House floor at 10 o'clock on Tuesday morning for the centennial of the birth of Harry S. Truman.

After the completion of that ceremony, the House will take up two more bills on suspension, H.R. 5121, Virginia Wilderness, and H.R. 3788, Texas Wilderness, and then perhaps go to the conference report on S. 1129, the Domestic Volunteer Service Act amendments, then take up the rule and general debate on H.R. 5119, foreign aid authorizations.

On Tuesday, we will have recorded votes on suspensions debate on Monday and Tuesday.

On Wednesday, the House will meet at noon. On Thursday and Friday, if it is necessary to have a session on Friday, we shall meet at 11 a.m.

We will continue the consideration through Wednesday and what part of Thursday may be necessary of the foreign aid authorization bill and complete its consideration.

□ 1640

There are several amendments that will be offered to that bill of which I am sure most of the Members are aware; others will be made aware.

Then we would hope to return to the Soil Conservation Act of 1984 and complete its consideration. Aside from that, and the fact that conference reports may be brought up at any time, the Chair would announce any additional program later.

Mr. REGULA. What time does the gentleman anticipate that we might start legislative business on Tuesday?

Mr. WRIGHT. One o'clock on Tuesday would be the anticipated hour for the beginning of legislative business, and we would hope that votes might not occur until perhaps 2 o'clock and later.

Mr. REGULA. I thank the gentleman from Texas and I yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania (Mr. WALKER).

Mr. WALKER. Notably missing on the list of suspensions that we are going to take up was the equal access bill that had originally been scheduled for consideration, I think, on Monday. Do we have some assurance that that is going to get on the calendar pretty soon?

Mr. REGULA. I yield to the gentleman from Texas for his response.

Mr. WRIGHT. I am glad the gentleman asked about that bill. It was indeed scheduled for consideration on suspension of the rules next week; however, a certain number of Members petitioned the Democratic caucus for the scheduling of a caucus on Wednesday for the purpose of discussing that bill, and requested that the leadership postpone its formal consideration until that caucus has been completed.

21-059 O-87-30 (Pt. 9)

In deference to those Members, and under the rules of the Democratic caucus which compel us to call a caucus upon the signatures of 50 Members petitioning us to do so, we have postponed consideration of that legislation until the following week.

Mr. WALKER. If the gentleman will yield further, then it is my understanding that we expect to have it on the Suspension Calendar on Monday next?

Mr. WRIGHT. It would be my expectation that we would probably have it on suspension the week after the coming week. It may be that Members would prefer to debate it under a regular rule; but it would seem plausible to me, in the absence of an overpowering desire on a great many Members' parts, that it would be something that might come under the suspension of the rules.

Mr. WALKER. I thank the gentleman for yielding.

ADJOURNMENT TO MONDAY, MAY 7, 1984

Mr. WRIGHT. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that when the House adjourns today, it adjourn to meet at noon on Monday next.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Texas?

There was no objection.

HOUR OF MEETING ON WEDNESDAY NEXT

Mr. WRIGHT. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that when the House adjourns on Tuesday next, it adjourn to meet at noon on Wednesday.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Texas?

There was no objection.

REQUEST TO DISPENSE WITH CALENDAR WEDNESDAY BUSINESS ON WEDNESDAY NEXT

Mr. WRIGHT. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that business under the Calendar Wednesday rule may be dispensed with on Wednesday next.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Texas?

Mr. LUNGREN. Mr. Speaker, I object.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Objection is heard.

EXPRESSING SENSE OF THE HOUSE CONCERNING SOLIDARITY SUNDAY FOR SOVIET JEWRY

Ms. OAKAR. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the Committee on Post Office and Civil Service be discharged from further consideration of the resolution (H. Res. 450) to express the sense of the House of Representatives concerning Solidarity Sunday for Soviet Jewry, and ask for its immediate consideration.

The Clerk read the title of the resolution.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentlewoman from Ohio?

Mr. GILMAN. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, and I do not object, but I simply would like to inform the House that the minority has no objections to the legislation being considered.

Mr. Speaker, I rise in staunch support of House Resolution 450 which recognizes May 6, 1984, as Solidarity Sunday with Soviet Jewry. On this Sunday at Dag Hammarskjold Plaza opposite the United Nations, over 100,000 people will once again peacefully protest the Soviet Union's inhumane actions against their own citizens. I was pleased to have sponsored last year's Solidarity Sunday resolution, and welcome working this year with the gentlelady from New York (Ms. FERRARO) in gaining House passage of this year's measure.

Mr. Speaker, Solidarity Sunday illustrates both hope and anguish.

The pain, obviously, is the fact that such inhumane conditions exist in the world today. Prisoner of Conscience Anatoly Shcharansky has become the symbol of the plight of Soviet Jewry. But, Anatoly and thousands of other Soviet Jews are refuseniks and/or Prisoners of Conscience not because of any crime they committed, but rather because they are Jewish and seek to emigrate in order to openly practice their religion.

I would like to relate to my colleagues the plight and struggle of another Soviet Jew, that of Mark Nashpitz. Mr. Nashpitz is a stomatologist who first applied for an exit visa in January 1970. He was refused permission to leave the U.S.S.R. in March 1971, because his father, who illegally emigrated from the Soviet Union, was branded a traitor. Mark has been made to answer for his father's emigration. However, his mother was allowed to emigrate to Israel in 1974.

On March 31, 1975, Mark Nashpitz was convicted and sentenced to 5 years internal exile in Siberia for "active partaking in group activities that are disturbing public order." Actually, all Nashpitz was guilty of was peacefully protesting the Soviet Government's policy on emigration. It has been over 13 years since Nashpitz first applied for emigration. Now married, with a young man son, Nashpitz reapplied again for emigration in July 1979. He, his wife, and their son still await permission to leave the Soviet Union to be reunited with Mark's mother in Israel.

The scenario for other Soviet Jews is much the same. Very few are allowed to emigrate and all are persecuted and harassed for even trying to practice Judaism. In 1979, some 51,320 Soviet Jews were allowed to leave the U.S.S.R. But in 1983, a scant 1,314 were able to emigrate to freedom.

But, Mr. Speaker, the real anguish resides in those thousands of Soviet Jews who have filed for exist visas and have been denied them. As a result, not only are these refuseniks not allowed to emigrate, they lose their jobs, their friends, and any privileges they may have had before applying. Typically, they become targets of KGB harassment. They anguish in pain but with hope.

This hope, this glimmer of light at the end of the long tunnel to freedom is why we are here today in support of House Resolution 450 and why hundreds of thousands will gather Sunday at the United Nations in New York. There is hope that the Soviet Union will recognize that the free world cares about human rights, supports freedom of religion, and abides by international codes of conduct such as the Helsinki Final Act of 1975 and the Universal Code on Human Rights.

The Greater New York Conference on Soviet Jewry has been active in writing and calling refuseniks and prisoners of conscience, monitoring Soviet activity and American response, and overall, educating the general public about the atrocity of the whole situation. It is through their efforts that we gather here in this Chamber today and that thousands of citizens will unite at the United Nations on Sunday, May 6.

I applaud their devoted efforts. I urge my colleagues and fellow Americans to adopt a refusenik and to write him or her faithfully. I also wish to thank my colleagues for their continued support of Soviet Jewry. On March 15, over 180 Members joined in recognition of the International Day of Concern for Soviet Jewry.

Tragically, we learned the consequences of silence during World War II when Hitler murdered 6 million innocent Jews only because they were Jewish. A somewhat similar situation of oppression exists today in the Soviet Union and the situation is getting worse as evidenced by the low emigration numbers.

However, there is still hope. The issue of Soviet Jewry is paramount on the U.S. negotiating agenda. And, if it were not for the continued support of my colleagues and citizens of the free world, the Soviet Jews could very well be in an even worse situation—they could be simply forgotten.

Mr. Speaker, we must not forget. We must not be silent. We must continue to speak out and act and do all we can to free the Soviet Jews from their oppression. Accordingly, I strongly urge my colleagues to join in reaffirming and redoubling our commitment to Soviet Jewry by supporting House Resolution 450.

Mr. Speaker, I withdraw my reservation of objection.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentlewoman from Ohio?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the resolution, as follows:

H. RES. 450

Whereas, on May 6, 1984, the eighty-five constituent agencies of the Greater New York Conference on Soviet Jewry will sponsor "Solidarity Sunday" to reaffirm the resolve to secure freedom for Soviet Jews and beleaguered people everywhere;

Whereas Americans of all faiths and from all regions of the country will join with the Conference on that day in activities expressing the solidarity of our people with the almost three million Jews in the Soviet Union;

Whereas the right to emigrate freely and to be reunited with families abroad is being denied Soviet Jews and others, in clear violation of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights, the Helsinki Final Act of 1975 and the Final Document of the Madrid Conference, signed in 1983;

Whereas Soviet Jewish emigration has dropped alarmingly from a high of fifty-one thousand three hundred and twenty in 1979 to just one thousand three hundred and fourteen in all of 1983;

Whereas the Government of the Soviet Union has implemented new emigration restrictions designed to make the process of obtaining a visa even more arduous;

Whereas those Soviet Jews and other persons who have applied to leave the Soviet Union have been subjected to expulsion from jobs and schools, exile from major Soviet cities and constant surveillance and harassment;

Whereas the Government of the Soviet Union is denying all its Jewish citizens even those rights and privileges accorded other recognized religions in the Soviet Union;

Whereas the Government of the Soviet Union discriminates against Jewish culture and religion by arresting Hebrew teachers, attacking Hebrew teaching circles as "subversive," and promoting anti-Semitic ideology under the cloak of "anti-Zionism;'

Whereas the Government of the Soviet Union will not succeed in isolating Soviet Jews from friends in the West so long as those who cherish liberty and human rights continue to speak out on behalf of beleaguered people everywhere;

Whereas "Solidarity Sunday for Soviet Jewry" will serve as an expression of our determination to continue efforts to obtain freedom for Soviet Jewish Prisoners of Conscience, to have exit visas granted to veteran refuseniks who have sought permission to emigrate for up to fourteen years, and to secure the free exercise of religious beliefs and cultural expression for all minorities: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved, That the House of Representatives supports "Solidarity Sunday for Soviet Jewry" on May 6, 1984.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentlewoman from Ohio (Ms. OAKAR) is recognized for 1 hour.

Ms. OAKAR. Mr Speaker, I yield such time as she may consume to the gentlewoman from New York (Ms. FERRARO).

Ms. FERRARO. I thank the gentlewoman for yielding time to me.

Mr. Speaker, this Sunday thousands of Americans will gather in New York City in solidarity with the 3 million Jews of the Soviet Union.

I would today like to thank my distinguished colleague from New York (Mr. GILMAN), and my distinguished colleague from Ohio, Ms. OAKAR and all the other Members who have made it possible for this House to add its powerful voice to the outrage all Americans feel at the treatment of Soviet Jewry.

The importance of our action here today cannot be overestimated. Twenty Jews are imprisoned in the Soviet Union today for the "crimes" of teaching Hebrew and speaking out against the human rights policies of the Kremlin. Some 20,000 Jews who have been denied exist visas live in constant fear of harassment by an unrelenting bureaucracy which has deprived refuseniks of jobs, housing, even medical care. And no Jew in the Soviet Union is safe as long as the regime pursues policies of anti-Semitism, under the guise of opposition to Israel.

The Jews of the Soviet Union need to know they are not alone in their struggle. And this demonstration of solidarity is one of the most effective means we have for showing them—and showing the Soviet Government—that their plight will never be forgotten or ignored.

This Sunday's march to the United Nations will be the 13th Solidarity Sunday organized by the Greater New York Conference on Soviet Jewry and its 85 affiliated groups and agencies.

These organizations—and thousands of individuals in New York and all over the United States—have worked tirelessly to make known the conditions of fear and persecution in which the Soviet Jewish population lives.

They have brought to public consciousness the cases of such human rights heroes and heroines as Anatoly Shcharansky, Iosef Begun, Ida Nudel, Vladimir Feltsman, and others, less famous, who are nonetheless fighting for the right to practice their religion and express their ethnic heritage.

The Soviet authorities have attempted to discourage these people by telling them "No one in the West cares." Today, this body makes it clear that we do indeed care very much.

We care that Soviet Jewish emigration has been cut 98 percent since 1979. We care that in March just 51 Jews were granted visas for Israel. We care about Soviet violations of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights, the Helsinki Final Act of 1975, and the final document of the Madrid Conference of 1983—all of which affirm the right of family reunification.

We care that prisoners of conscience like Anatoly Shcharansky, Aleksandr Paritsky, and Felix Kochubievsky are in failing health as a result of their harsh and unfair prison sentences.

We care that former prisoner Ida Nudel, an economist, has been refused permission to live in Moscow, her home, and is working as an amusement park attendant.

I will take part in Sunday's march and rally and expect to see many of my colleagues there. And I think we can all be proud that this House today is telling our own Government leaders and the Kremlin that we will never forget or abandon the Jews of the Soviet Union in their fight for the most basic of human rights.

Ms. OAKAR. Mr. Speaker, I yield myself such time as I may consume.

I want to commend the two Members from New York for raising this issue, and I would like to speak a little bit and use this issue as a vehicle to briefly speak about a trip that Congresswoman SCHROEDER and I took to the Soviet Union took during the Easter recess.

The purpose of our trip was to discuss arms control, and we did do that. In addition to that, we brought up issues that relate to human rights, we talked about the oppression that exists in the Soviet Union. We talked about the Lithuanian clergymen, Father Alphonse Svarinkas and Father Tamkevicus who are imprisoned illegally; we talked about the Ukrainian 80-year-old woman, Oksana Meshko who is imprisoned. We feel it is a great violation of human rights, and we raise the issue of oppression as well concerning the plight of the Soviet Jews.

One of the most moving experiences for me when I was there was to meet with Mrs. Anatoly Shcharansky, who is the mother of the imprisoned human rights advocate and hero, Anatoly Shcharansky, whose only crime was to speak out about the lack of enforcement of the Helsinki accords.

Congresswoman SCHROEDER and I had to meet with her in a parked car lest we have our conversation bugged. While we were there meeting with this elderly woman, whose only concern and major concern was the plight of her son who is in prison, who is very, very ill we were told by her, she asked us if we would personally deliver a letter to Secretary Chernenko. We agreed to try to do that, and we are going to do through using the vehicle of the Soviet Ambassador here in the United States, and give to him the handwritten letter of Mrs. Shcharansky.

This letter is a mother's plea to have her son removed and released from prison. He has served 7 years and he is up for a form of parole of the 14-year sentence that he has and they, of course, have refused to release him.

So it was a very moving experience to see this 76-year-old woman who had such courage, who was not afraid to try to meet with us in the back streets of Moscow to ask our support, and we only hope that in some small measure we are able to help her.

In addition to meeting with Mrs. Shcharansky, we also met with other so-called refuseniks who are courageously engaging in their attempt to be released from the Soviet Union. I want to tell my colleagues a little bit about the other individuals with whom we met.

We met with Valeriy Soyfer, who is a former professor of molecular genetics; Aleksandr Lerner, who is a former professor and a senior leader of the refusenik community. He is a well known scientist. We met with Boris Gulko, who is an internationally known chess player; with Mark Reytman, who is a member of the Independent Peace Committee, not the peace committee controlled by the Soviet Government, but he and his colleagues courageously oppose the nuclear buildup and are trying to form an international community related to peace.

We also met with Lev Blitshtein, whose wife and son are in the United States, but he, himself, is not able to leave the Soviet Union and he has not seen them for more than 8 years.

Mr. Speaker, none of these individuals are able to practice the profession that they are trained to practice. What a great reminder to me it was that we do, indeed, live in the greatest country in the world. Certainly in the Soviet Union they have their physical needs met. They have enough food, it appears. They do have housing. They do have health care and things of that nature. But they lack something very fundamental to what we value, and that is our value of freedom. We do, indeed, live in the freest country in the world, and if our citizens desire to go to another country, we do not have those kinds of problems.

So these people are courageously protesting that and have asked to leave the Soviet Union. Because of that, they are being absolutely unduly penalized. I, for one, was very touched by meeting with them.

We also raised the human rights issue because Congresswoman SCHROEDER and I are both on the Committee on Post Office and Civil Service and chair various subcommittees. We brought up the failure of delivery of mail to the Soviet citizens by those living in other countries. We have had many, many hearings on that issue and we know that one of the real forms of oppression is to be closed in so that you have no communication with the outside world. It is another form of thought control. I think in many ways, 1984, as verbalized by the great novelist and essayist and journalist, George Orwell, is alive and well with respect to the suppression of these people.

So I want to join with my colleagues, obviously, in supporting this resolution and I ask, again, for their consideration in supporting it.

Mr. Speaker, let me just conclude by saying that we are delighted with this resolution and we ask that it be voted upon unanimously.

● Mr. DOWNEY of New York. Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to join my colleagues today in speaking out for House Resolution 450 which calls for an official recognition of Solidarity Sunday, a day to reaffirm the resolve to secure freedom for Soviet Jews and beleaguered people everywhere.

Whan Anatoly Shcharansky spoke the following words at his trial several years ago, I believe he expressed the very essense of that which we are seeking for those imprisoned or persecuted because of religious, ideological, and racial preferences:

> Now, I'm further than ever from my dream. It would seem to be a cause for regret. But it's absolutely otherwise. I am happy. I am happy that I have lived honestly in peace with my conscience. I never compromised my soul even under the threat of death.

While we freely speak our minds here today, thousands of Soviet Jews live in fear simply because they wish to practice the tradition of their forefathers. Anatoly Shcharansky is one of those who openly voiced his commitment to his Jewish heritage. We are all aware of his cruel punishment by the Soviet and worry whether he can survive his imprisonment.

Solidarity Sunday provides an opportunity for all of us who can speak out to do so for those who cannot. By raising our collective voices each year at the massive Solidarity Day rally, we send a powerful message to both the persecutors and the oppressed. To the Soviet authorities, we say that we remain aware of their inhumanity and that the grim present outlook has strengthened our commitment to the cause of Soviet Jewry.

More importantly, Solidarity Sunday communicates to the Soviet Jews our heartfelt concern for their plight. Last summer, several colleagues and I visited a number of refuseniks during a congressional trip to the Soviet Union. The refuseniks explained to us that it is precisely our vocal concern that provides them with the encouragement and confirmation of the justness of their cause, and that allows them to go on. We who are free are their lifeline and bear a responsibility to live up to their confidence. And in the absense of meaningful concessions by the Soviets, it is the unbroken spirit of the refuseniks that must remain our greatest fulfillment.

Our efforts are required now more then ever. That is why I urge my colleagues to support the resolution before us today.●

● Mr. SCHUMER. Mr. Speaker, on May 6, the Greater New York Conference on Soviet Jewry will hold its 13th annual Solidarity Sunday. More than 100,000 people from throughout the Northeast are expected to join the march down Fifth Avenue and the rally across from the United Nations to protest the Soviet Union's repressive treatment of its 2½ million Jews, who comprise the world's third largest Jewish community.

This rally, which promises to be the largest manifestation of support for Soviet Jews anywhere in the world this year, comes at a critical time. Emigration of Soviet Jews is at a 16-year low. Only 303 Jews have been allowed to leave the Soviet Union this year; fewer than would have been allowed to leave in a single day as recently as 1979. In the meantime, at least 20 Prisoners of Conscience are rotting in Soviet prisons and camps. Those Jews not incarcerated in body are in fact trapped in spirit—prohibited from observing even their most basic rituals like reading the Torah, and becoming increasingly isolated from their cultural and religious heritage. In nearly every aspect of their daily lives, they must confront the harassment and anti-Semitism that are part of the systematic effort to rob them of their cultural identity.

We must not let up in our demands that the Soviet Union end the oppression of its Jews. On Sunday we will march for the bravery of the refuseniks who continue their struggle for freedom and the liberty of their Jewish countrymen. We will demonstrate that we have not forgotten the tyranny and degradation that the Soviet Government is imposing on its Jewish citizenry, nor the Soviet disregard for every international standard of law and decency. And we will show not only the Soviet Union but the rest of the world that we have not given up in our fight for the freedom of Soviet Jews.●

● Mr. GARCIA. Mr. Speaker, the passage of this resolution has a dual significance. It represents the continued struggle of the Jewish community in the Soviet Union and throughout the world. It also signifies the continued victory of the community and its supporters and our ability to make this an issue of real importance.

We will not forget this struggle. We will not forget our friends locked in the grip of the Soviet state. Their rights will be remembered.

It is difficult to understand how hard it must be to be a refusenik. The depression and fear that must go along with being refused a visa is hard to imagine. Yet, these courageous individuals continue to struggle, and that struggle is not a sign of defeat but of victory.

We must continue to support these individuals with our letters, our rallies, or vigils, and our days of remembrance. It is not only the right thing to do, it is our responsibility.

As members of a free society we are responsible for keeping their hopes alive.

Solidarity Day is a reminder for all of us of how lucky we are to be free. This country was founded, in part, as a haven for religious freedom. That freedom is the most fundamental kind of freedom; freedom of the spirit.

This Sunday represents a lashing out against those who would crush the spirit of the countless refuseniks. They use us as their light, as their hope, their means of escape. It is a small gesture on our part. They are the heroes and heroines.

Their courage represents a moral victory. Their strength is an inspiration. Solidarity Day is their symbol.●

● Mr. ACKERMAN. Mr. Speaker, I rise in strong support of House Ressolution 450. As a cosponsor of this resolution, I am pleased to participate in this expression of congressional support for Solidarity Sunday for Soviet Jewry, which will take place on May 6. The march for Soviet Jewry demonstrates the firm determination of the American people to force the Soviet Union to abide by internationally recognized standards on human rights, and to allow Soviet Jews to emigrate.

Athough we may become frustrated at times by the decrease in the number of Jews allowed to leave the Soviet Union, we have a moral obligation to insure that this issue remains prominent on the United States-Soviet agenda. Americans of all religious backgrounds join forces on Solidarity Sunday, thus proclaiming our invincible commitment to the Soviet Jews who bear the sacrifices that inevitably result from their decision to emigrate.

The poster recently distributed by the National Conference on Soviet Jewry gave me reason to pause and reflect. It provides a most poignant sketch of a Soviet Jewish woman. The deep lines in her face show the anguish she has endured in her sad journey to acquire freedom. Above her picture are a few words we should remember each time we become discouraged: "Take my picture. Show my face. Tell everyone I'm still here." While these words are very simple, they reflect the pain of the Soviet Jews who hope and pray that they will not be forgotten and allowed to languish indefinitely in the Soviet Union. Indeed, for our brothers and sisters in the Soviet Union, the world is a very lonely place. For many of the refuseniks, we are their hope and inspiration.

By adopting House Resolution 450, the House of Representatives today reiterates its fervent support for the thousands of brave Soviet Jews who seek to flee oppression. As Americans, we cannot fully appreciate the personal courage of these people who sacrifice so much by making the decision to fulfill their right to emigrate as delineated in the Helsinki accords and the Universal Declaration of Human Rights. It is our moral obligation to stand in solidarity with the Soviet Jews as they endure in their battle to secure freedom. Solidarity Sunday is a firm expression of our determination to remain faithful in this struggle.●

● Mr. MRAZEK. Mr. Speaker, on Sunday, May 6, over 100,000 Americans will gather for the 13th year in New York City to express their solidarity with the oppressed Jews of the Soviet Union.

On Solidarity Sunday, the Greater New York Conference on Soviet Jewry will sponsor the largest public manifestation of support for Soviet Jewry in the world. I, as well as many of my colleagues, will be attending the march and rally near the United Nations headquarters. We will be joined by Americans of all races, religions and walks of life in a truly nonsectarian display of concern for those Soviet citizens denied their most basic rights.

This year's rally is an especially important event because the current plight of Soviet Jews is at its worst since the time of the infamous Leningrad trials of 1970–71. Fewer than 100 Jews per month are now allowed to leave, a 98-percent drop in the emigration rate from 1979. Harassment of refuseniks and anti-Semitism, against even nonactivist Jews, have risen sharply. Jewish religious services are regularly discouraged or disrupted. This persecution cannot continue.

Participation in Solidarity Sunday is a practical step that many of us can take to improve the deteriorating condition of Soviet Jews. First, we will be urging the Kremlin to cease its counterproductive and discriminatory policies against is Jewish citizens. These practices have contributed to the recent decay in our ties to the Soviet Union. Second, we will remind the administration that human rights should be a priority issue in our relations with the Soviets. Our Government must never slacken its commitment to Soviet dissidents and Prisoners of Conscience. Finally and, perhaps, most importantly, we will convey a sense of hope and encouragement to our many suffering friends who merely want to exercise their basic rights of religion, speech, assembly, and movement.

I would like to thank the Greater New York Conference on Soviet Jewry for offering all of us this opportunity to convey our continued support for Soviet Jewish refuseniks and Prisoners of Conscience. We will persevere in our solidarity until all Soviet Jews are allowed to live their lives as Jews in the Soviet Union or are allowed to emigrate to Israel. I am confident that Solidarity Sunday will bring us one step closer to that day.●

● Mr. GREEN. I rise in support of House Resolution 450, expressing the sense of the House concerning Solidarity Sunday for Soviet Jewry, May 6. I would also like to commend my distinguished colleagues from New York, Representatives FERRARO and GILMAN, for their time and effort in bringing this resolution to the floor.

The theme of this year's Solidarity Sunday is "Take my picture. Show my face. Tell everyone I'm still here." It is an especially poignant message as the emigration numbers continue to decline and the Jews still trapped in the Soviet Union must begin to feel like the forgotten people. By all reliable accounts, there are still more than 2½ million Soviet Jews, many of whom have waited for over a decade to emigrate.

According to the Greater New York Conference on Soviet Jewry, the number of Jews allowed to emigrate in April was 74, bringing the total for 1984 to a pitiful 303. Those who remain are faced with new laws each day, each one more repressive. The latest law states that, as of February 1984, a person who receives material valuables from a foreign source is subject to arrest for anti-Soviet agitation and propaganda. Such persons face up to 10 years in labor camp and 5 years Siberian exile. As Greater New York Conference points out:

> The language of this law is so vague that when a well-intentioned person sends a package or gift to relatives in the Soviet Union, the recipient will be vulnerable to arrest.

As we continue in our capacities as Members of Congress and human rights advocates, I urge that we remember the pleas of those captive in the Soviet Union: "Tell everyone I'm still here." And let us tell the world also that we shall not forget them.●

● Mr. WEISS. Mr. Speaker, this Sunday, May 6, marks the 13th annual demonstration of Solidarity Sunday with Soviet Jewry. New Yorkers 100,000 strong will march to Dag Hammarskjold Plaza to demonstrate their concern for the plight of Soviet Jewry.

Recent experience has taught us the price of silence. As long as the Soviet Union thinks no one is watching, it will feel free to continue its brutal practices. Only when the rest of the world expresses its outrage do the Soviets respond.

Solidarity Sunday provides a forum for all Americans to express their outrage over the continuing abuses of the human rights of Soviet Jews. In all of 1983, the number of Jews permitted to leave the Soviet Union totaled just over 1,300—only one-third the monthly rate of 1979. Officially sanctioned anti-Semitism is on the rise as well. Last summer, the Soviet Government began promoting a pamphlet titled "The Class Essence of Zionism," a virulent anti-Semitic piece thinly disguised as a historical treatise.

This resolution sends an important message to the Soviet Union that the Congress has not forgotten the plight of Soviet Jewry. I urge my colleagues to express their solidarity with Soviet Jewry by voting for this resolution, and I commend the Greater New York Conference on Soviet Jewry for this sponsorship of Solidarity Sunday.●

● Mr. BIAGGI. Mr. Speaker, I am proud to rise today as a cosponsor and advocate of House Resolution 450, a resolution expressing congressional support for Solidarity Sunday, a day when over 100,000 Americans rally in New York City to signify their unity with Soviet Jews. This year's event marks the 13th annual Solidarity Sunday for Soviet Jewry, and it will be held on May 6, 1984, beginning with a march down Fifth Avenue.

Solidarity Sunday is sponsored each year by the Greater New York Conference on Soviet Jewry (GNYCSJ) an organization dedicated to improving the plight of the more than 2,500,000 Soviet Jews. Under the able leadership of Chairman Herbert Kronish and Executive Director Zeesy Schnur, the GNYCSJ serves as a vital communication link and information source for Soviet Jews and those of us who support their cause. Having worked closely with the GNYCSJ over the years, I can attest to the substantial contribution they have made to the Soviet Jewry cause, and particularly to the many efforts undertaken by Congress.

According to the GNYCSJ:

> This year's Solidarity Sunday march and rally will be the largest public manifestation of support for Soviet Jews in the world in 1984 * * * Solidarity Sunday 1984 comes at a critical time for the more than 2,500,000 Soviet Jews, and it represents a unique public opportunity to demand that the new Soviet leadership reopen the gates of emigration and restore the basic human rights of the Soviet Jewish Prisoners of Conscience and refuseniks.

To understand the special significance of this year's Solidarity Sunday it is necessary to reflect on the dramatic and continuing rise in Soviet anti-Semitism during the past year. Consider, for example, that Soviet Jewish emigration dropped sharply in 1983 to its lowest level in modern history. Only 1,315 Jews were allowed to leave the Soviet Union in 1983, down from the previous low of 2,688 who were allowed to emigrate in 1982. The 1983 figure represents a 98-percent decline from the record high number of Soviet Jews—51,330—who were permitted to emigrate in 1979.

Further, it should be noted that this disturbing trend has continued into 1984. Through April of this year, only 303 Jewish citizens were allowed to leave the Soviet Union. This figure is significantly lower than the 435 Soviet Jews who were permitted to emigrate during the same period last year. Significantly, the 4-month totals for both 1983 and 1984, when added together, do not even represent one-third the number of Soviet Jews who emigrated during the single month of April 1980—when 2,469 Soviet Jews emigrated.

A historical view of modern day Soviet Jewish emigration reveals the following figures: 1971, 13,022; 1972, 31,681; 1973, 34,733; 1974, 20,628; 1975, 13,221; 1976, 14,261; 1977, 16,736; 1978, 28,864; 1979, 51,329; 1980, 21,471; 1981, 9,249; 1982, 2,684; 1983, 1,315; and 1984 (through April), 303.

In addition to the record low emigration figures, 1983 also marked the Soviet Government's formation of an Anti-Zionist Committee which has intensified what was already a vicious anti-Semitic campaign.

The Anti-Zionist Committee has even gone so far as saying that the Jews who wanted to leave the Soviet Union have already left. Nothing could be further from the truth. In fact, over 400,000 of the approximately 3 million Soviet Jews have begun the emigration process, and some 20,000 have been denied permission to emigrate on more than one occasion.

Particularly distressing are the considerable number of Soviet Jews who have been arrested, imprisoned, and denied freedom of religious expression in retaliation for requests to emigrate. These Prisoners of Conscience now total 19, with five new Soviet Jewish activists imprisoned in 1983. The new prisoners included Iosif Begun, who was imprisoned for the third time; Simon Shnirman; Yuri Tarnopolsky, who is now suffering through a hunger strike to protest his terrible mistreatment at the hands of Soviet authorities; Aleksandr Panaryev, and Levi Elbert, who was further harassed during the past year on trumped up drug charges that were later dropped. Only one long-term refusenik—Eitan Finkelshtein—received an exit visa during 1983.

The past year was particularly noteworthy for perhaps the most prominent of the Prisoners of Conscience, Anatoly Shcharansky. On September 15, 1983, my home State of New York celebrated "Anatoly Shcharansky Day." The date was chosen for a special reason—it marked the halfway point in Mr. Shcharansky's 13-year sentence as a Soviet Prisoner of Conscience. This was a significant day in Anatoly Shcharansky's terrible ordeal since, under Soviet law, prisoners who have served at least half their sentence can be released for medical reasons. Mr. Shcharansky, who has been in very poor health due to his severe mistreatment, is eligible for such an early release. Tragically, Anatoly Shcharansky, who was arrested on March 15, 1977, on trumped up charges of treason, anti-Soviet agitation, and propaganda, remains imprisoned.

It should also be noted that while Anatoly Shcharansky's treatment has been particularly harsh, other Prisoners of Conscience are similarly treated, and are often popular targets for Soviet forced labor practices. One of the others reported to be suffering poor health during the past year was my adopted Prisoner of Conscience, Feliks Kochubievsky. Mr. Kochubievsky has been the target of constant Soviet Government harassment since he attempted to organize a U.S.S.R-Israel Friendship Society in 1978. He is currently serving a 2½-year prison sentence for his effort, which the local KGB has maintained is anti-Soviet. Mr. Kochubievsky and his wife, Valentina, have been waiting more than 6 years to be granted visas to emigrate to Israel where both of their sons reside.

Other Soviet Jews, who have required special expressions of concern from myself and other Members of Congress this past year, include Rimma and Vladimir Bravve, Zachar Zunshein, and Vladimir Tsukerman, to name just a few.

During the past year I have also joined my House colleagues in approving a resolution calling on the Soviet Union to comply with certain international agreements it has signed requiring the observance of basic human rights, including the right to emigrate; approving a resolution condemning the use of forced labor in the Soviet Union, a practice often directed against Prisoners of Conscience; sending a letter to then-Soviet President Yuriy Andropov urging the Soviet Union to release the Prisoners of Conscience in response to the 269 passengers killed on Korean Air Lines flight 007, which was shot down by the Soviets in September; and forming the International Parliamentary Group for Human Rights in the Soviet Union, which offers another important forum to focus attention on the horrendous human rights situation in the Soviet Union.

Mr. Speaker, while it is difficult to assess the impact of any one of these actions in support of Soviet Jews, the message I have received both directly and indirectly from the Soviet Jewish population is that these efforts offer a great deal of much needed hope to the 2.5 million Soviet Jews who are denied any sense of hope by their own Government. As leaders of the free world it is our duty to insure that these efforts in support of the Soviet Jewry cause continue. Solidarity Sunday is without question one of the most visible displays of our support for Soviet Jews and I strongly urge that we formally and unanimously endorse that even through the passage of House Resolution 450.●

● Mr. LENT. Mr. Speaker, Sunday, May 6, marks a significant event in the fight for religious freedom and human rights. On that day, over 100,000 people will march in New York City to demonstrate their sympathy and support for Soviet Jews. Our solidarity with Soviet Jews will send a powerful message that these brave men and women are not forgotten. It will also send a powerful message to the Soviet regime that the Western World will not turn its back on the plight of these courageous people who have long suffered under the Kremlin's persecution and harassment.

Throughout my service in the U.S. Congress, I have worked with my colleagues on behalf of the thousands of Soviet Jews whose only crime is seeking the freedom to practice the religion of their choice in the country of their choice. Never in those years has their plight been as serious as it is today. Jewish emigration has almost completely halted. In 1983, only slightly more than 1,300 Soviet Jews were permitted to obtain visas to emigrate, far fewer than those given visas in a month's time in the 1970's.

Even worse, officially sanctioned abuse, harassment, and persecution of the cruelest sort has increased alarmingly. Within the past week, Soviet hooligans administered a brutal beating to a young Soviet Jew, Karmi Elbert, whose family seeks to emigrate to Israel. There is no question in my mind that this vicious beating was directly linked to our efforts in America to win freedom for the Elbert family. Such outrageously anti-Semitic attacks must be protested by everyone who respects religious freedom.

In this context, it is my prayer that this year's march for Soviet Jewry will be even more successful than last year's and will increase public awareness to the very serious anti-Semitic violence encouraged by the Soviet regime.

This is the goal of Solidarity Sunday. We in the West who are blessed with the freedom to practice our religious beliefs as we choose must never forget those who are denied this basic right, those who must daily struggle under tyranny's dark oppression.

Solidarity Sunday will help each and every Soviet Jew know that he or she is not forgotten. Our unity, our solidarity, with them in the spirit of human rights and religious freedom joins us in the prayerful belief that the day of freedom will come for all who seek it.●

The SPEAKER. The question is on the resolution.

The resolution was agreed to.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

NATIONAL ASTHMA AND ALLERGY AWARENESS WEEK

Ms. OAKAR. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the Committee on Post Office and Civil Service be discharged from further consideration of the Senate joint resolution (S.J. Res. 244) designating the week beginning on May 6, 1984, as "National Asthma and Allergy Awareness Week," and ask for its immediate consideration in the House.

The Clerk read the title of the Senate joint resolution.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. PATMAN). Is there objection to the request of the gentlewoman from Ohio?

Mr. O'BRIEN. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, and I do not intend to object, I would like to commend the gentlewoman from Ohio (Ms. OAKAR) for bringing up this resolution on the floor today.

Mr. Speaker, as recently as 10 years ago, millions of American children and adults with asthma and allergies lived as had their forebearers, struggling without much hope against these very common, choice-limiting and sometimes life-threatening diseases. Hopes for improved health were for them, as they had been for generations before, slight.

But, throughout the 1970's and continuing today, our investments in the science of immunology have paid remarkable dividends, elevating the base of scientific knowledge, raising standards throughout our Nation in medical diagnosis and treatment.

Today, I am proud to say, knowledge is combining with clinical care and practical measures to dramatically increase the possibilities for better health for over 35 million Americans with asthma and allergic diseases. Our challenge today is to promote the spread of this knowledge throughout medicine and to patients, their families, their employers, and their teachers. The payback to one of every six of us will be significant: Better results at school, fewer workdays lost, and reduced economic hardships.

These are the basic reasons for our passage of a joint resolution this evening, requesting the President to proclaim next week, May 6 to 12 as America's first National Asthma and Allergy Awareness Week, a special emphasis period during which the many unfortunate myths surrounding asthma and allergies can be broken, and better knowledge widely disseminated to millions of Americans. Volunteers and professionals throughout the Nation are tonight poised to begin the most extensive program of information and educational events ever developed to inform the public about the true nature of asthma and allergies, as well as to help millions create new and better choices leading to more healthy lives. And, as a definite result of this resolution and the week it will help proclaim, the growth of immunologic research will be further stimulated, providing new knowledge in our fight against a host of other major diseases with immune system complications.

Mr. Speaker, I withdraw my reservation of objection.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentlewoman from Ohio?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the Senate joint resolution, as follows:

S.J. RES. 244

Whereas asthma and allergic diseases result in physical, emotional, and economic hardship for more than thirty-five million Americans and their families;

Whereas thousands of Americans, many of them young, die each year from asthma even though sufficient medical knowledge and resources exist to prevent many asthma-related deaths;

Whereas student absenteeism is due in significant part to asthma and allergic diseases;

Whereas environmental conditions in the workplace often cause or exacerbate asthma and allergic diseases among employees;

Whereas many hospital patients suffer allergic reactions to prescribed medications;

Whereas it is estimated that the American public pays $2,000,000,000 per year in medical bills directly attributable to the treatment and diagnosis of asthma and allergic diseases and pays another $2,000,000,000 per year as a result of the indirect social cost of such illnesses;

Whereas, because of recent developments in the study of immunology, health care providers are better equipped to diagnose and treat asthma and allergic diseases; and

Whereas increased public awareness of recent scientific advancements in the study of immunology will help dispel many of the common misconceptions concerning asthma, allergic diseases, and the victims of those illnesses: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the week beginning on May 6, 1984, is hereby designated as "National Asthma and Allergy Awareness Week", and the President is authorized and requested to issue a proclamation calling upon the people of the United States to observe such week with appropriate ceremonies and activities.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentlewoman from Ohio (Ms. OAKAR) is recognized for 1 hour.

Ms. OAKAR. Mr. Speaker, I want to commend the gentleman from Illinois

(Mr. O'BRIEN) and ask for the adoption of this resolution.

● Mr. CAMPBELL. Mr. Speaker, on February 1, 1984, Representative GEORGE O'BRIEN and I introduced House Joint Resolution 463, which designates the week beginning on May 6, 1984, as "National Asthma and Allergy Awareness Week." I am pleased that the House is considering this bill today, and I want to commend all of my colleagues who cosponsored our bill.

Asthma and allergic diseases result in physical, emotional, and economic burdens for more than 35 million American children, adults, and their families. Tragically, thousands of Americans, many of them young, die each year from asthma despite the fact that knowledge and resources exist to prevent many of these deaths.

Scientific knowledge about asthma and allergic disorders is growing and making remarkable gains. Unfortunately, misconceptions concerning asthma and allergic disorders still persist, creating hardships for millions of our citizens. In order to emphasize the importance of public education and awareness and to encourage the continued public and private support of research, I am hopeful that my colleagues will support and adopt this resolution.●

The Senate joint resolution was ordered to be read a third time, was read the third time, and passed, and a motion to consider was laid on the table.

NATIONAL ARTS WITH THE HANDICAPPED WEEK

Ms. OAKAR. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the Committee on Post Office and Civil Service be discharged from further consideration of the Senate joint resolution (S.J. Res. 220) to designate the week of May 20, 1984, through May 26, 1984, as "National Arts With the Handicapped Week," and ask for its immediate consideration in the House.

The Clerk read the title of the Senate joint resolution.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentlewoman from Ohio?

Mr. JEFFORDS. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, and I do not intend to object, but I would like to commend the gentlewoman for bringing this resolution up and also for the sponsors of the resolution, and at the same time I would like to raise the body's awareness of the National Committee Arts With the Handicapped, an educational affiliate of the John F. Kennedy Center for the Performing Arts, as our Nation's coordinating agency for the arts programs for disabled people.

□ 1700

This year the NCAH will celebrate its 10th anniversary with a national very special arts festival in Washington, D.C. Over 750 disabled persons from all 50 States, the District of Columbia and Puerto Rico, will demonstrate their outstanding accomplishments in the visual and performing arts.

The National Committee conducts arts programs on a year round basis for over 500,000 disabled people. Over a million students, educators, parents, and others participate in the NCAH sponsored workshops, performance and in-service training programs. With this kind of vibrant leadership, NCAH has pioneered the arts with the handicapped movement. The committee continues to develop innovative projects and through the very special arts festival programs, NCAH conducts a nationwide program which is unlike any other in the country.

I think it is important to emphasize the need and also the tremendous potential of our handicapped in this area.

I commend the gentlewoman.

Mr. Speaker, the official designation of May 20–26, 1984, as National Arts With the Handicapped Week recognizes the strong commitment of our country's leaders to providing opportunities for disabled and nondisabled children, youth and adults to participate in the arts.

The National Committee, Arts With the Handicapped, an educational affiliate of the John F. Kennedy Center for the Performing Arts, is our Nation's coordinating agency for arts programs for disabled people. This year, NCAH will celebrate its 10th anniversary with a national very special arts festival in Washington, D.C. Over 750 disabled persons from all 50 States, the District of Columbia and Puerto Rico will demonstrate their outstanding accomplishments in the visual and performing arts. The National Committee conducts arts programs on a year-round basis for over 500,000 disabled people. Over a million students, educators, parents, volunteers, and others participate in NCAH sponsored workshops, performances and in-service training programs.

With vibrant leadership, NCAH has pioneered the arts with the handicapped movement. The committee continues to develop innovative projects, and through the very special arts festival programs, NCAH conducts a nationwide program which is unlike any other in the country.

During the past decade, hundreds of thousands of handicapped people have experienced for themselves and have shared with others the joy and the beauty that dance, theater, music, painting and sculpture bring to the human spirit. The arts provide a noncompetitive opportunity for handicapped people to enter the mainstream of society.

President John F. Kennedy once said, "the life of the arts . . . is very close to the center of a nation's purpose and is the test of the quality of a nation's civilization." The National Committee, Arts With the Handicapped has contributed to the strength of American cultural and educational life, insuring that each child, youth and adult—whether disabled or nondisabled—has the opportunity to participate in and contribute to the life of the arts in the United States.

Ms. OAKAR. Mr. Speaker, if the gentleman will yield, I just would like to commend the gentleman for his remarks. I want to just add my support to this resolution.

There is no question that if there is one thing that would heal the wounds of people and the esthetic needs of our country, it has to do with the arts. I am proud to be a member of the Arts Caucus. I am proud of this resolution, because we ought to be able in this great country of ours to support arts for the handicapped, and the handicapped, as a matter of fact, are great contributors to art forms in this country.

So I am very, very pleased with this resolution and the work that is being done at the Kennedy Center and elsewhere in the country.

Mr. JEFFORDS. Mr. Speaker, I withdraw my reservation of objection.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentlewoman from Ohio (MS. OAKAR)?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the Senate joint resolution, as follows:

S.J. RES. 220

Whereas programs involving the arts enhance the learning and enrich the lives of disabled persons;

Whereas arts with the handicapped is a means of integrating disabled persons into the mainstream of education and cultural society;

Whereas programs bringing arts to the handicapped inform the general public, parents, volunteers, and the business community of the value of arts to the disabled;

Whereas emphasis is needed to expand support for arts programs with the handicapped and to increase participation and commitment of the community and educators to these activities;

Whereas the National Committee Arts With the Handicapped, an educational affiliate of the John F. Kennedy Center for the Performing Arts, will celebrate its tenth anniversary as the coordinating agency for arts programs for disabled children with a very special arts festival in Washington, District of Columbia, during the week of May 20, 1984; and

Whereas the committee conducts education programs in all fifty States, the District of Columbia, and Puerto Rico to assure that all disabled persons have access to programs which bring the arts into their lives: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the week of May 20, 1984, through May 26, 1984, is designated as "National Arts With the Handicapped Week", and the President is authorized and requested to issue a proclamation calling upon the people of the United States to observe the week with appropriate programs, ceremonies, and activities.

The Senate joint resolution was ordered to be read a third time, was read the third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

GENERAL LEAVE

Ms. OAKAR. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that all Members may have 5 legislative days within which to revise and extend their remarks on the several resolutions just considered and passed or agreed to.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentlewoman from Ohio?

There was no objection.

REMOVAL OF NAME OF MEMBER AS COSPONSOR OF H.R. 953

Mr. RICHARDSON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that my name be removed as a cosponsor of H.R. 953.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New Mexico?

There was no objection.

REPORT ON NATIONAL EMERGENCY WITH RESPECT TO IRAN—MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES (H. DOC. NO. 98-214)

The SPEAKER pro tempore laid before the House the following message from the President of the United States; which was read, and, together with the accompanying papers, without objection, referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs and ordered to be printed:

(For message, see proceedings of the Senate of today, May 3, 1984.)

ORDER OF BUSINESS

Mr. REGULA. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that I be allowed to proceed ahead of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, (Mr. WALKER) on special orders.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Ohio?

There was no objection.

CHILDREN'S DEFENSE ACT OF 1984

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under a previous order of the House, the gentleman from Ohio (Mr. REGULA) is recognized for 15 minutes.

Mr. REGULA. Mr. Speaker, on April 11 I introduced the Children's Defense Act of 1984 (H.R. 5486). This legislation, which deals with the sexual abuse of children outside their home environment is long overdue.

Over the past decade, the exposure of the heinous crimes of sexual assault, molestation, and/or rape against our children have become more and more pervasive in our society. The American Humane Association's 1984 National Report stated that the estimated number of sexual maltreatment victims in the United States, as reported to child protective services, in 1982 numbered 56,607. This figure is a drastic sevenfold increase from the 7,559 child victims reported in 1976.

The National Association of Social Workers (NASW) has recently released a report stating they estimate that "This year, over 100,000 children in the United States will be sexually abused." The same report by the NASW has also found, among other things, that:

The incidence rate for sexual abuse is highest among adolescent females ages 12-17, but half the victims of sexual abuse are between birth and age 11;

National estimates show that at a minimum, one in eight girls is a victim of sexual abuse before the age of 18, usually by someone she knows and trusts;

In one retrospect survey of 1,200 college-age females, 28 percent reported sexual experience with an adult prior to the age of 13; only 6 percent of the incidents had been reported to authorities.

However, we do not need statistics to verify this increase; we only need to look at the headlines in the newspapers. Just a few of these read as follows:

"Brutalized: Sex Charges at a Nursery"; "Preschool Investigated"; "Counselor Faces More Sex Charges"; "SE Teacher, 43, Accused of Indecency With Pupil"; "Charges of Aggravated Sexual Battery Against Elementary School Principal"; "Aide Accused of Sexual Abuse at State School"; "Counselor Accused of Molesting Choir Boys"; "Teacher Held on Child Porn Charges"; and, "13 Year Term for Molesting Day-Care Kids."

There are basically two reasons for this dramatic increase in the exposure of these crimes: One, it is not to say these incidents have increased, simply that they have been reported and brought out into the open more frequently. Two, we have become a two salary-per-family society where both parents either find it financially necessary or simply want to work. Because of both parents working it is necessary for them to depend on services and organizations for the care of their children. And they have found it increasingly difficult over the past years to be totally confident in the services and organizations created to care for their children.

Contrary to what most of us like to believe, the stranger is not the most common perpetrator. In fact, it is estimated that only 9 percent of the perpetrators are strangers. Most of these children are abused over an extended period of time by someone they know and trust, and by someone they are often physically and emotionally dependent upon such as a parent, neighbor, teacher, or camp counselor.

Dr. Ann Burgess, a professor at the University of Pennsylvania, one of the Nation's leading experts on child sex victims and the individuals who abuse our children has recently testified on this issue before the Senate Judiciary Committee. Dr. Burgess stated she has found through her extensive studies of child sex rings that "the most common method of access used by offenders was their occupation." Dr. Burgess stated that these individuals often seek employment where they will necessarily be in contact with children, choosing such occupations as school bus driver, teacher, camp counselor, babysitter, physician, minister, social worker, or photographer. Dr. Burgess also stated that these people also use hobbies such as coaching little league teams to gain access to children. The abuser is not a stranger.

Neither is the popular conception of the abuser—that of being a dirty old man—correct. A study conducted by Rivers Keith Carpenter, coordinator of a child abuse awareness program called Project Safe, states that half of all known abusers were under the age of 31; only 10 percent were past the age of 50. Additionally, although the abuser is most often male, women also can be sexual abusers of children.

These individuals, known as pedophiles—people who are stimulated by sexual activity with children—have their own underground network of information to assist one another in not only obtaining pornographic material of children but in actually accessing children. I would like to quote from one of these magazines for pedophiles called Hermes to highlight the danger our children are in.

From your (the man's) point of view, there are many satisfying ways of making contact with boys, ways which are not only socially approved but encouraged! Big Brothers, Boy Scouts, church groups—the list of organizations goes on . . . Whether or not you have a criminal record or other "problems" in your past, there is very little chance that anyone will ever know of your interests or check into your background. And it is rare, no matter what you have heard, for people to "suspect" the man who is unmarried of improper activities or thoughts, unless there is glaring evidence to the contrary.

Dr. Gene Abel, director of the Sexual Behavior Clinic at the New York State Psychiatric Institute found that the child molestors or pedophiles he studied were responsible for molesting an average of 68.3 victims. Additionally, many of these pedophiles will, as shown in their underground publication mentioned above, seek out children in the most obvious places. And what are the most obvious places outside the child's home environment? Our schools, day care centers, camps, and other child organizations.

I am not trying to say that everyone who shows a keen or excessive interest in children are pedophiles, they are not. However, as I have already mentioned, there will be an estimated 100,000 children sexually abused this year, a large percentage of those children will be abused outside their home environments. We must be cautious with our children.

Yes, we already have laws against child abuse. But the penalties for child abuse take place after the abuse. And yes, we already have laws against the distribution of pornographic materials. But again, the penalties for the distribution of these materials take place after the distribution. Additionally, even though pornographic material is a great precipitator of sexual abuse, sexual abuse is not always predicated upon pornographic material. A large number of studies have already proved that when a child is abused, in any manner, there is an excellent chance of that child becoming the abuser as an adult, without any outside assistance such as pornographic material.

Can we in good conscience tell the children of our Nation and the parents of these children we cannot help them until after they have been horrendously abused?

The Federal Government has a responsibility to protect our children to the best of its ability. Through the Federal financial assistance given, we have the means to insure that access to our children is neither encouraged nor easy for the pedophiles. It is time we acted.

The Children's Defense Act of 1984 will go a long way in stopping these crimes. It will insure that no individual who has been convicted for a sexual offense, consisting of rape, carnal knowledge, sexual assault, or any other sexual contact, perpetrated against a child, shall be hired as an employee, volunteer, or consultant in certain agencies or other organizations, be they public or private, which receives Federal financial assistance established for the primary purpose of engaging in any activity involving direct contact between the personnel of that agency or organization and at least 20 children outside their home environments during any 7-day period.

To achieve this goal, these organizations, known as youth-oriented organizations, must request, through a State-funneling agency provided for in my legislation, the FBI to conduct a criminal records search for all prospective employees and volunteers mentioned above. The State attorney general and the director of the State's funneling agency may allow any other youth-oriented organization which does not receive Federal financial assistance to also access these records through the funneling agency. The Federal Government will not be responsible for any of the cost of the searches for those organizations which do not receive Federal financial assistance.

Once the FBI receives the record check request from the State-funneling agency, on behalf of the youth-oriented organization, the ID division will search fingerprint card submissions against its criminal file and furnish to the State-funneling agency the information found. The State-funneling agency will then inform the youth-oriented organization whether or not the prospective employee or volunteer has a past conviction of sexual offenses.

This legislation will not be creating a new service or division within the FBI. The FBI is already authorized to conduct licensing and employment records checks as a result of Public Law 92-544, 86 Stat. 1115 which was passed by Congress in 1972. This law enables FBI to exchange identification records with officials of State and local governments.

The youth-oriented organizations will not have direct access to the FBI's records, nor will they be given the complete record of the individual in question. It will be the responsbility of the State-funneling agency to screen the information provided by the FBI. Only the information requested by the youth-oriented organizations—whether or not the applicant has a prior conviction record of sexual offenses—will be given to the organization.

For the youth-oriented organizaiton to avoid unnecessary invocation of formal enforcement procedures, which will include termination of the Federal financial assistance granted to that youth-oriented organization, this act includes provisions that the organization must first be notified and given a chance to comply voluntarily. Although the act does not provide specific limits of a time period within which voluntary compliance may be sought, it is clear that requests for voluntary compliance, if not followed by responsive action on the part of the youth-oriented organization within a reasonable time, does not relieve either the Federal agency having authority to extend Federal financial assistance to that organization or that State's funneling agency of the responsibility to enforce this act. Those agencies and/or organizations consistent failure to do so will be termed dereliction of duty and subject to review in court.

A policy of excluding from employment individuals who have suffered a number of arrests without any conviction is unlawful and, therefore, only those individuals for whom a conviction has been found will be denied a position in the youth-oriented organization under this act.

This act expressly disclaims the intent to provide, by virtue of the cessation of Federal assistance as provided for in sec. 2(b) and (c) (1) and (2) of this act, a forum for the youth-oriented organizations to discriminate or refuse employment of any applicant on the basis of any conviction of crimes other than sexual offenses, or to discriminate or refuse employment of any applicant who has been alledged or arrested, but not convicted, of the crimes of any sexual offenses.

Court records are frequently excepted form confidentiality requirements and concern over separation of powers usually accounts for the exclusion of court records from the privacy acts.

I believe that criminal justice data, although contained in Government records, is potentially sufficiently harmful as to require additional disclosure control. Therefore, the Freedom of Information Act and public record/sunshine laws shall not negate disclosure, privacy etc. as provided for under sec. 4(c)(1) and (c)(2) of this act.

I have attached a table, provided by the American Humane Association, showing the estimated number of sexual maltreatment victims in the United States reported to child protective services and a list of States which currently conduct this type of security check for certain jobs. Reading recent articles in the news media is heartrending. We must do something. I believe the Children's Defense Act of 1984 can and will defend our children and protect them against these pedophiles.

Mr. Speaker, banks, the Securities and Exchange Commission, and various other financial institutions already use the services of the FBI to conduct this very same type of check for prospective employees to insure that their money is safe. Can we do any less for the safety of our children?

ESTIMATED NUMBER OF SEXUAL MALTREATMENT VICTIMS IN THE UNITED STATES REPORTED TO CHILD PROTECTIVE SERVICES PROVIDED BY AMERICAN HUMANE ASSOCIATION

	1976	1977	1978	1979	1980	1981	1982
Total victims	7,559	11,617	12,257	27,247	37,366	37,441	56,607
Percent of:
Male victims	15	14	13	14	16	16	17
Female victims	85	86	87	86	84	84	83
Male perpetrators	79	81	79	79	80	78	78
Female perpetrators	21	19	21	21	20	22	22
Estimates are based on the following:
States in data base	27	28	27	25	28	23	20
Percent of child population of the United States	27	36	43	42	43	47	40

We must stop this travesty which maims the physical, emotional, and psychological well being of the child.

Thank you.

STATES CURRENTLY CONDUCTING FBI SEARCHES

STATE AND TYPE OF JOB

Alaska: School bus drivers.

Arizona: Persons applying for pre-adoption certificates, state welfare employees, and licensed school bus drivers.

Georgia: School bus drivers.

Illinois: Foster parents, child care workers and school bus drivers.

Nevada: Teachers aides or other non-professionals who assist in institutions.

New Jersey: School bus drivers, child adoption applicants and abuse investigators.

New York: NY city school system employees.

Most police departments are already sending fingerprints to the FBI. Many states also conduct this search for potential employees of banks, law enforcement applicants, government agencies, and the military.

Specifically for children, the FBI fingerprint checks of employees of Federal and state facilities for the detention, correction, care or treatment of juveniles are authorized by Title 28, U.S. Code, Sec. 534. Additionally, Executive Order 10450 requires a fingerprint check of the ID Division's Criminal File on all Federal job applicants. FBI fingerprint checks of employees of state/local governmental and business organizations which have regular contact with children are also authorized (although not always done) under P.L. 92-544, if the states pass statutes requiring such checks and the Attorney General of the U.S. approves them.

POLITICS AND SPECIAL INTERESTS

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under a previous order of the House, the gentleman from Pennsylvania (Mr. WALKER) is now recognized for 60 minutes.

Mr. WALKER. Thank you, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker, for the last several weeks, I and a number of my colleagues have been raising the concern that the legislative schedule of this House of Representatives is far more controlled by greedy special interest power than by public interest concerns.

We have raised the concern that the House of Representatives has become a special interest arena where money and clout play far more of a role than the interests of our constituents across the country, that an agenda that the American people want to see addressed in this body gets ignored while special interests are able to get their agenda acted on with great immediacy.

We have pointed out, for instance, in the bankruptcy case how big labor clout could come in here and in a matter of days assure that their concerns were taken care of, despite the fact that the bankruptcy court problem existed around here for a year or more and had not been addressed in a responsible fashion by this House.

But when big labor wanted their way, boy, they got immediate action and they got it within days.

This week, we had a Member of Congress come to the floor on a bill in which what he was trying to do was defend his district against outside special interest encroachment, he was trying to present the viewpoint of his constituents about big special interests coming into his district and determining what was best for his district without consultation with the people, without agreement by the people.

And his concerns were described on this floor by the chairman of the subcommittee handling the bills as being trivial; that that is a trivial concern, when the outside special interests want something and the Member of Congress from that district says that it is not in the best interest of his district, that is a trivial concern, we were told on the House floor this week.

But this week also brought with it a number of other actions, some of them not on this floor but actions taken behind closed doors which also showed how special interest power is having a devastating impact, how greedy special interests have gotten a handle on the legislative process and are pulling it, and tugging it, and tugging it away from where the American people would wish the country to go.

We had a delay on consideration of a bill that many Americans regard as important; the immigration bill. Now, there are many of us in this House, as there would be many people out across the country who are not happy with all aspects of that bill. But the American people, seeing the advent of millions upon millions of illegal aliens impacting on our labor markets, impacting on our welfare system, impacting on the many aspects of our lives, are concerned that we do something to stop illegal immigration into this country.

This House has refused to act on that bill. We have been assured on many different occasions we were going to get action on that bill, but this week we learned once again it was going to be delayed. Why? Was it going to be delayed for some good conscionable reasons?

No. It was being delayed because the Democratic Party was going to play politics with the bill a little while longer; it was being delayed evidently because of the California primary coming up soon. Was it being delayed because of any Members of Congress were concerned over the Democratic primary? Well, no, because no Democrats are regarded as being in major trouble in their primaries.

What evidently happened was that the former Vice President of the United States, who is now a candidate for President, called the Speaker and said that it might not be a good idea to have this vote just prior to, that it might cost him some Hispanic votes, and after all what we had here was the fact that finally his special interest problems were coming back to haunt him.

He has promised everybody everything. So, he promised the Hispanics something and he promised labor something; he has taken money from all kinds of special interests powers and now all of a sudden, he finds two of them clashing with each other. The Hispanics are clashing with organized labor and he is caught in the middle, and he did not want to have that resolved prior to running in a California primary where, in fact, there might be real problems for him if that kind of clash took place.

Well, it tells you something about who has the clout around here. What happens when special interests take power? And it is one more case of the fact that in the Halls of this Congress, special interest power has become a dominating power. I will be glad to yield to the gentleman from California.

Mr. LUNGREN. I thank the gentleman.

As the gentleman knows, I worked on this immigration issue for 6 years now; have had hopes raised and dashed on innumerable occasions, and obviously am seeing some frustration visited upon myself at the present time.

But that really is not all that important; what is important is the corrosive influence of special interest considerations on the legislative processes.

The gentleman mentions the immigration issue and mentions that we have been promised time and again an opportunity to deal with it. And here we are 2 years, almost, after we last dealth with it on the floor in the last throes of the previous Congress, in a lameduck session, when we were given time to debate it from 10 at night until 2 in the morning; when 200 amendments were introduced.

The real irony of this is that this has been a bipartisan effort all the way through. It was President Carter's administration that established a Select Commission on Immigration Policy. And they went out and they got Democrats and Republicans, got Members of the House, Members of the Senate to serve on it; they had representatives of organized labor, Hispanic community, representatives of the religious community; they had representatives of the academic community, and they looked at this thing for 2 years.

As often is the case, they made sure that the commission would not report until after the next Presidential election, which is, I guess, one guide to how sensitive things are around here.

But, nonetheless, that occurred, carried over to the Reagan administration. President Reagan did not exercise his ability to change the membership of that Commission but rather allowed that Commission to finish its business; then set up a Cabinet-wide task force to review those recommendations.

They then sent them to both the House and the Senate. We started working on them. We passed out a bill out of our committee in the previous Congress. The Senate passed it by an overwhelming bipartisan vote. We passed it out of our committee this last year, a year ago May, the Senate passed it by an overwhelming vote; bipartisan support, so you would think we had the opportunity to deal with a very difficult issue; complex issue, one that is fraught with emotion, one that is fraught with controversy, in a reasonable, responsible way.

The problem is the longer you delay a bill and do not allow full consideration in open forum on the floor of the House, the longer you allow certain myths to be created by the bill; you have Presidential candidate, Mr. Jackson, suggesting that the bill is going to make us like South Africa where you have to carry an internal passport.

You have Mr. Hart, the candidate, saying that this bill is discriminatory. You even had on occasion TIP O'NEILL saying this would treat Hispanics the way Hitler did the Jews and make people wear dog tags. You would have all of these extraordinary emotion-filled myths created that absolutely undercut the ability to deal with a very tough issue in a reasonable way.

I want to say we have had bipartisan efforts in this House and it is a shame that the leadership in this House has allowed politics to be played with this issue that makes it ever more difficult for us to address it in a responsible way.

□ 1730

Mr. Mondale, evidently—and this was acknowledge to a reporter in the New York Times—placed a personal call to the Speaker of the House, TIP O'NEILL, and personally asked him not to allow this to come to the floor because, as the gentleman said, it might cause him some problems in the California primary.

My question is this: Mr. Mondale started his campaign saying that he ought to be President of the United States, not only because he sat there, and he knows where the phone is, because if that were the criteria I suppose the people who clean the Oval Office would be qualified for President, but because he somehow has exhibited leadership and it is decisive leadership that is necessary, if we are going to take care of the problems and the challenges of the future.

So what does Mr. Mondale do on a tough issue, the type of issue that any President of the United States is going to have to deal with on a regular basis, an issue that is controversial, an issue that has people on all sides of it, an issue to which there is no perfect solution only an imperfect solution, but an issue to which there must be addressed a solution? What does he do? He falls back 10 yards, and he punts. He basically said.

Do not make me be challenged on the question of leadership when the voters might have an opportunity to decide whether I pass or fail that test of leadership. Put it off until I have garnered sufficient numbers of delegates in the delegate search on the Democratic side.

Because I suppose after Mr. Mondale gets the number of delegates necessary who are pledged to him, then voters will not have an opportunity to respond to what he does, or what he says or the decisions that he makes.

All I can ask is how is that leadership? How can he criticize the President of the United States, Mr. Reagan, who has taken positions on tough issues and who has taken a position on the tough issue of immigration? Mr. Mondale is criticized for being part of the Carter-Mondale administration and there is a lot to criticize in that administration. At least President Carter had the guts to appoint a Commission to deal with this issue and now Mr. Mondale is going to run away from it.

The question I have is: Since when is a qualification for President of the United States the fact that you can most delicately tiptoe through the tulips of all the special interest groups so that you do not offend any single one of them by bruising any of their petals? And that is what we have here.

The other point I would like to make and I think it is an important point here, we are talking about Hispanic organizational groups. The reason that is very important is consistently we have heard that the Hispanics are against the Simpson-Mazzoli immigration reform package.

If you look at the polls, that is not true. The polls show overwhelming support in the Hispanic community, overwhelming support in the Anglo community, overwhelming support in the black community for not the Simpson-Mazzoli bill, but for the elements of the Simpson-Mazzoli bill when they are specifically asked about those elements. When they are asked, "Do you think we ought to bolster the border patrol?" Over 70 percent of all those groups say "yes." When you say, "Should we stop illegal aliens from coming into this country and deport them?", over 70 percent of all three groups say "yes."

If you then say, "Should we legalize those who have been here for a significant period of time in an illegal status and have not broken the law, have been good members of our society," and the question has always been asked, "Have been here for a 5-year period of time," over 70 percent of all groups say "yes."

When you ask the question, "Ought we to have employer sanctions?" with all the problems that people can bring up about that, over 70 percent of the American people say "yes." And the latest poll shows among Hispanics it was as high as 83 percent.

Now, what has happened? We have had some people say the poll was slanted. The Lance Terrance-Peter Hart poll, and those are two people who are used by Democrats and Republicans, "The poll was slanted. The questions were not asked properly."

Let us go to the Gallup poll. The Gallup poll is the one that shows the 83-percent figure and it is consistent with the Lance Terrance and the Peter Hart poll. They are not satisfied with that, let us go to the Field Foundation poll in California, where it shows a commonality of results all across the board.

The point I am making is that when you raise special interests to the altar of infallibility what you do is create an atmosphere in this House where it is virtually impossible to do the people's work in a responsible fashion. That is the tragedy.

Sure, I am upset about this. Obviously, I am upset and frustrated about this. But I am far more frustrated about the American people's inability to have responsive action in the House than I am over my own frustration. And what message does it send to responsible members of the Democratic party who have worked diligently on this bill or on this issue for 4, or 6, or 8, or 10 years? It says to them,

If you take on a dirty job and you work and you work on a bill that really is not going to give you any political benefits, when push comes to shove, we are going to kick you in the teeth.

And when Walter Mondale calls, and when the special interests come calling, we are going to ignore the work that you have done.

So the message here is one that was articulated by, of all people, the distinguished majority leader, JIM WRIGHT, just this week in an article that appeared in the Washington Post. When asked why there were not sufficient members of the Democratic party here to defeat certain amendments that were brought forward by Republicans on the Bureau of Standards bill, he said, basically, "I don't know. It doesn't look like they are interested in what we are doing."

It seems that many Members are more concerned about making sure they come back for the next Congress. That is a terrible indictment of this institution. But the fact of the matter is that you can have immigration reform promised to you in October, promised to you in January, promised to you in February, promised to you at the end of March, promised to you in May, and now promised to you again in June. I do not think that I am being overly delicate or overly sensitive when I suggest that I still have some very grave questions about whether we will be given the opportunity to deal with this issue.

Mr. WEBER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WALKER. I yield to the gentleman from Minnesota.

Mr. WEBER. I thank the gentleman for yielding.

On that point I just want to ask my colleague from the Judiciary Committee, the gentleman is correct in saying we were promised this in February and we have been promised it since then, but we should not lead people to believe that that is the first time that the bill was under consideration.

The bill has been in committee for far longer, has it not? I recall in the lameduck session after the 1982 election we were permitted through the benevolence of the Speaker to debate the immigration reform bill. Of course he would not let us vote on it, so it did not do any good.

But how long actually has the immigration bill been in the works in the Judiciary Committee?

Mr. LUNGREN. The Carter Commission recommendations came to us——

Mr. WEBER. The Carter Commission?

Mr. LUNGREN. The Carter Select Commission on Immigration Reform came to us about 3 months after the Reagan administration came into office. So we have been working on it at least since that time. Our committee in the House, as well as the committee in the Senate, were working with that Commission and following that Commission. We had Representatives on it. The distinguished chairman of the Judicary Committee, Mr. RODINO, was a member. The distinguished ranking member, Mr. FISH, was a member. Mr. McClory, the former distinguished ranking member was a member of that Commission.

Mr. WEBER. Do I understand correctly the gentleman from New Jersey and the distinguished chairman of the Judiciary Committee was a member of the Commission and signed off on its recommendations?

Mr. LUNGREN. Absolutely.

Mr. WEBER. And still we have not seen that bill brought from his committee to the floor of the House in now well over a year?

Mr. LUNGREN. Well, as I say, as the gentleman knows, we had it in November, late November/December 1982. We were not given enough time to deal with it. We have been dancing around the legislative process with it ever since. I am afraid that the criticism that many Americans raise about this institution may be borne out by this experience. There are those who criticize this institution by suggesting that we duck the tough issues, that we look for the easy issues.

If there is a proclamation that we want to pass here condemning this action or that action by a foreign country, I am not saying that those are not important, we do that without much difficulty.

If there is some tough consideration of an amendment that says we will not allow products produced by slave labor, we not only do not successfully present that on the floor, we do not even get the opportunity to have it presented on the floor.

When you deal with the tough issue of immigration, which States and localities cannot deal with themselves, by the Constitution immigration is a Federal responsibility, you cannot get the Congress to move.

□ 1740

Florida knows that we need action on immigration. California knows that we need action on immigration. The great Southwest knows that we need action on immigration. Chicago, Ill., knows that we need action on immigration. Virtually every State in the Union knows that we need action on immigration, and yet we do not do the people's work here. I just think it is a black eye to this institution and ill serves the American people when we allow, first, just merely governmental inertia to prevail here, but then to find the hoary head of special-interest politics directing itself into this institution. It really means that somehow we are not doing the people's work.

If we are being paid $72,000 to come here to Washington and deal with noncontroversial issues, then we are far far more paid beyond what is necessary, I do not think we are overpaid, but it is apparent that, unless we start working, that argument can be made.

I had thought that the Democratic Party had learned that the American people are turned off by the great genuflection to special interest that Mr. Mondale showed at the beginning of his campaign for the Presidency. Evidently they have not learned that lesson because that it appearing more and more a part of what we are doing in this House.

The extraordinary thing is that just 2 days ago Mr. WRIGHT, the majority leader, I think told us in good faith, those of us who were gathered in Chairman PEPPER's office there next to the hearing room for the Rules Committee, that they intended to bring it forward on the floor on May 21 and give us 7 full legislative days to work on it. And I believe that he was as startled as the rest of us when he learned that Mr. Mondale has not discovered that special-interest politics is not in the national interest. But unfortunately his view did not prevail. Mr. Mondale did. And what we have here is direct action taken by Mr. Mondale to insure that for partisan political purposes we will not have an opportunity to address a major issue that the American people desperately need to be addressed. We just have no excuse. We stand before the American people I think embarrassed, and I would hope that the American people would let us know how they feel on this.

Since Mr. O'NEILL announced in October that we would not deal with this issue we have had more than a congressional district full of illegal entries into the United States, more than 500,000 illegal entries into the United States just since October. We will have well over 1 million people apprehended this year, we will have more than 2 to 4 million successful illegal entries into the United States. Maybe the purpose is to build up the census in certain parts of the country so we can have more Members of Congress of a particular party, I do not know. I do not think that makes much sense. But the fact of the matter is that the American people cannot stand for it much longer, and I think they have just got to be scratching their heads today when we say, "Look, in 24 hours this House could have a bill introduced and we could adopt a resolution here on the floor in 24 hours."

The Speaker told us when we debated the ERA that one of the prerogatives of the Speaker is control of the calendar and "I bring up bills when I want to bring up bills."

Mr. WALKER. Let me give the gentleman an example. We had a bill out here today that we passed today. It had been introduced in the House for the first time today. We had it introduced and passed here today. Why? Well, it happened to be to take care of a big contributor to the Democratic Party. If you contribute a lot of money to the Democratic Party, you get your bill introduced on 1 day and passed the same day. But if you want to take up immigration, if you want to take up equal access, if you want to take up acid rain, if you want to take up all of these kinds of things you cannot do that. "No, sir, boy, we cannot get those out on the floor to talk about because you do not have enough clout, you are not a big enough special interest, you have not signed into the Walter Mondale special interest campaign. Therefore, you cannot get your action on the House floor." That has to be one of the most disturbing aspects of what is taking place in the devastation of the legislative process.

Mr. LUNGREN. If the gentleman will yield further, I have had Members of the other party in this body come to me and suggest that we keep up the pressure on immigration reform, because they say we need to do something. I have had Members on the Democratic side say to me and encourage me that we ought to keep up the pressure on dealing with comprehensive legislation on crime. I have had Members come forward and say keep the pressure on because we have to do something on the insanity defense.

The problem is that this place is run in a partisan fashion. There is one party that dominates this House, there is one party that decides what will be brought up and what will not be brought up. As much as those Democratic Members encourage us and suggest that we ought to put the pressure on to force these things to the floor, there seems to be an inability of many Members on the Democratic side to move their party to allow these things to be brought up.

My fear is that the Democratic Party, one of the two greater political parties, unfortunately has been captured by the interests of the far left, that if the ACLU says, "we have problems with crime legislation," crime legislation does not come to the floor. If certain people say, "we have problems with immigration reform," immigration reform does not come to the floor. If the ACLU said, "Don't deal with insanity defense," it does not come to the floor. If the ACLU said, "Don't deal with bail reform," it does not come to the floor.

Now, those are genuine groups, those are sincere groups. The ACLU certainly has every right to be entitled to their own opinion. But I did not know that the American people elected the ACLU to determine what legislation should be considered in the area of crime. I think the American people ought to know that.

Mr. WALKER. Let me give the gentleman just another example. The ACLU and the National Education Association have jointly decided that the equal access bill that would allow religious organizations the same access to the public schools as political organizations or cultural oranizations or social organizations have, the NEA and the ACLU have decided that that legislation is in the bad interest of the American people, even though vast members of the American people would be for it. And so what did they do? Even though that bill was scheduled to be considered next Monday on the calendar, they prevailed upon the Democratic Caucus to pull it off, to have a meeting of the Democratic Caucus next Wednesday so that it could not be taken up next Monday, and thereby assure that the legislation that had been previously scheduled would be off the calendar for Monday. These same groups are impacting on the ability of children to have meetings in school that have a religious purpose as well as being able to have a meeting that has a political purpose.

It seems strange to me that the Young Communists League can meet in the schools and the Youth for Christ Organization cannot. That is precisely what is happening, because the people in the Democratic Caucus are listening to the NEA, a left wing organization, and the ACLU, another left wing organization.

Mr. LUNGREN. One of the real concerns I have about the equal access bill is that they might require it to have a very easy but closed off or hidden death, and that is send it to the Subcommittee on Civil and Constitutional Rights of the Judiciary Committee, a committee on which I am privileged to serve, a subcommittee on which I formerly served. Unfortunately, that has, in the words of Mr. HYDE from Illinois, become the Bermuda Triangle of legislation the American people are concerned about. You send it there and it is never seen again. It disappears off the legislative radar screen. and we have seen that on issue after issue. Virtually every constitutional amendment goes to that subcommittee and is never seen again.

There were announced to be hearings on the question of school prayer, as the gentleman will recall, it was announced that those hearings had been canceled because they polled the majority Members on that subcommittee and found out there was a lack of interest. That kind of makes you wonder where our priorities are and whether or not we are just going to give an opportunity, a simple opportunity for debate and consideration of some of these questions.

The question has to be raised. If this body does not accept the responsibility for dealing with these issues, where do the American people turn? I do not know where they turn, because this is the place that is established by the Constitution to ventilate those ideas, to have the vigorous debate that is necessary as opposed to the hidden-door trick that we happen to see prevailing more and more here with any issue that the majority of the American people apparently support.

Mr. WALKER. The gentleman makes an absolutely devastating case and he is absolutely right. What is happening is that behind closed doors deals are being cut which advantage the special interests and ignore the public interests, and that is an indictment of the legislative process which the American people cannot ignore this year.

I would like to switch gears here if I could, and talk about another matter that this Congress has tended to ignore, which we ignore at a great price to our Nation, because the recovery of our economy and the ability to put people to work is by far the greatest issue that we face now and for our future.

One of the issues that we have got to address as part of that is the whole issue of reform of our monetary system, and I yield to the gentleman from New York (Mr. KEMP).

Mr. KEMP. I thank my colleague for yielding, and I particularly appreciate his taking the floor today on behalf of an issue which has an overwhelming interest to all of the American people, irrespective of their political party. That is, what goes on behind closed doors.

Mr. Speaker, I was listening to the gentleman from my office and I walked over with some information that I wanted to share with he and our colleagues who are here because yesterday, in the Washington Post, there was an article, and let me say, parenthetically, it is interesting that the gentleman from Texas (Mr. PATMAN) is in the Speaker's chair today, because this is a bipartisan issue. I do not know if I am violating the rules of the House, but I just wanted to take a moment to pay tribute to the gentleman in the chair, as well as his daddy, who, for many years fought a battle to open to the American people the process within which the Federal Reserve Board uses to decide the value of our currency; what our interest rates are going to be; what the cost of money is; what the dollar is going to do; and a champion of democratizing the Fed was Mr. PATMAN of Texas, and now his son is here sitting in the chair, and while I apologize if I have violated the very strict rules of the House, I could not pass up the irony of some Republican Members of the Congress talking about an issue in front of a Democratic House which really affects all of the people.

Let me get to it: The Washington Post, as I said, revealed yesterday morning, in an article by John Berry that the Federal Reserve Board tightened monetary policy in late March in order to slow down what it considers to be a too-rapid growth of the economy.

Now, this was a quote of Mr. Frank Morris, the President of the Federal Reserve Bank in Boston. That has gone unnoticed by many of our colleagues. I am sure it did not escape the attention of our colleague from Texas, and it certainly did not escape the attention of my colleague from Pennsylvania and those who are here participating in this democratization of the Fed effort.

This morning Mr. Paul Blustein of the Wall Street Journal takes this further and says, not only did Mr. Morris of the Boston Fed reveal what the Fed had done in secret in late March, but he was chastised by another Governor of the Federal Reserve, Mr. Henry Wallach, who said it was an indiscretion.

Let me quote: "Fed Board members decline to comment on Mr. Morris' statements," but one quotation says, "I would only be compounding the indiscretion" said one Fed Governor, Henry Wallach.

Now, imagine a group of 11 men and 1 woman meeting in March, in secret, without any accountability, and not releasing the minutes of that meeting, changing the policy of the Fed to slow down the growth of the economy, and then one member apparently indiscreetly talks to some of his clients and suggests that the Fed has moved to slow down the economy and is called on the carpet by another member of the Board of Governors, and it has gone unnoticed except for these two articles: one in the Post and one in the Wall Street Journal.

Imagine if the Federal Reserve Board last March had loosened its policy to try to stimulate the economy. You would hear people all over the country, and I am going to depart from this bipartisanship for just a moment and say, incidentally, we have not heard much from our colleagues on the other side of the aisle, other than the gentleman from Texas, because frankly, no one seems to care that the Fed is tightening and raising interest rates and allowing the Federal funds rate to go up, which of course, affects the prime rate, and 30-day paper, and 90-day paper, and Government bonds, and it is all done in secret. That is the point the gentleman from Minnesota, the gentleman from Pennsylvania, the gentleman from Florida, and several of us made last April 11 when we introduced a bill to require that the Federal Reserve Board and the Federal Open Market Committee of the Fed release its minutes immediately so that the markets, the capital markets of this country, which some of us think was the eighth wonder of the world in terms of its efficiency to raise capital, and to provide oxygen to the farmers and the small businessmen and women and to the equity and venture capital markets of America. Our bill received scant attention, but I just want to say to my colleagues those lonely few Republicans and that one lonely Democrat who joined us in this bill, I think today it is obvious that what we are doing is on the right track.

I do not say that we have found the Holy Grail; that we have absolute truth at our fingertips; but I think we are on the right track. The Federal Reserve Board should simultaneously to any change in policy tell the American people precisely to offset the fact that rumors and gossip and innuendos and indiscretions and leaks are made.

Imagine now for a moment if you knew the Fed was going to tighten; you could sell bonds short; you could buy dollars; you could sell gold; you could intervene in foreign exchange markets; you could make a killing, in other words. Who gets the information? Some people sitting up in the 8th or 9th or 10th floor of a Wall Street building. But the American people, what about the American people? What about the worker in Buffalo, N.Y., who has to pay higher interest rates for the home mortgage? What about the small businessman or woman in Florida or in Pennsylvania? How about the farmers of Minnesota or Pennsylvania or western New York or wherever they are in this country.

It is unbelievable what has happened and I just want to say to my colleagues that we should redouble our efforts; we should bring to the attention of our colleagues in the Congress on both sides of the aisle this situation which leads to a bond market, I will not say collapse, but you cannot look at the bond market over the past few weeks and not recognize that it has been very sour. People say, so what? Of course, that is only the oxygen supply that provides much of the seed corn that goes to finance our economic growth.

What is worse, as I pointed out, the Fed now is on record as targeting nominal GNP, and the growth in the economy, apparently, in the first quarter. Nominal GNP was 11.5, 12 percent, and they do not want it to grow over 9 percent. So what they are saying is that the economy is not only growing too fast, they think inflation is caused by too many Americans going back to work. Imagine the thinking in an elitist Board of Governors of the Federal Reserve who are determining the course of the American and the world economy, simply because they are worried that growth causes inflation.

I just want to say to my colleagues as I close and allow for some dialog on this issue, we should press on; we should alert more and more people to what is happening; we should bring this to the attention of the press and the American people. If the American people have the information, they know, as the gentleman from Pennsylvania pointed out, how to make the right decisions, but, if it is all done in the dark at midnight, with those minutes not being released for 6 months, and rumors and gossip and innuendo driving our markets, it seems to me that it acts to the detriment of not only our districts, but to the whole United States, indeed, all our trading partners, and the whole world and profits a few and impoverishes the whole.

Mr. WALKER. Mr. Speaker, let me reclaim my time for a moment to point out the correctness of what the gentleman says.

The gentleman makes the point that at the end of March such a decision was made in secret; that in secret a small group of elitists got together and decided that they were going to slow down economic growth. Suppose that same decision had had to come in open session in the House of Representatives. Would any real Representative of the people have had the guts to stand up and say that one of the things we ought to do as a matter of national policy is slow down economic growth?

Very, very few votes would be cast on this House floor for that kind of policy, and because it would be done in the open and because we would be accountable. The problem with that is that it is neither accountable, and it is doing its unaccountable activities in secret.

So the gentleman is just absolutely correct in what he has to say.

Mr. KEMP. The point that the gentleman makes, if he would yield just another second, is that they did it in secret. I do not want to accuse them of being elitists, but it is certainly an attitude of elitism to suggest that they know what is better for the American people than the American people themselves.

Second, what bothers me is the secrecy point, I would say to my friend from Pennsylvania. They meet over 48 hours. They decide the value of money, the interest rates, 30-day and 90-day paper, and the Federal funds rate to a large degree. They determine all of these things. They determine what the cost of money is going to be in Argentina and in Sudan and in Moroco and other countries who are heavily indebted to the United States, and they turn around and say that no one can have any information about what they did for 6 weeks.

It really points up what we have been trying to say: that this information should be released simultaneously.

Mr. WALKER. I thank the gentleman.

Mr. WEBER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WALKER. I would be glad to yield to the gentleman from Minnesota.

Mr. WEBER. I thank the gentleman from Pennsylvania for yielding.

Mr. Speaker, I would like to commend both the gentleman from Pennsylvania and our colleague from New York for taking this issue on for such a long time.

What all this says to me, though, is to point out the tremendous confusion that exists about monetary policy at the highest levels of our Government.

When the two bills were introduced on April 11 by the gentleman from New York, with the cosponsorship of all of us on the floor and a number of others, the criticism that we heard from many quarters was, "Well, we cannot let the Congress get involved in monetary policy," as if there is this divinely inspired monetary policy out there and if we mere mortals get involved with it, somehow we are really going to screw things up.

It is time to say that the emperor has no clothes. We had one monetary policy during the 1970's, which was to target interest rates. In the view of the people who were running the Fed at that time, that led to high inflation.

So then in 1980 we switched to another monetary policy. Then we were going to strictly target monetary growth, and we fixed it to a set of aggregates and we were going to manage the money supply very precisely according to a Milton Friedmanesque view of monetary policy.

Then a couple years later, that was not working quite right, so we decided we were going to change the monetary aggregates, raise the level of growth of the money supply, so we made that change in policy.

Now, as the gentleman from New York has pointed out, we have initiated another basic change in Fed policy, and all those monetarists who say they do not want us to interfere with the Fed because they believe in controlling the money supply should not fool themselves. We are not controlling the money supply as the target of Fed policy any more.

Let me just quote from the Post article that the gentleman from New York referred to earlier.

> Morris said similar steps should be expected if current dollar Gross National Product continues to grow faster than the Fed's goal of between 8 percent and 9 percent for 1984.

On the other hand, if economic growth is "more sluggish," presumably a good thing, "you can expect the Fed to lean in the other direction."

That is an explicit change in policy away from targeting the monetary aggregates, whatever they may be, and that is another question, toward targeting GNP. Of course, we have to target GNP retroactively. So we have a basic, fundamental shift in monetary policy, actually the fourth monetary policy in as many years, which illustrates to me that there is tremendous confusion again at the highest levels of our Government and that we are long overdue for a basic debate and reformation of that whole policy.

Mr. WALKER. I thank the gentleman from Minnesota.

Mr. MACK. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WALKER. I would be glad to yield to the gentleman from Florida.

Mr. MACK. I thank the gentleman for yielding.

Mr. Speaker, I would just like to make a couple of additional comments related to the comments of our colleague from New York.

I have said this before, but just to put it in context, I came from the banking community before I came here, and I felt very strongly that there needs to be that separation between the private industry and also what is happening as far as public decisions made about monetary and fiscal policy.

Mr. WALKER. The gentleman was always suspect in the beginning.

Mr. MACK. I know, and you gentlemen keep an eye on me. I have noticed that, too.

It seems to me that what we have done, though, by having these behind-closed-doors discussions about what happens with monetary policy is that we have really taken monetary policy off the level of discussion. We have said it is off limits; that those kinds of discussions ought to be held behind closed doors.

So what do we do? We spend all of our time here in Congress talking about fiscal policy, how much we raise taxes, how much we lower taxes, how much should we spend, how much should we not spend. But when it comes to the real issue, and let us face it, the economics of what happens in this country are based on several things, one of which is monetary policy and the other of which is fiscal policy, but we never get into those discussions here.

So what has happened is, as the gentleman mentioned a few moments ago, the vote that took place behind closed doors never would have taken place on the floor of this House, but a great debate could have taken place and maybe we would have learned some things that we should be doing, that we, as legislators, people who make decisions about who gets jobs in this country, that type of thing, maybe that discussion should take place on the floor of this House, and I think that the way to see that it does happen is to open up the policy decision that much more.

Mr. WALKER. I thank the gentleman.

Mr. KEMP. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WALKER. I would be glad to yield to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. KEMP. I thank the gentleman for yielding.

Mr. Speaker, the gentlemen from Florida and Minnesota made real key contributions to our dialog here. None of us are suggesting that we telecast the Federal Open Market Committee meetings. We are not suggesting that the public and the press sit there and watch over their shoulders. No one is challenging the respect or the integrity or the independence of the central bank and the need to have a fiduciary role for that bank.

But what bothers us all is that, as the gentleman from Florida pointed out, they meet in secret, then the leaks go out, and decisions are being made around which some people are profiting that ultimately impoverish others. It seems to me that this is untenable in a democratic society.

Our bill would open up the process to the extent only that they would have to, within 24 hours, release the minutes if there is a change in policy. Article I, section 8, of the Constitution of the United States requires that the Congress be responsible for coining money and controlling the value thereof. The people have placed in the Congress the ultimate responsibility for the value of our money, and if the value of the money shifts daily and millions, if not billions, of dollars are speculated upon in markets around the world, notwithstanding what happens in Boston and Buffalo and New York and other places where the Federal Reserve has its regional centers, it seems to me that it is obvious that something has gone askew, notwithstanding the idea that the gentleman from Minnesota (Mr. WEBER) brought up that the Fed will tighten if the economy is sluggish and it will loosen if it is growing.

Imagine trying to manipulate the economy by printing money or extinguishing money, or buying bonds or selling bonds around a backward-looking market that is nominal GNP that you only know about once it has already happened.

How can people make a plan for the future? How can a young couple buy a home and have some confidence that the interest and the money that they have to invest in that mortgage is going to sustain the ability of that family to buy a home.

It is an outrage and the American people on both sides of the political fence ought to be rising up in righteous indignation and sending letters and postcards to their Congressmen and Congresswomen and telling us to do something along the lines of what KEMP and WALKER and WEBER and MACK and KASICH and PATMAN and others would like to do.

Mr. WALKER. Let me yield to the gentleman from Florida.

Mr. MACK. The point the gentleman just made, how can anyone make plans for the future if they do not know what is going to happen; but yet, you know, we just spent the last 4 months planning fiscal policy for the next 3 years and have to guess what monetary policy is going to be.

The second part of that is again suppose we had to have the other half of the debate here on the floor of the House. Let us suppose that we made a case about strong fiscal policy, maintaining tax levels, holding spending levels at a certain point, and we found out that the other side of the debate was, "My heavens, if you do that, we are going to reduce the money supply and we are going to do that by raising interest rates," what do you think the response on the floor of the House would be?

Again, I think we would have some meaningful dialog in trying to put together an economic policy.

Mr. KEMP. Imagine what would happen if the Fed had privately and secretively and surreptitiously eased, they would be accused to trying to help Ronald Reagan get reelected and influence the economy; but the Fed tightened to slow down the economy and not a word is being said in the editorial pages of the Post or the Times and other newspapers.

I will guarantee this. Had the Fed eased and accommodated the recovery and allowed for unemployment to continue to drop and the nominal GNP to continue to climb at 11 and 12 percent a year to bring down the deficit, does anybody doubt that the deficit would not come down if unemployment dropped to 6 and 5 or 4? Obviously it would; so no one said a word because they tightened. They do not mind, but I will tell you this, you and I are going to be talking about this day after day until we can get a monetary policy that will give the American people what they desperately need, a stable, sound, honest dollar, a dollar that maintains its value, a dollar that is predictable over time, that can bring down the risk premium and the high interest rates that are being charged borrowers by this policy of confusion and unpredictability.

I think the integrity of our dollar is the single most overriding economic issue at the moment and it is something that is causing not only a lot of pain and anguish in our Third World neighbor friends who have big debts, it is causing a lot of pain and anguish in my district of western New York among home buyers and small business people, farmers and entrepreneurs.

Mr. WALKER. Mr. Speaker, let me reclaim my time just for a moment to remind the gentleman that we do have Members of the opposition party who have been coming to the floor here in recent days, as a matter of fact just today we had at least one gentleman out on the floor talking about the fact that interest rates are going up and how the economic recovery is being aborted and so on. In other words, it has become a political heyday for the Democrats to suggest that somehow something is going wrong here. What is going wrong is that the Federal Reserve has tightened the monetary policy of the country.

Mr. KEMP. Absolutely. Will the gentleman yield for just a second?

Mr. WALKER. I would be glad to yield.

Mr. KEMP. The Federal funds rate, which is the targeted overnight cost of money by member banks of the Federal Reserve went from 8 and 8½ percent roughly during the 1983 growth period. It was 11 yesterday. It has gone from 8 to 9, to 10 and 11. What has happened to the prime rate? The prime rate has gone up a full point in about 90 days.

Now, what does that do? That raises the cost of debt service. If you keep interest rates at 12 percent, that will double the national debt every 6 years.

The deficit today in large part is a result of the credit crunch and the high interest rate policy of the Federal Reserve which shuts off housing and autos and agriculture and exports and is causing so much impoverishment of the Third World. I think it is an absolute issue for all of us to take consideration of.

Mr. KASICH. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WALKER. I yield to the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. KASICH. I wonder if the gentleman from New York could comment on something that he really brought before the Federal Reserve in his testimony several months ago. Not only do we have a problem when we talk about the Fed being shrouded in secrecy, but I think the gentleman brought the issue before the Fed that was important and something that needs to come out in the light for purposes of debate, and that is that at one point we have the Fed targeting M1 and excluding M2 and M3 and then you turn around and find out, well, they think they had better include everything. Then they turn around from that and they say, well, we had better target interest rates rather than targeting M1 and M2.

Does that not in the gentleman's opinion create problems in the capital marketplaces of this country? They are always complaining that they do not know what the Congress is going to do, and justifiably so.

On the other side of the question, is it not true that when the Fed has an inconsistent policy toward the way in which it is going to run its monetary train, that also creates great uncertainty within the capital markets. I wonder if the gentleman would respond to that.

Mr. KEMP. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WALKER. I am glad to yield.

Mr. KEMP. It is not just the inconsistency, although that is a problem. A consistently bad policy would be just as perverse as an inconsistent other policy, so I would rather the policy of giving us what we desperately need, stable prices, sound money and the type of low interest rates that we had under the Bretton Woods International Monetary System for almost the last half century, at least from World War II.

You know, I have been here 13 years. We have all been here different times, some very short times, others longer times. I am not an old veteran, but I have been here for more than a decade.

Mr. WALKER. The gentleman is getting there.

Mr. KEMP. Yes; I am starting to believe in the seniority system very strongly.

But I will say this. I really believe, my friends, that in all the time that I have been here, this has never happened. I have never seen anything like this.

I called one press person and he was laughing. He said, "Oh, that doesn't mean very much."

Imagine someone in the press suggesting that this can go on. If you or I held a meeting in secret that had this much impact on markets, capital markets and other markets, to be sure, they would be screaming and knocking down our doors. How can the press allow the Federal Reserve do this? We do not let an agency of the Federal Government get away with what we allow them.

You know, the fault is not with the press. The fault is right here in the U.S. Congress for allowing an agency that is a creature of the U.S. Congress to get away with it.

Now, I say to my colleagues, not the ones who are here and sitting in the chair, but I say to my colleagues who may read the RECORD, I do not think they are going to be allowed in this election to get away with the secrecy that shrouds or surrounds this issue. I think that is an issue of populism, if you will.

Mr. WALKER. The gentleman will remember when we tried to hold a somewhat secret meeting with regard to tax policies a couple years ago and the press jumped on that immediately and had TV cameras at the door by the time we left the meeting, because you know that is something that evidently they recognized has some impact and yet cannot understand the impact of secret meetings here which determine this.

Mr. KEMP. Let me say to my friend, I would like to make one last point just to get it on the record before we go any further.

The gentleman from Ohio raised a good point and I think it is one that the gentleman from Minnesota (Mr. WEBER) had brought up a little earlier, which is that from 1979, October, until about 1982, June, the Fed was targeting a very narrow definition of money. They call it M1. M1 basically is checking deposits and currency in circulation. It now includes super NOW accounts, but then it did not.

Then in 1982, I say to my friend, the gentleman from Ohio, they followed M1. From 1971 to 1979 they targeted interest rates. From 1982 until I would say probably the latter part of 1983 they were targeting a combination of interest rates, the economy, et cetera.

Now apparently they have changed again and they are targeting nominal GNP.

Now, what we are saying here today, we are not asking the Fed to print more money. I do not want the Fed to go down there and just buy bonds and inject reserves into the system and try to flood the markets with paper money and expand our credit supply and the reserve base of this country to force down interest rates. That is not what we are talking about. Each and every one of us on this floor believe in sound, honest money, in money that will maintain its value. So having said that, our bill, just to explain it a step further, requires that the Fed not loosen or tighten around a narrow target, such as M1 or a narrower target and a backward looking market, such as nominal GNP, or a Keynesian target, which would be interest rates. What we are calling for in our bill is for the Federal Reserve Board, as I said a little bit earlier, to give us what the purpose of monetary policy is, to provide a stable, honest unit of account, a dollar that will maintain its value over a long period of time and will not be inflated, that is, devalued or deflated, that is, strengthened. We want a dollar that is sound and stable. You measure that not by how many angels can dance on the head of M1. You measure that, I would say to my colleagues, by some price. What that is there is much debate over.

I personally believe that we should stabilize the dollar price of gold. I think when President Kennedy in 1962 said that we want to keep the dollar as good as gold, he said that was the linchpin of the national financial trading system, I think President Kennedy was right. I will tell you one thing, we had 4 and 5 percent interest rates.

But I do believe we have got to rebuild this international monetary system. We have to have a domestic monetary policy that gives us stable prices and the best gauge of stable prices is not how many dollars in M1 or M2 or M3 or L or any of the other partial equilibrium models. The only real index that you can use is those forward looking markets such as precious metals, commodity prices at the top, or future levels, and ultimately using gold as a proxy, as a proxy for the price level, and then buy and sell bonds, or inject and drain reserves on that type of a price rule. That is what we are talking about, price stability to give the American home buyer and the American working men and women, and the American entrepreneur, and our friends in the world that stability and confidence in the American dollar.

Mr. KASICH. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WALKER. I yield to the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. KASICH. I think what is so amazing, and I do not think anybody has a clear answer for what the appropriate monetary policy is, but we know this: at one point in time, and I wish the gentleman from New York would comment on this, at one point in time the Federal Reserve was setting monetary policy on the basis of M1's, which includes money in circulation and checking accounts.

If you took your money from a checking account on Monday and put your money in a super NOW account on Tuesday, in the eyes of the Fed we had a shrinkage in the monetary supply. If you turned around on Thursday and took your money out of a super NOW account and put it in a checking account, then in the eyes of the Fed the money supply would grow tremendously.

Now, does that really have an impact on the proper way to gauge it?

Mr. KEMP. The gentleman has raised the fundamental problem with measuring monetary policy. I think that the bills which several of my colleagues have joined in offering provide a first step toward a solution.

So that the Members may have an opportunity to study some of the ideas which we have put forward in these bills and so that these ideas may be correctly associated with my 23 cosponsors, I include the text of a "Dear Colleague" letter which we circulated by inserting it in the RECORD at this point:

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
Washington, D.C., April 10, 1984.

DEAR COLLEAGUE: Recent events, including the rise in the discount rate and the prime rate, have thrown the spotlight upon the adequacy of two aspects of Federal Reserve policy—the policy itself, and how it is determined.

We are seeking your cosponsorship and support for two bills which address these concerns. The first bill is designed to make Federal Reserve decisions more open to the public, irrespective of their content. The second bill is designed to restore long-term price stability as the goal and target of Federal Reserve policy, with the object of bringing down interest rates.

PROCESS

When the Federal Reserve System was established in 1913, the discretion of its executives was limited, both by its charter and by the system within which it operated. Over the years, both of these constraints were first weakened and then removed. Yet the Federal Reserve continues to formulate monetary policy under conditions of relative secrecy and lack of accountability to the public which have long since become obsolete.

There is a manifest need to allow the markets and the American people more—and more timely—information about policy decisions affecting them. Today there is not even any legislative requirement for the policymaking Federal Open Market Committee's minutes or decisions to be publicized, although it has become customary for the Committee to release a summary after waiting one or two months.

Recently, this delay has engendered extreme uncertainty in the world's stock, bond, commodity, and currency markets, as they have reacted to each rumor or perception of monetary policy changes. It is axiomatic that the efficiency of markets depends on the degree of accurate information which is available. The recent uncertainty over Fed policy has undoubtedly damaged the stability which is necessary for economic and investment decisions. This benefits no one but those who trade upon rumor and real or imagined inside information. The continuation of Fed secrecy under these circumstances is an anachronism.

All agencies of government have undergone similar democratic reforms in the last ten or fifteen years. Disclosure naturally tends to be resisted by those within the institutions themselves. But "sunshine" and freedom of information measures have been applied to countless other agencies, with positive effect. Clearly, it is a positive benefit where no overriding national security interest is involved. The time has come for the United States' central bank to participate in this general openness. Its decisions are too important to be withheld from the knowledge of the American people.

We also believe that the responsiveness of policymaking can be improved by other measures. Our first bill, The Federal Reserve Reform Act of 1984, proposes the following changes:

First, the four-year term of the Chairman of the System shall begin in February of the calendar year after the President's term begins. This provision is supported by Chairman Paul Volcker and by the Administration.

Second, the Secretary of the Treasury shall be made an ex officio member of the Federal Open Market Committee, as he was for many years. Thus, the Administration could no longer disclaim responsibility for monetary policy in which it had no part.

Third, the terms of the Governors of the System shall be reduced from 14 to seven years—which is still longer than the term of a U.S. President, Senator, or Congressman.

Fourth, the Open Market Committee shall publicly announce all policy decisions on the day on which they are adopted.

These measures would modernize the Federal Reserve, bringing its practice of decision making to the threshold of the twenty-first century.

POLICY

Just as important as the way in which policy is made is the effectiveness of the policy itself. Much of the current uncertainty over Federal Reserve policy reflects the unlimited discretion of the Federal Open Market Committee, and the absence of any established rule for guiding its policy.

This is partly a failure of the law. Surprisingly, the legislation authorizing the Federal Reserve contains no direction stating that the integrity of our currency should be the central bank's primary goal. Our second bill, the Balanced Monetary Policy and Price Stability Act of 1984, corrects this omission by instructing the Federal Reserve to make long-term price stability its overriding objective, which would avoid inflationary as well as deflationary swings in prices.

Also, in the absence of a firm monetary standard like the precious metals, the Fed needs stricter guidelines for its discretion in setting intermediate policy. Accordingly, our second bill would direct the Fed to abandon its on-again, off-again policy of "targeting" measures of the money supply which are constantly being shifted, changed, and redefined. Nor would it be permitted to "peg" interest rates, as it did for many years, without reference to its overriding objective of price stability.

If the central bank's objective is price stability, we believe it should actually target some proxy for the general price level. Our second bill directs the Fed to devise a price index for this purpose; to set a target range for the index; and to conduct its policy according to this target. No other guide can possibly determine whether monetary policy is too loose (inflationary) or too tight (deflationary).

Specifically, this second bill does the following:

It states clearly for the first time that the overriding goal of Federal Reserve is the integrity of the dollar, which necessarily means long-term price stability. The central bank directed to aim for strong economic growth, low interest rates, and stable exchange rates, in so far as this policy is consistent with long-term price stability.

As an intermediate target for conducting this policy, the Treasury Secretary and the Fed Chairman shall devise an index of prices for use as its intermediate monetary target. The index shall contain one or more commodities, chosen for their sensitivity to long-term trends rather than transitory or cyclical price movements. Once established, a decline of the index below its target range shall signal the central bank to ease its monetary policy, while a rise in the index above its target range shall signal a need to tighten.

The Secretary of the Treasury is directed to seek the establishment of an advisory task force and an international conference, made up of our major trading partners. The purpose of the task force and the conference would be to consider reforms of the international monetary system which would result in greater world wide price stability, more stable exchange rates, and a liberal trading system. It would lay the foundation for making honest money the foundation of a sound international economy.

If the policy outlined above had been in place, in all probability it would have prevented the wild swings in prices, interest rates, world monetary reserves, exchange rates, and economic growth during the past dozen years. In particular, it would have prevented the wild and inflationary fall of the dollar of the late 1970s and the debilitating rise since 1980 which has hurt U.S. industries relying on exports or competing with foreign imports. We believe interest rates would be lower today.

These monetary reforms are long overdue, and we urge you to support them. Please contact Mac Carey at x55265 if you have any further questions, or if would like to be an original cosponsor of either or both of these measures.

Sincerely yours,

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from Pennsylvania (Mr. WALKER) has expired.

MONETARY POLICY

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under a previous order of the House, the gentleman from Minnesota (Mr. WEBER) is recognized for 60 minutes.

Mr. WEBER. I yield to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. KEMP. The gentleman from Ohio has raised an interesting issue which is how do you measure the money supply.

First of all, you have raised a very important point. If it is cash and checking deposits, what happens if you go into a super NOW account, what happens if you put it in a money market deposit account? There are money market deposit accounts that are cash money market deposit accounts, there are money market deposit accounts that might be savings. How does the Fed determine what is M1 or M2?

Let me ask you another question rhetorically. We have a banker on the floor of the House from Florida. He can perhaps inform us. This is the ultimate rhetorical question to our friends who just want to measure monetary policy by the money aggregates.

What is the money supply of Washington, D.C.? What is the money supply of Sarasota, Fla? What is the money supply of Columbus, Ohio? What is the money supply of the United States?

You cannot measure, I would say to my friend from Ohio, you cannot measure the supply of money because you do not know what the demand for money is. You do not know what our friends are doing with their money. You do not know what our wives are doing and what is the lag. Some say 6 months, some say a year.

Incidentally, money is fungible. It comes across borders. It electronically shifts across borders. We do not live in a partial economy. We live in a global economy and you must measure monetary policy by what happens to prices. And if prices are rising, that is inflation and they should be tightening. If prices are falling, that is deflationary and we should be easing, and we should buy and sell bonds around the best proxy for prices, which is not the Consumer Price Index, it is not the Wholesale Price Index; it is not M1.

The best price index, frankly, and I know I am probably going further than some of my colleagues would go at this point, but I think the best proxy for prices is what is happening to gold.

But imagine this morning if you knew that the Fed had tightened and no one else knew it. What would you do with your gold? You would sell gold and buy, you might buy something, you might buy dollars. You would take a non-interest-bearing asset and buy an interest-bearing asset.

Conversely, if prices are rising, people will sell their interest-bearing assets and buy a precious metal and they will speculate in gold.

Mr. WEBER. If I can reclaim my time a minute, because I want to accentuate a point the gentleman from New York touched on but did not elaborate, as difficult as it is to define the money supply, and I think that is impossible, as the gentleman pointed out, it is far more difficult to begin to measure aggregate demand for money in that we are in an international marketplace, because all the decisions the gentleman is talking about are now made on an international basis. People in Tokyo decide if they are going to buy things in the New York marketplace, so when you try to measure demand for money, even if you could do that in this country, you would not even be beginning to scratch the surface.

Mr. KEMP. Velocity is a commonly recognized measure of the demand for money. But, unfortunately, measuring the velocity of money, that is a backward-looking indicator. The gentleman from Minnesota pointed out that nominal GNP was a backward-looking market and so is velocity. You do not tell what happens to velocity and nominal GNP until after it has happened, so what does the Fed do.

We are operating on Paul Volcker's personal standard. We do not have a gold standard. We do not have a standard. There is no measure and there is no guideline. There is no rule. There is no intellectual guideline around which anybody can make a decision about the future of the dollar.

You have to wait for the gossip and the leaks.

It seems to me that we have two obligations to the American people. A, we have an obligation to allow all of the American people to be let in on what the Fed is doing within 24 hours of their changing policy; and B, we have an obligation to the American people to give them a sound monetary policy which will keep interest rates at their historically average level, whatever that may be. I think it is single digit. It is much closer to single digit than it is to double digit.

The way to do that is to stabilize the price level around some forward-looking economic index. And I would hope that we have started at least raising the consciousness of some of our colleagues about this very important issue facing all of us in the Congress.

Mr. WEBER. Let me reclaim my time.

Mr. KASICH. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WEBER. I yield to the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. KASICH. I would like to commend the gentleman from New York particularly on what he just said, and that is for far too long we have concentrated exclusively on fiscal policy without paying any attention to the monetary policies that are conducted in the country. And while the American public has only been faced with the issue of fiscal policy, and most people in this Chamber in my judgment are only concerned about the issue of fiscal policy, to ignore monetary policy is like trying to peddle a bicycle with only one peddle. They have to work in sync. If you have an irregular, inconsistent monetary policy, but the greatest fiscal policy in the world, you are still going to have severe problems within your economy.

What is essential is for the American people and the press, which I think the gentleman from New York has perhaps awakened the sleeping giant, for the press and the public to start asking the question about what is this powerful body, one of the most powerful bodies that exists in the world today, the Federal Reserve, which is shrouded in secrecy, which at least at best has inconsistent monetary policy within the period of the last 4 or 5 years. We need to be in debate on this. We need to be discussing what is appropriate monetary policy.

Is JACK KEMP right? Is CONNIE MACK right? Is VIN WEBER right? Is JIM WRIGHT or TIP O'NEILL right? Who is right? We have to start discussing this, because up until now we have had no discussions on really what monetary policy is all about and what the Fed has been all about. All of the discussion, most of the people within the national newspapers or the magazines or radio or on TV, except for an occasional appearance by Mr. KEMP on the "McNeill-Lehrer Report," is to focus exclusively on fiscal policy. If we do that, the American people suffer and the people in my district suffer, and the people in Youngstown suffer. The people across this country suffer because we do not have the kind of policy that can help us solve this severe economic problem that we seem to come in and go out of.

So I guess that I think the bill is excellent. I was an original cosponsor. Let us end the secrecy and let us continue the debate, and hopefully putting good minds together we will come up with a policy that makes sense, that will ultimately help the American people.

But please let us not just concentrate exclusively on fiscal policy because we are missing a large part of the ball game. I appreciate the gentleman yielding.

Mr. WEBER. I thank the gentleman for his comments. I would like to turn to a little different aspect of this whole debate, but it relates very much to what the gentleman from Ohio just said. We focus in this body almost exclusively on fiscal policy, when it comes to talking about interest rates we focus almost exclusively on the deficit.

I have a pretty good conservative record, as does the gentleman from Ohio who just spoke, the gentleman from New York and everybody else participating in this debate. But in my district which is a rural, agricultural district, the interest rate situation is literally life threatening right now to a lot of small businessmen and family farmers.

So I have come to the conclusion that we need to look a little more closely at what exactly is the cause of the high-interest rates crippling certain sectors of our economy.

I yield to my colleague.

Mr. KEMP. I appreciate the comments. I also appreciate the gentleman's hospitality, giving up so much of his precious time, particularly on television, to allow for this discussion. But imagine for a moment, seriously for just a moment, imagine what the deficit would be if interest rates were at 6 percent.

What do you think would happen in housing and autos and agriculture and to small business opportunities? And we have all been pleased about the fact that in 1983 there were 4.5 million new jobs created. Imagine what this economy could do? Talk about a sleeping giant, the sleeping giant is the free enterprise American system.

If we had the historical level of interest rate, 6, 7, 8 percent; I think $125 billion of this deficit is clearly associated with the unemployment that has been the result of an artifically high interest rate policy prescribed for the American economy for almost 3½ years.

It is time to give the American people what they desperately need; not only honest money but a level of interest rates that will allow for this great economy to move to ever-higher levels of output and growth and production and savings and capital formation.

I thank the gentleman.

Mr. WEBER. Let me reclaim my time.

I want to go through a few statistics, a little analysis. As I stated the point we keep debating around here, is the impact on interst rates. The theory is they are crowding out; when the Federal Government has to borrow a certain amount of money it is in competition with private borrowers; that competition increases demand for money and that pushes up the price of money and interest rates.

There is of course something to that theory. But it is worth pointing out that Federal Government borrowing of course is not the only kind of government borrowing that crowds out private borrowing, crowds out savings. State and local governments as well crowd out private savings.

So we really should be talking about total government borrowing.

In that context, I would like to enter into the RECORD the following statistics from the U.S. Chamber of Commerce's current publication "Economic Outlook," in a column by the chief economist for the U.S. Chamber of Commerce, Richard Rahn.

Quoting from this article, Mr. Rahn says:

> Many politicians and commentators continue to pound away with the assertion that we are running $200 billion deficits. If the assertion were true, and if it were not used as an excuse to justify destructive tax increases, no harm would be done. However, the fact is the $200 billion number is mythical. It is mythical in that it does not conform with accepted accounting practices. Also, the federal deficit number is of limited relevance because it is only part of the total government deficit or surplus.
> Currently, state and local governments are running a surplus estimated to be approximately $68 billion for 1984, and much of this surplus results from a transfer of monies from the federal government to state and local governments. Hence, the total deficit from all levels of government is a much more meaningful number.

Adding federal spending of approximately $913 billion to state and local government spending of about $464 billion on a calendar year basis, gives a total of $1.377 trillion. Expected tax receipts at the federal level are $724 billion, and state and local governments are expected to bring in some $532 billion. Total anticipated tax revenue, then, is $1.256 trillion.

Subtracting total revenues from total spending yields an aggregate projected budget deficit for all government of $121 billion. This is equivalent to 3.5 percent of GNP, down from 5.5 percent of GNP in 1983.

The deficit number for all government spending is more meaningful if we distinguish between government spending on long-lived assets, or capital spending, and current expense items. Such a distinction is made by all businesses. If a business buys a new building or durable machine, the cost would be recorded as an asset in the capital account. Capital spending is capitalized and depreciated over the useful life of the building, machine or automobile. Paper clips and employee wages would be recorded as expenses.

Similar distinctions between capital and expense outlays can be made when looking at government spending at the federal, state and local levels. The bulk of government spending is in the form of transfer payments to individuals, and these items should be expensed just as a private firm would expense wages and salaries. Government at all levels also spends money on capital goods, such as automobiles, with three year useful lives, aircraft carriers, with 30 year lives, and bridges and dams which may have useful lives beyond 50 years.

The point of this discussion is merely to illustrate that if government used appropriate accounting standards, the deficit numbers would appear very different. In fact, if sinking funds, for the presently unfunded or underfunded federal retirement system, Social Security system, Medicare, and so forth, were established (as private business is required to do), the situation would have appeared to be much worse for many years.

Reviewing past reports of the Council of Economic Advisors or the projections of the Congressional Budget Office reveals that budget deficit projections, even for the current year, are notoriously inaccurate. Hence, to develop policy on the basis of mythical numbers that cannot be forecast with reasonable certainty can only be characterized as foolhardy.

The current discussion in the media, and emanating from politicians, concerning the deficit tends to confuse the real problems facing our economy with their symptoms. Economists and political leaders should learn from the medical profession that one must treat the disease, not the symptom. The widespread failure of many politicians, commentators, and even some businessmen to understand the real reason deficits are undesirable is seen in the counterproductive solutions they advocate for the deficit problem.

If one assumes that the major goal of economic policy should be to increase real per capita income for all of our citizens, then it follows that we need to increase our rate of productive savings and investment for capital formation. Increasing productivity is the key to increasing the standard of living, and the single most important factor to increasing productivity is to add to the productive capital that each worker utilizes. Thus, if the deficit absorbs a major share of our national savings which would otherwise go to productivity and capital formation, real economic growth is reduced. In additon, deficits themselves, while symptomatic of the Congress' inability to control the growth of spending, do present several problems in and of themselves.

First, mounting deficits increase the interest payment expense of the federal budget. Already, payment of interest on the existing national debt is roughly $108 billion per year. It is the third largest budget item after national defense and Social Security. This problem could be partially alleviated by issuing inflation-indexed or gold-backed government bonds. Such bonds could reduce total interest charges substantially by reducing the interest rates demanded by holders of the bonds.

Second, as discussed above, large amounts of government borrowing is believed to "crowd out" private borrowing by individuals and businesses. This reduces the capital available to business and individuals, or at least raises the cost of capital to them.

There are two possible solutions to the problem of "crowding out." First, reduce the deficits themselves by cutting the growth rate of the government spending. Or second, increase the total stock of saving available to both government and private borrowers. Assuming that the Congress is unwilling to address the question of serious budget restraint in the near future, as now seems likely, the question becomes, how can we increase the savings pool available to borrowers?

The Economic Recovery Tax Act of 1981 (ERTA) provides one example. By increasing the depreciation allowances and cutting the marginal tax rates facing businesses, the internal cash flow of corporations has increased and now finances over 97% of corporate capital outlays. This is up from only 85% during the 10 years prior to the Economic Recovery Tax Act. Thus, lower corporate taxes reduces the borrowing demands of American business and thereby reduces the "crowding out" of government borrowing. Conversely, if the advice of some politicians is followed to raise corporate taxes, then, we would see the problem of crowding out increase.

For individuals, the same analysis holds true. Since individuals tend to consume at constant rates over short periods of time, higher tax rates will simply reduce individual savings and investment and thus exacerbate the problems posed by budget deficits.

As was true with business, ERTA phased in lower marginal tax rates for individuals allowing them to finance more of their capital needs out of their own increased savings. It is worth noting that the tremendous increase in the value of individual stock holdings due to the bull market has greatly increased wealth and, therefore the effective savings of individuals.

Thus if we are to seriously address the problem of deficit spending, we have no choice but to slow the growth rate of all government spending—federal, state and local—and at the same time reduce, not increase, the tax bias against productive savings and investment.

Now the point that I want to make here is that we are all presuming that reducing the Federal budget deficit will bring down interest rates. That is the sole focus of discussion and activity in the Congress of the United States. I think deficits are important; I think we should get deficits down. But Mr. Volcker came and testified before a committee of the Congress that if there were a $50 billion reduction in the Federal deficit, it would result in his judgment in a one point decline in the prime rate of interest.

We have in that period of time seen more than a $30 billion reduction in the projected Federal deficit and far more than that if you count in State and local governments as well and what has happened to interest rates? They have gone up.

Now I think that when we start talking about deficits and focus on deficits as a key to lowering interest rates, we are very much in the position of the man who lost his wallet in the alley but looked for it under the streetlight, because the light was better. We do not want to talk about monetary policy because it is difficult and complex.

But there is zero evidence based on the experience of the last 12 to 18 months to suggest that further reductions in the deficits alone will solve our interest rate problem.

I yield to the gentleman from Florida.

Mr. MACK. Mr. Speaker, I wanted to comment relating to our colleague from New York about what would happen or just what would happen if we had a 6-percent interest rate today and how it would affect housing and auto sales and jobs and the things related to that?

Also, do you know what would happen to the Federal budget deficit if you dropped interest rates to 6 percent in a 5-year period which is the period of time that we use around here to judge policy amd make decisions? You would reduce the deficits during that period of time by $296 billion, that one factor alone.

Mr. KEMP. Over 5 years?

Mr. MACK. Over 5 years.

Mr. WEBER. Is it not ironic in view of this, the only thing that has happened to reduce the deficit, the only thing has been economic growth. And the Fed policy now is specifically to slow down economic growth which has been the only thing we have done to reduce the deficit.

I yield to my colleague from Florida.

Mr. MACK. One more point, because again you have hit on the other thing. Everyone wants to run around here and either increase taxes or reduce spending to solve the problem. What we just said was a 3-percent drop in interest rates is $296 billion. A 1-percent higher level of real economic growth over that same period of time reduces deficits further by approximately $394 billion. That is $650 billion.

Mr. WEBER. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. KEMP. I thank the gentleman.

I spoke to the gentleman from Florida's experience visiting here this week; bunch of fresh-faced high school students from his district in Florida, the salt of the Earth, sweet, idealistic, young high school students from Florida visiting. They really owe their Congressman a great deal of gratitude for his effort to put together an interesting program.

He did not just have me; he had all sorts of Members, he brought them over, allowing them to look at different processes and watch the Congress in action, listen to great minds like—well, I will not mention some of the great minds.

But I kept saying to them: The answer to the deficit is to put this country back to work. At full employment what would the deficit be? It would be at least $140 to $150 billion lower than it is today. And one of the young students, I would say to my friend from Florida, said, "Gee, that sounds so compassionate, that sounds so"—I think he was about ready to say biblical, and I do not mean to put it in that term, but is it not much more compassionate to look at the people on this deficit issue as an economic growth issue? That is why the gentleman from Minnesota touched a very responsive chord in my heart because I am comvinced that our political and intellectual capital should be aimed at continuing the economic recovery, should be continuing at high levels of productivity, the rate of increase in the gross national product, the rate of new business formations that provided 4.5 million new jobs in the last 16 months; we talked about it before but more jobs in America in the last 1½ years than in Europe in the last 10 or 12 years.

The gentleman from Minnesota put his finger on the key issue of this deficit mania. With interest rates at normal, historical, single digit levels, the housing and auto and agricultural, think of exports.

The gentleman from Georgia, who is walking around the Chambers right now, Mr. GINGRICH, pointed out the other day that 1-percent increase in the prime rate, the 1-percent increase in the prime rate cost Argentina more money in debt service than the total bridge loan of $300 million that they were negotiating with the U.S. Government to help provide them some maneuvering room with the International Monetary Fund.

□ 1840

I was in Panama giving a speech recently to the Central American Exposition for 1984 and the Finance Minister, on the very day that the prime rate went up one-half point, told me that that one-half point increase in the prime rate wiped out the total security assistance to the Government of Panama for 1 year.

Imagine Brazil and Sudan and Morocco, the Dominican Republic, Jamaica, all of our friends are impoverished because monetary policy in the United States is causing so much pain and hardship, notwithstanding what it is doing to the U.S. deficit.

So this is an issue of overriding national and international concern and I just want to say how much I appreciate my colleagues' interest, A and B, I appreciate the fact that it is interesting that there are some younger Members of the Congress talking today about not just these domestic issues, but what is happening to the world, because I think this is causing—we can really help our allies and our friends around the world, help our balance of payments, help our exports, and help other countries grow again, from Africa and Central America, if we could put in order the monetary stability that we enjoyed in 1946, after the war, until about 1971 before we just totally abolished the whole international monetary system, that was called the Bretton Woods system, and devalued the dollar and suspended the convertibility of the dollar from gold and went off on this track, that we could follow a zero sum policy in order to boost our exports by devaluing the U.S. dollar.

I want to again thank the Members and look forward to working with you and other Members of Congress to bring some sanity to the Federal Reserve policy and the monetary policy, to bring back to the American people what they desperately need, sound, honest stable money, low interest rates, a growing economy, and move us toward that full employment without inflation, which I think is not a dream, although some people think it is. I think it is a policy. I think it is a goal that we should have as Members of Congress. I think it should be a bipartisan goal.

Think of the budget. The budget would be an equilibrium if the economy was in equilibrium, if monetary and fiscal policy were pursuing full employment and price stability, there would be no debate over the deficit. That is really what we should be giving the American people, full employment, honest money, low-interest rates, price stability.

There are other problems, to be sure. But I will tell you what, we go a long way toward reducing some of even our social problems if we could give the American family a belief once again in the long run future of our policies that were in the best interest of all people becoming what God meant them to be.

Mr. WEBER. I thank the gentleman from New York for his contribution.

I just will make a comment in terms of the international ramifications of this. It is interesting that we just concluded, prior to the beginning of this debate on monetary policy, about 40 minutes of discussion on the immigration problem. Our colleague from Pennsylvania (Mr. WALKER) and our colleague from California (Mr. LUNGREN) spent a good deal of time discussing the failure of the House of Representatives to enact immigration reform legislation.

The immigration problem, of course, is a growing one. But the immigration problem is directly related to the issue we are discussing right now which is monetary policy.

It is estimated that between now and the year 2000 in Mexico, given normal rates of growth, there will be 7 million Mexicans added to the unemployment rolls. Now that means there is going to be increased pressure on those people to come into this country, legally or illegally, and ultimately there is no set of immigration laws alone that can solve that problem, only rapid economic growth will provide those people with some hope and some opportunity in their homeland is going to solve that problem.

This is genuinely an issue that affects most other issues.

Mr. MACK. If the gentleman will yield, I just want to expand on that point. The impact of higher interest rates, as the gentleman knows we went through quite a debate last year about the role of the International Monetary Fund and the conditionality that they place on countries in trying to work out their financial problems, it is interesting that just a single change in interest rates as to how that affects their balance of payments and how it affects their relationships with the International Monetary Fund and how it forces them to carry out such negative policies that affect the people of their countries to the point that it ferments revolution, which drives people to the United States and worsens the immigration problem.

As the gentleman from New York (Mr. KEMP) said there are other problems that we do need to talk about, but it is interesting how much revolves around the question of economics, the question of fiscal policy, the question of monetary policy.

So it is not just for those of us here in the United States that this affects, it affects our friends abroad. Again, I think we need to force the debate on monetary policy.

Mr. WEBER. I thank the gentleman from Florida for his comments.

I want to conclude here just by thanking all the Members who have participated in this debate on monetary policy, which is the first real debate on monetary policy that I can remember in the House of Representatives in the short time that I have been here.

I would issue a challenge to our colleagues, on both sides of the aisle, to enter this debate. One of the things that strikes me is that we see all of this emotional highly charged rhetoric about fiscal policy. Our friends on the Democratic side of the aisle beat up on the President constantly over what they call the unfairness of his policies.

I would just say to friends on the Democratic side of the aisle, the ultimate unfairness is to endorse a policy that lets a small group of people meet behind close doors and dictate the course of the American economy to the disadvantage of working people, small businessmen and farmers. That is exactly what the monetary policy of our country is today, the policy that was again enunciated by the Federal Reserve fairly recently is worth reviewing.

Mr. Moore said, as I quoted earlier, in the Washington Post: "Similar steps should be expected if current dollar gross national product continues to grow faster than the Fed's goal of between 8 and 9 percent for 1984. Current dollar GNP rose at 12.8 percent rate in the first quarter."

What that means, after you cut through all the economic jargon, is very simply this: The Federal Reserve is now deciding behind closed doors that the economy is too healthy, too strong, they are going to have to bankrupt a few people, throw a few people out of work in order to get it slowed down.

That is a policy that is endorsed by those in this chamber who refuse to discuss monetary policy and put all the burden on fiscal policy.

I think to the extent that they are unwilling to discuss monetary policy they are endorsing high interest rates, they are endorsing higher unemployment, they are endorsing bankruptcies in small business and agriculture, and that is the ultimate unfair policy.

So I challenge my colleagues again on both sides of the aisle to enter the economic policy debate on monetary policy that we have initiated tonight.

NICARAGUAN WOMEN'S SIGNATURE BOOK

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. PATMAN). Under a previous order of the House, the gentleman from Georgia (Mr. GINGRICH) is recognized for 60 minutes.

Mr. GINGRICH. Mr. Speaker, I rise this evening I guess with as much sadness as I have ever had talking in this House.

This evening it was brought to my attention that in the Speaker's lobby was a book with a sign that said, "Nicaraguan Women's Signature Book." I looked at this book. This book is purely and simply Communist propaganda. It is propaganda by the Marxist dictatorship in Nicaragua, it is propaganda aimed against the United States of America, and I find it incredible that the House of Representatives and the Speaker of the House of Representatives could have permitted this book to have been placed in the Speaker's lobby as propaganda against the United States.

Mr. WALKER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GINGRICH. I yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. WALKER. Where did the gentleman say he found it?

Mr. GINGRICH. It was in the Speaker's lobby, which is the area right behind us, the area that the press normally uses, the area directly off the House floor. It was, in fact, sitting on a table backed up against the House Chamber. It is where most Members walk by, it is where all of the national press that covers the House walks to interview Members of the Congress.

As I look at it and read the English translation on the front piece, it is unbelievable.

Let me read one thing which I did not understand the other night. I have talked several nights about a very important pastoral letter and reconciliation from the Nicaragua bishops, the Easter letter, by the Catholic bishops in Nicaragua, and there was a paragraph I did not understand.

They said and I quote, and I am quoting the Catholic bishops of Nicaragua:

> The suffering of mothers who have lost their children which should merit our great respect is instead exploited to incite hatred and feed the desire for vengence.

□ 1850

I was not sure that what the Catholic bishops were referring to. And now I see a document, which is clearly an example of what they were talking about, this document called The Year of the United Front Against the Aggression, written by a group who describes themselves as the Committee of the Mothers of Heroes and Martyrs, is, in fact, straight old-fashioned Communist propaganda.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Will the gentleman yield to the Chair?

Mr. GINGRICH. Yes.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Does the gentleman have knowledge as to who placed the book or the sign in the Speaker's lobby?

Mr. GINGRICH. All I can say to the Chair is that we checked through our staff, and our staff was informed that the Speaker's office permitted it, gave permission for it to be placed there. That is all I can tell the Chair at this time.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. I thank the gentleman.

Mr. GINGRICH. But I appreciate the Chair's inquiry. I share the same perplexity that the Chair does.

I want to read several passages from this because it is incredible, it is the grossest distortion, the most explicit lies, and yet it was in the Speaker's lobby in the House.

It says:

> Since the triumph of our popular Sandinista revolution and during this period, we have worked in the building of grassroots democratic organizations which have permitted the wide participation of the various sectors of the country.

That sentence is a lie. There is no other word for it except that it is a lie. It is deliberate propaganda, and I will presently introduce into the RECORD evidence that it is a lie. And to have that kind of deliberate Communist lie in the Speaker's lobby is beyond me.

Mr. MACK. That last comment, the last paragraph, the last sentence that the gentleman read——

Mr. GINGRICH. The paragraph says this:

> More than 2 years have gone by since the triumph of our popular Sandinista revolution, and during this period we have worked in the building of grassroots democratic organizations which have permitted the wide participation of the various sectors of the country.

Now, anyone who has talked to any of the freedom fighters, anyone who has talked to anyone who has been down there and looked at the country will tell you that it is increasingly a Cuban and Soviet dominated colony, that it is increasingly a police state, that there is increasing censorship, that in fact there is no possibility at all that that sentence is true, and yet that sentence in the book that contains it is sitting right out here to propagandize congressmen and to propagandize members of the news media.

It says here, and I quote:

> The new government has provided a special interest in the hope of the future, the infants, by supporting laws which, being the laws of popular concern, come to benefit in the first instance the condition of the children. Such is the case of the recently approved law of relations between mothers, fathers and children.

That is what the Communist propaganda says. However, that is not what we hear from the Catholic bishops, because the Catholic bishops have a very different approach to this.

The Catholic bishops say, for example, in terms of freedom and in terms of what is happening:

> Considering that freedom of speech is a vital part of the dignity of the human being and as such is indispensable to the well being of the nation inasmuch as a country progresses only when there is freedom to generate new ideas, the right to free expression of one's ideas must be recognized.

In other words, they are talking very directly about the problems that they face in dealing with a government which stops freedom of speech.

They also talk in here, in the letter of Easter from the Catholic bishops in Nicaragua, about the way in which the current Communist government is an-tifamily and is antichildren. Quoting from the Catholic bishops:

A materialistic and atheistic educational system is undermining the consciences of our children. Many families are divided by political differences.

They went on to say, and I quote from the Catholic bishops:

Farm workers and Indians for whom the church reserves a special love are suffering, living in constant anxiety, and many of them are forced to abandon their homes in search of a peace and tranquility that they do not find.

Now, do we have out here a large sign from the Catholic bishops? No. Do we have out here any indication of what the Catholic bishops have said about this situation? No. What we have instead is pure, plain, old-fashioned Communist propaganda.

Mr. WEAVER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GINGRICH. I will be glad to yield.

Mr. WEAVER. I was wondering, the gentleman mentioned a book that he had?

Mr. GINGRICH. Yes.

Mr. WEAVER. Is this book of unknown authorship?

Mr. GINGRICH. Yes; I would be delighted to answer the gentleman. This book is a book—it is sitting right here, and I will be glad to share it with the gentleman—which had a sign over it, sitting in the Speaker's lobby, entitled, "Nicaraguan Women's Signature Book." And this book is in Spanish but it has an English translation as part of the book, entitled, "Year of the United Front Against Aggression." It then has in classic Communist and Nazi style thousands of signatures, which in a dictatorship are rather easy to get, imprisonment and being shot being the two alternatives, and it purports to be a voluntary statement by people in Nicaragua in praise of the Communist dictatorship, explaining what a wonderful place it is and how horrible Ronald Reagan is and what a terrible thing it is that we are doing.

Now, I would say to you that this document, by any reasonable standard, is absolute straight, traditional Communist propaganda.

Mr. WEAVER. If the gentlman will yield, I had heard the gentleman say it was Communist propaganda. I do not know anything about the book, but I thought perhaps that President Reagan had brought the book back from Communist China. Is that a possibility?

Mr. GINGRICH. Well, I think it is an amusing point for the gentleman to make, but since we are not currently engaged in hostilities with Communist China, I am not sure that it is very relevant.

Mr. WEAVER. If the gentleman will yield, has the United States officially declared war against Nicaragua?

Mr. GINGRICH. In fact, the United States is clearly engaged, as the gentleman knows, in hostilities in Nicaragua through covert means. Those covert means are not very secret, since they have been on page 1 and on the evening news. But clearly the gentleman knows that this Congress—I might remind the gentleman we are legally engaged under the laws of the United States. We have legally authorized and legally appropriated money. It is the policy of the U.S. Government. And in that period, for someone to bring in this kind of propaganda, is remarkable.

Mr. MACK. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GINGRICH. I will be glad to yield.

Mr. MACK. Since the gentleman brought up the question about authorship, maybe it would be appropriate to pursue the question a little bit further.

How did this—or who gave permission for this book to be placed in the Speaker's lobby?

Mr. GINGRICH. To the best of our understanding, as I told the Chair a while ago—and again I am relying on our staff's having talked to the Democratic staff—the Speaker's office, presumptively the Speaker, gave permission for this book to be put in the lobby.

Mr. MACK. At this point we have no idea who requested that permission?

Mr. GINGRICH. At this point we are not certain who requested it and, frankly, it is amazingly bad judgment. Whoever requested it had remarkably bad judgment, and whoever approved it had worse judgment.

And all I can say is, literally within the last hour we discovered this book was sitting out here, we read the English translation, I went back and picked up the Catholic bishop's letter from Nicaragua and began to piece together how this worked, and all I can say is that this is one of the most remarkable examples of naivete on the part of Members of this Congress I have ever seen. To pretend that a Communist dictatorship, with Soviet and Cuban advisers, has a freely written petition, to pretend that this document is a sincere document, would be like in 1938 accepting a letter from Adolf Hitler signed by 12,000 of his closest friends.

Mr. MACK. Let me raise this point again. There was a paragraph that I think the gentleman read from the bishop's letter, it was written, I believe, on Good Friday, that made some reference to the use of women. Would you mind repeating that?

Mr. GINGRICH. I might say—and this may also answer the other gentleman's question, in a sense—this letter is signed, "Committee of Mothers and Martyrs of the Popular Sandinista Revolution." And the bishops, in their letter of Easter, said:

The suffering of mothers who have lost their children, which should merit our great respect, is instead exploiting to incite hatred and feed the desire for vengeance.

In other words, the bishops are describing precisely the kind of exploitation by the Communist government that this book presumably represents.

I would be delighted to yield to the gentleman.

Mr. WEAVER. I was going to say to my dear friend from Georgia that he keeps saying "Communist propaganda." I wonder what would happen to a book that President Reagan brought back from Communist China. If the President wanted a book that he brought back from Communist China out there, would that also be Communist propaganda? I just ask this question. Perhaps that book is Nicaraguan propaganda. I deplore propaganda of any kind, particularly Communist or fascists propaganda.

Mr. GINGRICH. I am going to get to that in a minute. There are—and I think we ought to quit being naive about it in the West—specific patterns of Communist behavior that are institutionalized and go back to Lenin in 1917 that are very clearcut. And I will cite two examples of recent parallels that we saw that are very precise. In Afghanistan a pro-Soviet Government tried to rebel, the Soviets stepped in and shot everybody who was in charge, including their families, and took over. In Grenada, a pro-Soviet regime tried to rebel, and they shot Maurice Bishop, and had we not intervened, they would have imposed a Communist dictatorship.

There are certain patterns to all this. I am going to, in a minute, walk through some specific documentation about precisely those patterns in Cuba and in Nicaragua and suggest that we are remarkably naive to have to relearn this lesson every 20 years.

Mr. WEAVER. If the gentleman will yield briefly, I agree, everything the gentleman has said is absolutely true. Lenin was perhaps the most evil man that I know of in history. He was absolutely brutal, cruel, cold, merciless, and he killed many of his fellow countrymen in the name of communism. But Communist China did the same thing.

Mr. GINGRICH. Absolutely.

Mr. WEAVER. Millions of peasants were slaughtered or murdered in Communist China, and we have President Reagan going there last week. Why is this? Do we have a double standard?

Mr. GINGRICH. My opinion is, candidly, that that is a mistake.

Mr. WEAVER. Does the gentleman like communism in one place and dislike communism some other place?

Mr. GINGRICH. No; in my opinion, that was a mistake. If you would be willing to join me in condemning communism in Nicaragua, I would be perfectly willing to stipulate with you that communism is no more desirable in China than it is in Nicaragua.

Mr. WEAVER. I absolutely abhor communism anywhere, facism, communism, totalitarianism of any kind.

Mr. GINGRICH. The question then becomes: In addition to abhorring, what do we do about it? Now, if I might, having said that this Congress has so far decayed I think in terms of its sense of awareness of communism—and I accept the gentleman's point—I think one of the reasons we are having trouble in Central America is because this administration has not been clear enough of what it is doing.

□ 1900

It has not got its own act together. But I think a deeper reason is because, frankly, in all candor, the radical wing of the gentleman's party does not even understand that there is communism anymore.

Now this document is not a book about communism, let me make that clear. We have the greatest library in the free world across the street; Members should be allowed and encouraged to read anything they want to. This book is a specific act of propaganda by the Nicaraguan Government, and a document which frankly contains several items which I think can at best be called lies, and are clearly designed to distort reality.

Having said that, let me explain why I take this so seriously. Let me introduce into the RECORD a letter written and published in the Washington Post on April 28 by Adriana Guillen. She was a former correspondent for La Prensa. She was accused of being a counterrevolutionary. She was told she would be killed if she went back. This is what she wrote:

Alma Guillermoprieto quotes Sergio Ramirez, a member of Nicaragua's civilian/military junta, as follows: "The phrase 'freedom of the press' here refers to 'freedom of La Prensa,' and La Prensa thinks its role is to contribute to the overthrow of the government." She then adds, seemingly supporting Ramirez's view: "Certainly, La Prensa's editorial line is often sympathetic to the U.S.-financed counterrevolutionaries fighting the Sandinistas from Honduras. Several La Prensa reporters have left the country to work with counterrevolutionary groups. Others, still at the paper, speak optimistically about a victory for the 'armed opposition.'"

Guillermoprieto neglects to mention that a significant portion of today's armed opposition is also composed of ex-Sandinistas, former government officials and FSLN militants. The facts are that a widespread national movement has arisen in repudiation of the Sandinista betrayal; any Nicaraguan citizen may justly support the rebellions not because he or she is "counterrevolutionary," but because the military suppression of civil rights in Nicaragua, imposed by the Marxist-Leninist FSLN, has made it impossible to obtain the democracy promised by the revolution in any other way.

In the specific case of former La Prensa journalists, myself included, it is not the case that these people have voluntarily left the country to join the rebellion. They have in fact been forced to leave by the FSLN as part of a systematic policy of repression aimed at all remaining vestiges of free journalism in Nicaragua. I cite the cases of a number of my former colleagues who, like myself, each strongly supported the overthrow of Somoza and the democratic aspirations of the Nicaraguan revolution:

Abelardo Sanchez, La Prensa correspondent in Ocotal, was the victim of a massive campaign in the Sandinista press, was entrapped by the FSLN, accused and condemned on June 16, 1981, as a "counterrevolutionary," sentenced to three years and imprisoned, brutally abused and finally released in deplorable condition.

Maximo Alonso, Leon correspondent, was attacked and beaten by a Sandinista mob on the premises of the Leon Court House on June 30, 1981. This was followed by the threat of further mob violence against him and his family at home.

Victor Medina, Managua reporter, was harassed in October 1981 by Sandinista state security agents on the premises of the Sandinista Council of State.

Horacio Ruiz, an editor of La Prensa, was kidnapped and, as reported in The Miami Herald of June 26, 1982, was "beaten severely . . . his life threatened by four masked men, one of them carrying a machine gun" and told "now you are going to know what mobs are."

Luis Mora, Managua reporter, was unjustly imprisoned for three months during 1983.

Auxiliadora Echegoyen, Managua reporter, was threatened by Sandinista activists in the dead of night with loud-speakers blaring promises of a firing squad. She was apprehended without charge by Sandinista security agents and interrogated during the early morning hours at "house No. 50," a notorious FSLN interrogation center.

I, who formerly served as La Prensa reporter and correspondent for Central America, was accused in absentia of being a counterrevolutionary in January 1982. The Sandinista Ministry of Culture (from which I resigned after serving as Coordinator of Popular Centers of Culture from July 1979 to February 1980) caricatured me as an "enemy of the revolution" during a Sandinista anniversary parade on July 19, 1981. FSLN commander William Ramirez, minister for the Atlantic Coast, stated that "if I were to decide, journalists like Guillen would cease to exist." Bayardo Arce, a member of the nine-man FSLN national directorate, privately warned in July 1981 that "what happened to Jorge Salazar"—Nicaraguan opposition leader murdered by Sandinista security forces—"could well happen to Adriana if she stays with La Prensa."

Now, that letter, published in the Washington Post on April 28, is a personal testimony by a former reporter on what was once a free newspaper in Nicaragua, about the systematic brutality, and the systematic censorship by the Communist dictatorship in Nicaragua. The very same dictatorship which, while threatening to kill, and in some cases killing people in its own country, is allowed to send propaganda to sit in the Speaker's lobby.

What really frustrates me, and maybe it is because I was a history teacher; maybe it is just because commonsense would seem to do better; is that none of this is new. Lenin established a pattern by which Communist governments take over.

Hugh Seaton-Watson, a very famous historian, studied that pattern and wrote a book on it 25 or 30 years ago and said, "Here is what will happen. A Communist government will come in with a lot of popular front supporters, then it will systematically kick out, shoot, and jail its supporters."

Lest you think I am just a conservative Republican, let me share with you the historical documents that have come in recently. In connection with the continuing debate, permit me to call to your attention a most revealing book review which appeared in the Washington Post of April 29, 1984.

The book in question, "Family Portrait with Fidel, a Memoir", is by Carlos Franqui, who was a close associate and fellow revolutionary of Fidel Castro in the 1950's, but who is now a Cuban liberation fighter.

I choose the label for Mr. Franqui and associates of his alike, Hubert Amatos and David Salazar, both mentioned in the review, because their tragic cases run so parallel to those of the Nicaraguan freedom fighters of today.

In each instance, these true reformers and civil libertarians helped overthrow existing rightwing dictatorships, only to find themselves in the clutches of new and even more vicious and tenacious dicatorships of the Gestapo left.

Let me point out that Ambassador to the United Nations Jeane Kirkpatrick, in several articles in 1979, made the argument that it does not help people to get rid of a rightwing military dicatorship if, in return, you establish an even more vicious, even more brutal, even more horrible leftwing dicatorship.

I yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania (Mr. WALKER).

Mr. WALKER. I think to back up what the gentleman is saying, is an interesting case history of a gentleman who is a constituent of mine right now who fought alongside Castro, as Castro was taking power in Cuba. He, in fact, was so close to Castro that he was made Ambassador to Great Britain in the Castro regime.

He came to the conclusion that that is precisely what was taking place in Cuba. That Cuba was becoming a leftwing tyranny, and he got out, and escaped to this country. He became a political refugee in this country because he understood what was taking place in his home country. He has related to me precisely the kind of trend that the gentleman is pointing out.

So there is a living, breathing example of somebody who considered himself a compatriot of Fidel Castro who eventually had to leave the government, leave his home country behind, and escape to freedom in the United States.

Mr. GINGRICH. This case goes on over and over again. In each instance, these men who genuinely believed in freedom; who genuinely wanted to establish a democratic country, found themselves kicked out, destroyed by the Gestapo left tactics of what can only be called leftwing Nazis: The Soviet Union and their allies.

Let me go on. When the freedom fighters begin to protest in favor of civil and human rights, in Cuba and in Nicaragua, they are immediately classified as counterrevoluntionary. They are either killed, imprisoned, or have to plead for their lives.

Written specifically about Castro, Mr. Franqui's book paints an equally accurate portrait of what has been going on in Nicaragua. Just as happened in Cuba 25 years ago, the broad-based and popular Nicaraguan revolution of 1979 has been totally co-opted and corrupted by the ruthless, Communist minority: the people we call the Sandinistas, and who, I frankly think, are better called just plain Communists or Marxists.

I think when we look at Franqui's memoir, it explains why all advocates of basic human rights, liberal and conservative, should unite in an effort to prevent all of Central America from becoming a dismal clone of Castro's Cuba, which is precisely what will happen if we do not provide adequate aid to both the freely elected government in El Salvador and the freedom fighters in Nicaragua.

Let me include in the RECORD at this point a review by Ronald Radosh entitled "Castro and Cuba: A Dream That Failed," from the Washington Post.

The review follows:

[From the Washington Post, Apr. 29, 1984]

CASTRO AND CUBA: A DREAM THAT FAILED

[Family Portrait With Fidel: A Memoir. By Carlos Franqui. Translated from the Spanish by Ralph MacAdam. Random House. 262 pp. $17.95]

(By Ronald Radosh)

Until Carlos Franqui's "Family Portrait With Fidel," we have not had an insider's look at how the Sovietization of the Cuban Revolution occurred, and precisely what goals Fidel Castro had in mind for Cuba after the revolution. Franqui was in a position to know. Official archivist of the revolution from the guerrilla days, when he ran the official clandestine rebel radio station, Franqui became editor of the influential newspaper Revolución, which distinguished itself by printing a wide assortment of cultural matter, including the most eclectic Western writers and intellectuals.

Reading Franqui is comparable to reading George Orwell's "Homage to Catalonia"—a classic study of how the authentic revolutionary euphoria of a people in arms is slowly ground down by bureaucratic Stalinists. Make no mistake about it. Franqui is an unreconstructed revolutionary—a democratic exile whose anguish over the failure of the revolution is matched only by his animosity for the upper middle class and counterrevolutionaries who were opposed to change in Cuba. He conveys with power the dignity and strength of the popular militia—the bearded former guerrilleros who represented the hope of the future, and whose romance caught the imagination of so many. Franqui sees them as the collective heroes of Cuba, a cross-section of the island's society, an "armed democracy" composed of a million members.

Those Americans who think that Fidel Castro believed in a democratic revolution, but was forced to turn to the old-line Cuban communists solely for organizational purposes, given U.S. hostility to his revolution, will be shocked to find that the Cuban el jefe wrote approvingly to Franqui of Stalin, whom Castro regarded as a model, repeating to Franqui his "definition of Stalinism as the dictatorship of a revolutionary minority during difficult times, a minority that functions like a father who must deny his children something he has promised them." And Castro is quoted as telling Franqui that he must understand that "all criticism is opposition. All opposition is counterrevolutionary."

With the common enemy gone, the disparate groups which composed the July 26 movement broke into differing factions. What divided them, Franqui points out, was not radicalism or anti-imperialism, but the simple issue of communism. Four currents which fought for control of Cuba and which favored opposing Batista now fought among themselves: radical antiimperialist, democratic reformist, conservative pro-United States and Marxist-Leninist pro-Soviet Union. The fourth group—Franqui reveals—was composed of Che Guevara, Rau'l Castro, other comandantes and old communists and fellow travelers.

At first Castro stood between the groups, holding them together on the basis of his charisma and charm. But as the tension deepened and conflict with the United States loomed large, Fidel quickly turned to the communists. The results were predictable—the people's militia was replaced by the new regular army, by the repressive security police and neighborhood defense committees—and the July 26 organization itself by the Communist Party of Cuba. It was, Franqui says, a new "elitist power structure: the people were organized into cadres, watched over and administered by Security, the army and the bureaucracy. There was only one chief who held all power." In wielding that power, Castro's admonition was only to obey—not to think for oneself. The revolutionary spirit of initiative and struggle was replaced by the purge and militarization.

Franqui tried to oppose conservatives and the pro-Soviet left at the same time, but he found that task harder and harder to accomplish. Franqui gives us the details of how Fidel moved to oust Huber Matos—the only serious rival for leadership among the revolutionary coalition, who was therefore falsely accused of counter-revolutionary activity—but whose real danger was his vast popularity in Camaguey province and his committment to anti-imperialism, agrarian reform and democracy. Franqui tells us how Castro, supposedly guardian of a new worker's state, moved to tame the long-established independent and radical union movement. The Cuban proletariat, which Franqui characterizes as "socialist, antimilitarist, anti-Batista" and at one with the revolutionary 26 July movement, refused to give up their treasured independent union. In November 1959 the workers voted for a union federation that was anticommunist but pro-revolution. Once again, Cuban "conservatives were looking toward Washington, the Party faithful toward Moscow." With Raul Castro orchestrating events, the ministry of labor acted and disfranchised the new CTC, freely chosen by the workers. Its elected leader, David Salvador, was thrown into prison.

The revolution also brought repression of intellectuals to the island. It was but a prelude for the necessary obedience of the masses—Lunes, the cultural supplement of Revolutión, published not only the approved political figures, but Faulkner, Trotsky, Borges, Brecht and Breton—it was an inconoclastic combination of the avantgarde in literature, style and politics. Condemned as the Trojan horse of the revolution, its future was to be brief. A paper shortage was invented as the excuse to close the supplement down. In a short time no vehicle existed from which to report and protest new departures from humanism—torture by the police, and suppression of worker's rights

One example stands out. Simple women from the town of Ćardenas marched in protest against the new Red Terror and demanded food and freedom. The result, Franqui relates, was that "Many people were jailed, and the poor black women were magically transformed into middle-class ladies, enemies of the revolution." Ćardenas was but a few kilometers from the famous Varadero beach, where comandantes and revolutionary tourists reveled in the sun. The Party acted against the people, taking "the old Stalin line that if the people were not ready for socialism, a revolutionary minority would have to impose it on them." On his way back to Havana, Franqui passed the radicial tourists, including those from America, and he wondered what they were seeing "while ten minutes away there was a carnival of persecution in full swing." What they saw was a "stage-set Cuba, not the reality we had to live in every day, and they took the part for the whole."

Readers of Carlos Franqui have no fears—they are getting the whole. His book will not be well received by the mindless supporters of Fidel Castro—those who Franqui notes "think that any crime committed in the name of socialism is no crime at all." Nor will it be welcomed by the right-wing exiles, who will not excuse Franqui for his dream of a socialist but Democratic Cuba—free from dependence on both superpowers. He is clear, however, that the major force interfering with a free Cuba today is Fidel Castro, "a calculating man who believes in terror as a means of government," and who Franqui charges has brought the island to its current fate: "the caudillo, monoculture, militarism, an adaptation of local conditions based on the Soviet model." In deciding to testify to how the revolution ended in such an outcome, Franqui is in the tradition of revolutionary dissidents from Trotsky to Orwell. He offers the ever recurring story of another revolution betrayed—a charge that is one thing when said by the pundits of various American administrations, who preferred the old order, another when coming from a revolutionary like Carlos Franqui. One can only hope that in some far distant future, the Cuban people will also be given the chance to read his powerful memoir.

(Ronald Radosh is a co-editor of El Salvador: Central America in the New Cold War and the co-author of The Rosenberg File. He teaches history at the City University of New York.)

Mr. GINGRICH. When we read the record, it is clear that communism ends up as a dictatorship which survives by sheer terror. In this case, it is, and I quote, "A classic study of how the authentic revolutionary euphoria of a people in arms is slowly ground down by bureaucratic Stalinists."

The Communist system permits no opposition. Let me quote:

Castro is quoted as telling Franqui that he must understand that—all criticism is opposition, all opposition is counter-revolutionary.

And I quote Castro:

In other words, if you criticize the government for anything in a Communist government, you are bad, you are a counterrevolutionary, you are the enemy, you should risk going to jail.

Furthermore, it does not matter what the people want, despite all this Communist propaganda from Nicaragua that has been in the Speaker's lobby. Let me quote again from the review:

The Party acted against the people, taking "the old Stalin line that if the people were not ready for socialism, a revolutionary minority would have to impose it on them."

In other words, we will establish—we the Communists, will establish a dictatorship. We will force you to become Communists, and those of you who do not like it, we will shoot or imprison.

How is Castro described? As "a calculating man who believes in terror as a means of government," and who, Franqui charges, has brought the island to its current fate: "the caudillo, monoculture, militarism, an adaptation of local conditions based on the Soviet model."

And how does the reviewer end this review? Ronald Radosh, co-editor of "El Salvador: Central America in the New Cold War," and the co-author of "The Rosenberg File," a man who teaches history at the City University of New York, closes by saying:

One can only hope that in some far distant future, the Cuban people will also be given the chance to read this powerful memoir.

But if America is weak, if America is afraid, if America does nothing, there is little hope for the Cuban people. And if we do nothing now, there is little hope for the El Salvadoran people and little hope for the Nicaraguan people.

We are not just seeing book reviews. The Village Voice, not normally regarded as a rightwing publication, published in December 1983 an article entitled, "Cuba and Repression: Castro's Victims," by Saul Stern. This article, again, I think, is a direct challenge to the radical Democrats who think it is fine to have Communist propaganda in the Speaker's Lobby, who think it is fine to vote against aid for El Salvador and to vote against aid for Nicaragua.

Mr. WEAVER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GINGRICH. I would be glad to yield to the gentleman from Oregon.

Mr. WEAVER. I thank the gentleman for yielding.

Mr. Speaker, I thought the gentleman said he did not know who put the book in the Speaker's lobby.

Mr. GINGRICH. I think I can promise the gentleman without any question of challenge that it was not put in the Speaker's lobby by a Republican.

Mr. WEAVER. Now, wait a minute. The gentleman does not know who put it in, and yet the gentleman is accusing one or another of the parties, it does not matter which, Republican or Democrat, the gentleman is accusing somebody of putting the book in and he does not know who put it in. It could have been put in by President Reagan, who brought it back from Communist China, could it now have?

Mr. GINGRICH. The gentleman has great fun with that particular analogy, but the fact is that the Democratic Speaker of the House permitted it to be put there. The fact is that, I think the gentleman knows full well, it was almost certainly placed there by a Democratic Member of the House, and I will be glad next week when we are back, if the Speaker will tell us—the Speaker may not wish to tell us, which is his prerogative. The Speaker may wish to decide that it was on his own right.

Mr. WEAVER. It could have been put there by a covert Republican.

Mr. GINGRICH. It is conceivable that in the gentleman's mind the world works that way.

Mr. WEAVER. It does not work that way for me.

Mr. GINGRICH. I do not think it does in reality.

Mr. WEAVER. Usually when I say something has been put there by somebody, I know who put it there. I would not say that somebody put a book in the Speaker's Lobby when I did not know who put it there.

Mr. WALKER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GINGRICH. I would be glad to yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. WALKER. I thank the gentleman for yielding.

Mr. Speaker, the way we often operate around here is, the person who authorizes the placement of the book is the one who has to take the responsibility. We know at this point that evidently, at least through the Speaker's office, this was authorized, and that, I think, makes the gentleman's contention perfectly correct. We have it in the Speaker's lobby as a result of the Speaker giving permission for it to be there. We have Communist propaganda that is placed in the Speaker's lobby, given a prominent position in the Speaker's lobby, because the Speaker deemed that he was going to do that.

That is what the complaint is, and I think it is a legitimate complaint for the gentleman from Georgia to raise.

Mr. GINGRICH. Before I go on to talk a little more about Cuba, in case the gentleman would like more evidence as to why I might reach that conclusion, today's Washington Times headline: "House Sends Reagan Latin Aid to Limbo."

A House panel has stripped the last vestiges of the Administration's Central American military aid package from a key bill, pushing the money the Administration wants to resist Communist encroachment into a parliamentary bog, with little hope for a rapid recovery of it.

Quoting the Speaker, the Democratic Speaker of the House:

"We are following a plan, and the plan is working all right," said House Speaker Thomas P. O'Neill, Democrat of Massachusetts. During the day, House Republicans were defeated twice in party-line votes on efforts to force consideration of a related bill.

The vote on the floor, by the way, was 245 to 159.

The Speaker also set up a new obstacle yesterday to President Reagan's plan, saying he wants all Central American bills delayed until the administration of El Salvador's new president, to be elected Sunday, is stabilized. Earlier in the day, one of Mr. O'Neill's most important subcommittee chairmen on the Central America issue, Representative Clarence Long, Democrat of Maryland, of the Foreign Operations Panel, said, "Congress may want to wait until after the new Salvadoran president is sworn in on June 5th. We ought to wait and see whether the Salvadoran military will honor an election," Mr. Long said.

Let me suggest to you that the radical wing of the Democratic Party has been systematically undercutting and trying to stop the aid to Nicaragua. It has been systematically opposing and undercutting the effort on El Salvador. Therefore, it seems reasonable to guess that since their Speaker permitted it to be put in, it was probably done by a member of their wing.

Mr. WALKER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield to me?

Mr. GINGRICH. I yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. WALKER. I thank the gentleman for yielding.

Mr. Speaker, I have just been informed that there was a 1-minute speech that was delivered that said who put the book in the lobby. The book was put in by the gentleman from California (Mr. DELLUMS) who in a 1-minute speech delivered in the House Chamber said that he was the one who put the book there.

So if the gentleman from Oregon was concerned, we now have the mystery solved and we now know that, in fact, it was a Democrat, in fact a subcommittee chairman, a member of the Democratic leadership, who put it in the Speaker's lobby.

Mr. GINGRICH. And, in fact, I might note, a gentleman who yesterday, as I understand it, and I do not have the document right here, but as I understand it yesterday in his subcommittee of the Armed Services Committee, managed to stop American spending for certain bases in Honduras; is that not correct?

Mr. WALKER. That is my understanding. I am not privy to the information within that subcommittee, but that is my understanding, based upon reports that I have heard. But we do have the mystery solved with regard to the book, anyhow. It was evidently announced proudly on the floor by this Member of the Democratic leadership, that he was in fact putting Communist propaganda into the Speaker's lobby.

Mr. GINGRICH. I think we might check in the next few moments and determine if the gentleman who put the Communist propaganda in the Speaker's Lobby is also the gentleman who, as a chairman of an Armed Services subcommittee, stopped yesterday American efforts to build appropriate facilities in Honduras. I think that is the case, but we will check that in the next few minutes and see if we can find for sure. I just think it is a pattern.

Mr. WEAVER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GINGRICH. I yield to the gentleman from Oregon.

Mr. WEAVER. I thank the gentleman for yielding.

Mr. Speaker, I find this information all very interesting. I wanted to ask the gentleman if he felt that the Reagan administration should sign a nuclear materials agreement with Nicaragua as they did with Communist China, an agreement to give Nicaragua nuclear materials, as they did sign an agreement with Communist China to give them nuclear materials.

□ 1920

Mr. GINGRICH. Let me pick this up for a minute. I am trying frankly to walk through this and decide precisely. The gentleman is scoring a nice technical point.

The fact is that Yugoslavia is a country which has a Communist, although a relatively open Communist type of government that we have some relations with. China has a Communist government, which frankly I think in some ways has a worse record of human rights than even the Soviet Union, not an easy thing to achieve.

On the other hand, there are two differences that I would state to the gentleman very flatly. One is that Communist China is far more afraid of Russia than it is of us. Therefore, in the grim world of reality, there are reasons for us to try to work with them, because the greatest danger to the world is the Soviet Union, not China.

Just as we worked with the Soviet Union against Nazi Germany, because as Winston Churchill once said, "If the Devil himself were with us, I would at least try to say a few kind words about hell," I think it is reasonable for us to say that in exactly the same tradition in which Franklin Roosevelt worked with the Soviet Union against a more immediate and a greater evil, that there are grounds for us to work with the Chinese Communists because they are less dangerous and less of a threat.

Second, it is fair to say that Deng Xiaoping has attempted to move the Chinese Communist Government in some ways toward a more open and a more moderate position.

Now, having said that, let me come back, because the gentleman seems to want to take what is clearly a Soviet colony, and Nicaragua is a colony of the Soviet Union now, they have over 2,500 Cuban and Soviet advisers sitting there. They are increasingly taking over the government. It is exactly the pattern that we have seen everywhere else.

Let me read again from the Washington Times in the editorial today:

> From the outset the Democratic leaders have dug in their heels. They briskly spurn requests to fund the programs recommended by the Kissinger Commission. Ten key committee chairmen in the House recently flayed administration policy in a bootlicking letter in Nicaragua's Communist rulers. The three Democratic presidential hopefuls agree on abandoning Central America. They dispute only who would bug out fastest. Tip O'Neill arrogantly flaunts his defiance, "I am opposed to Nicaragua all the way," he says. "Nicaragua is not going to get through this House." So much for bipartisanship.

The Washington Times goes on to say:

> If as Reagan says the advance of the Soviet empire in this hemisphere threatens our vital interests, he cannot continue to let things drift. He must brush aside the timid among his entourage who counsel caution and compromise. Their imperatives are political, not strategic. They are worried about his man of peace image for the fall campaign. They forget that President Ford was never more popular than after the Mayaguez incident and that Mr. Reagan's popularity soared after the liberation of Grenada. The Democrats pussyfooting isolationist leaders do not speak for millions of their rank and file members. The American people regardless of party have always rallied behind bold presidential leadership and they are ready to do so again. The Vietnam trauma is an obstacle, but leadership overcomes obstacles. If it is difficult to forge a national consensus now, what hope will there be if America suffers a long morale sapping and ultimately futile effort to defend our vital interests in Central America.

Let me say to the gentleman from Oregon, El Salvador is 2 days' drive from Texas. It is closer to Miami than Miami is to Washington, D.C. This is not some distant country about which we know little. These are direct, immediate interests of the United States.

Mr. WALKER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GINGRICH. I am glad to yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. WALKER. I just wanted to inform the gentleman that we now have the information with regard to the subcommittee action and, indeed, that subcommittee did knock out all money for the bases in Honduras in the military construction bill. So in fact the gentleman's information was precisely correct. That took place.

I thank the gentleman for yielding.

Mr. GINGRICH. So the gentleman who is a chairman of the Armed Services Committee under the Democratic leadership, who has asked the Speaker's permission and gotten the Democratic Speaker's permission to place what is in effect Communist propaganda in the Speaker's lobby, is also in the process of using his position then to stop the development of bases that might help us in stopping communism in Honduras. Is that correct?

Mr. WALKER. If the gentleman will yield further, that certainly seems to be the implication of everything we know here based upon those facts.

Mr. GINGRICH. This is part of the Democratic elected leadership of committees and subcommittees of the House.

Mr. WALKER. I think the gentleman makes an excellent point, because this is not then just a minor incident. We have a Member of the elected Democratic leadership and a subcommittee chairman who is involved in all this, which means that he serves at the sufferance of the Democratic Caucus and we have the involvement of the Democratic Speaker of the House of Representatives, elected by the entire Democratic Caucus, in fact by the entire House of Representatives.

Are the individuals involved in the scenario that the gentleman outlines saying that on the one hand we can have bases knocked out in Honduras aimed at trying to protect us from Communist aggression, headed toward this country, and at the same time we supplement that with an action taken to put Communist propaganda in the Speaker's lobby evidently so it can be used to influence every Member of this House? There is something awfully strange and awfully disturbing about that.

Mr. GINGRICH. I will yield in just a moment, but let me first ask the gentleman from Pennsylvania something, because the gentleman has made a point that I think is fascinating.

Honduras is, in fact, between the United States and Nicaragua.

Mr. WALKER. The gentleman is precisely correct. As a matter of fact, it is on the way up the peninsula toward Mexico and then on to the United States, which is one of the reasons why it is strategically important for us to have some bases there and to have an arrangement with Honduras, because if you fear what is taking place in Nicaragua may, in fact, spread to some of the neighboring countries, the immediate problem being El Salvador, and if you fear that that kind of Marxist domination of that part of the world could, in fact, make a problem on the U.S. borders at some point, it might be well to have some U.S. bases stationed strategically to prevent that.

What the subcommittee did was knocked out the efforts to do that yesterday. I think it raises some very disturbing questions.

Mr. GINGRICH. Let me carry this a step further for just a second, and I will get to the gentleman from Oregon in a moment but I first want to finish this because I think it is a very important framework to establish here. I want to make sure I understand this.

John F. Kennedy once wrote a book called While England Slept which was an analysis of why the British people drifted into World War II.

Winston Churchill called World War II the most unnecessary war, because he said it was so easily avoidable if only we had been awake.

In other words, if 5 or 10 years from now there is a total disaster in Central America and there are millions of refugees in the United States and all of Central America has gone Communist and a committee comes back to investigate, that committee will find that one of the people that the Democratic leadership in this House helped in 1 day stop aid to the freedom fighters, stop aid to El Salvador, stop aid to Honduras and put Communist propaganda in the Speaker's lobby.

Mr. WALKER. That sounds precisely like what happened on 1 day this week.

Mr. GINGRICH. Actually, I guess it was 2 days. It was a very busy period.

Now I would be glad to yield to the gentleman from Oregon.

Mr. WEAVER. Well, I am pleased at my good friend from Georiga yielding.

My friend, the gentleman from Pennsylvania, made the point that he was afraid that this Communist propaganda would influence Members of Congress. I wondered if either of these two gentlemen are afraid that the Republican Members of Congress would have their minds changed by this propaganda. Does the gentleman think they could be influenced by this Communist propaganda?

Mr. GINGRICH. Yes; sure, of course.

Mr. WEAVER. Republicans could be?

Mr. GINGRICH. Of course.

Mr. WEAVER. Well, I am shocked and shattered, I really am.

I thought better of the gentleman.

Mr. GINGRICH. Let me say something to the gentleman from Oregon. The gentleman may make fun of this and the gentleman may take it lightly, but let me say that the people who have fled their countries to come to America do not take it lightly, that the people who have had their ears cut off, and there is literally a gentleman in this city who is a Pentacostal minister who had both ears cut off by the Communists in Nicaragua. He does not take it lightly, that the people who are locked up in jail do not take it lightly, and the families of those who have been killed by Communists do not take it lightly.

The fact is that the American news media and American politicians are on occasion influenced by Communist propaganda, that if you read it long enough, if you would walk by it does not say anything, this does not say anything about Communist propaganda. It says Nicaraguan women's signature book. It does not say anything unless you stop and read it and pay attention to it and do the research and then you are horrified. Of course, if we surround ourselves with propaganda it has an impact.

Mr. WALKER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GINGRICH. I would be glad to yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. WALKER. Mr. Speaker, I thank the gentleman for yielding.

What worries me and what should concern the American people is that the attitude of the gentleman from Oregon, a very flippant attitude toward this whole problem, is precisely the attitude that has been characteristic of his side of the aisle. His attitude is not all that surprising, because that is precisely the way in which we are approaching the whole problem of Central America, as kind of a flippant attitude that there is nothing really to worry about down there, that there are just no problems whatsoever and we ought to really be recognizing Nicaragua and encouraging them on and as a matter of fact, many people in his wing of the party want to recognize Cuba and forget all the past there, too. If Nicaragua happens to be exporting revolution to El Salvador, well so be it. We can accept that as well. We can accept nearly anything, because we really do not regard it as all that important. As a matter of fact, we regard it as very amusing.

I guess many of our problems are that it is no longer amusing. The Communist revolution throughout this world that is attempting to bring tyranny to democracies all over the world, that is attempting to subjugate people throughout the world, is something that is no longer amusing. It is no longer something we smile about. It is no longer anything to be laughed about. We need to be doing something. We need to be standing strong and we need to be standing up to terrorism that is going across the globe as a result of the Soviet mind set.

I think that we are seeing revealed here precisely one of the problems in this House which is that there is a kind of an almost note of amusement as we cancel bases in Honduras, as we shut off aid to freedom fighters, as we cancel out aid to El Salvador. We do so with a smile on our face as though everything is all right.

Mr. GINGRICH. Let me put into the RECORD here, because I think it fits exactly the whole crisis of the radical left in America, this article by Sol Stern from the Village Voice. I ask permission that all of it go in the RECORD, but let me cite specific parts, because it shows you how bad it is.

The new dictator seized power by shooting the chairman and most of the other members of the military junta during a meeting at the national palace. Then, when the Marxist student movement organized demonstrations against what they called his "fascist" regime, he unleashed his death squads. On the eve of a planned May Day demonstration in the capital, the dictator's security forces murdered 500 young people. The killings continued for weeks. The secretary general of the Swedish Save the Children Fund testified that "one thousand children have been massacred, and their bodies, lying in the streets, are ravaged by roving hyenas . . . the bodies of murdered children, mostly aged eleven to thirteen years, can be seen heaped on the roadside when one leaves the capital."

Readers of the Voice might guess it happened in some country like Guatamala or El Salvador, where the Reagan administration is trying to prop up murderous right-wing regimes with arms and advisers.

In this case it was Ethiopia. The dictator's name is Lieutenant Colonel Haile Mariam Mengistu. And it wasn't Ronald Reagan but Fidel Castro who embraced the bloody tyrant and sent an expeditionary force to keep him in power.

The story of Cuba's complicity in that crime is one that some people may still prefer not to hear about. I well understand why. Many of us once believed that Cuba was going to be different. That presumed "difference" was central to the ideological elan of the early New Left Cuba proved that we did not have to be strait jacketed by the horrible choice between repressive communism or "end of ideology" liberal capitalism. Cuba meant new possibilities, a new humanistic radicalism.

C. Wright Mills, the early New Left's most important writer, put the following words into the mouth of one of his Fidelista characters in his book Listen Yankee: "We are new radicals. We really are, we think, a New Left in the world

And so forth.

Now, this is a very leftwing publication, the Village Voice, printing an article from a former, and I think still ideologicaly very leftwing person, but a man with the courage intellectually to say what if it is not working, what if the world is not the way we hoped it would be, what if Communists are bad. And he said we were not sure what happened.

Listen to what he says:

No longer Cuba today is a fully totalitarian state. Its "difference" now is a rather melancholy one. The Castro regime actually suppresses opposition and ideological deviation with a ruthlessness unmatched anywhere in Eastern Europe, including the Soviet Union.

To see this clearly, one need only note that certain phenomenon associated with the post-Stalin period in the Soviet Union—"dissidents" and "Samizdat," for example—are simply unthinkable in today's Cuba. In the Soviet Union, an Andrei Sakharov can be harrassed, stripped of his work, driven out of the capital—yet he is still able to communicate with the West, thus able to speak. A Sakharov could not survive in Cuba. There is not even the possibility of a Cuban Roy Medvedev, the dissident Communist historian who supports the revolution and the basic outlines of the Soviet system but calls for changes in party policies and a more honest rendering of the Soviet past.

Cuba's potential Sakharovs and Medivedevs were either lucky enough to get out of the country (the novelist Edmundo Desnois or the journalist Carlos Franqui) or they wound up in prison.

Huber Matos, a leader of the insurrection against the Batista dicatorship, committed the crime of protesting the imposition of a Communist system. For that he was sentenced to 20 years in prison, seven of which were served in solitary confinement. Similarly, the poet Armando Valladeres expressed nonviolent opposition to the regime and was sentenced to 30 years. As a result of mistreatment in prison, he was left an invalid.

Matos served to the very last day of his sentence. Valladeres managed to get out a few years early only through the intervention of the socialist president of France.

Matos and Valladeres, because they were "famous" prisoners, were lucky. Scores of other long-term politicals have been kept locked up years after their sentences expired. Amnesty International has reported on one of them, Oscar Rodriquez Terrero, whose 20-year sentence was up in February 1981 and who was than "summoned to the office of the director of Boniato prison . . . where he faced a non-judicial 'trial,' without legal representation or the opportunity to present his defense. He was charged with participating in hunger strikes and refusing to participate in the 're-education, program. A few days later he was informed that he had been sentenced to a further two years imprisonment."

The human rights organization Americas Watch recently approached the Cuban government and requested permission to send an official delegation to visit Cuba to investigate the human rights situation. The Cubans refused, despite the fact that Americas Watch has a clear record of opposing human rights violations by right-wing regimes throughout Latin America.

Americas Watch went ahead and investigated anyway, based on the best available information. This is the way its report summarized the state of human rights in Cuba today:

"At least 250 long-term political prisoners are confined in Cuban prisons under brutal conditions, many after their original sentences had been completed.

"1500 to 2000 former political prisoners languish as pariahs in Cuban society, denied decent work and respect, longing to leave.

"Freedom of expression does not exist.

"Civil liberties do not exist.

"Deviations from socially accepted norms, such as homosexuality, are extremely circumscribed and in some cases are not tolerated.

"No human rights monitoring group is able to operate in Cuba, and international human rights groups—such as Americas Watch—are not permitted to visit to conduct inquiries."

(The report also strongly criticized the Reagan administration's hard-line posture in refusing to process immigration visas for the 1500 to 2000 former political prisoners—whom the Cubans have agreed to allow to leave the country—until Cuba also takes back some of the hardened criminals sent to the U.S. during the Mariel boatlift.)

This is not a right wing group. This is a legitimate group looking at human rights in Cuba.

I go on to quote from the article by Sol Stern:

The writer of the report was Gregory Wallance, a New York attorney, human rights activist, and ex-Village Voice contributor. He spoke to me of the shock he experienced as he gathered the data.

"I've been to Czecholsovakia. I've been to Russia," he said. "But these sentences are the worst I've seen. They are terrible sentences.

"I was in Czechoslovakia in 1981 on a human rights mission and someone named Rudolf Battek was sentenced to seven and a half years. The European socialist community was just outraged. Willy Brandt and Kreisky, the Socialist International—they all issued statements. Ultimately, the sentence was cut to five years, which was still the harshest sentence since the Stalin period in that country. Even in Russia, Shcharansky gets 10 years and Orlov gets seven. But these people [the Cuban long-term prisoners] have been down there since 1961, '62, or '63. It's unbelievable, but nobody really gets that outraged. They are simply forgotten."

Sol Stern goes on to say, and I quote:

The Cuban "difference" is even more pronounced in the area of cultural freedom. Throughout the Soviet bloc writers are censored, harassed, sometimes arrested. Yet they continue to write. If they can't be published at home, they are often published in the West, both in their own language and in translation. They can still be read by their countrymen through smuggled copies of their works published overseas, or through Samizdat. It's not a pleasant situation. Still, at least some critics have suggested that Soviet bloc writers are producing superior literature because of their situation of "extremity."

But such speculations are not even applicable to Cuba. Most of the best writers have had to leave the country. For those left behind who still aspire to write honestly, Cuba is indeed, as one writer puts it, "The Island of Dangerous Manuscripts." Writers go to jail not just for smuggling literary works abroad, but for the mere possession of unacceptable manuscripts in their own homes.

For a novel and poems critical of the regime, the journalist Gomez Boix was sentenced to eight years in prison. The Americas Watch report highlighted the case of Rene Ariza, sentenced to over three years for possessing unacceptable manuscripts. According to the state prosecutor's charge, Ariza was guilty of "devoting himself to writing short stories . . . the content and point of view of which are based on the amplest sort of ideological diversionism . . . that all this literary material lacking artistic value is written against the interests of our people, or our first minister Comandante Fidel Castro Ruz. . . ."

Let me say can you imagine a dictatorship which would sentence a writer to 3 years in jail for writing funny stories? This is the Cuba which has 2,500 to 3,500 advisers, military advisers in Nicaragua. This is the Cuba which is the training ground for the Nicaraguan Communists.

This description says that Cuba is worse than any country in the Soviet empire in Eastern Europe. This is the Cuba which some radical Democrats would recognize.

□ 1940

Let me continue quoting from Sol Stern:

No one really knows for sure how many political prisoners are now being held in Cuba. At one point the government denied there were any political prisoners at all. Later Castro admitted to 15,000.

Let me make this point, because it is back to why I am so angry that Nicaragua, and Communist propaganda was in the Speaker's Lobby. Here you have Fidel Castro, who lied about having any political prisoners at all then said, "We have 15,000, but we are just funny." Now these people are bad people; they lie regularly; they send out propaganda regularly. These are not nice people. They do not play by the rules of liberal Western democracies.

They are in fact the Nazis of the left and their secret police are the Gestapo of the left. The longer we kid ourselves and the longer we play games as though they are reasonable, the more trouble we are in.

Let me go on and quote from Sol Stern:

During 1978, during a period of improving relations with the Carter administration, the regime officially conceded it was then holding 4,500 political prisoners. This became the basis for what came to be known as the "Dialogue" with 75 prominent Cubans residing in the United States. As a result of negotiations with the emigré group, 3,500 prisoners were subsequently released.

There is another category of people, however, who have been arrested and held for up to six months without trial under Cuba's preventive-detention laws. These people may be suspected of ordinary crimes, but many also fall into the political or "antisocial" category. The Harvard political scientist and highly regarded expert on Cuba's political system, Jorge Dominguesz, has estimated (based on official Cuban sources) that as many as 10,000 people are detained each year.

Another uncertain area involves the use of the death penalty. Under the new Cuban penal code, the death sentence can be imposed for a number of crimes, such as "sedition," "sabotage," "terrorism," or "acts against the security of the state." Several hundred executions were carried out in the early years of the revolution, but the government has never released any official figures on the number of death sentences. Emigré groups now claim that political executions are carried out every year—but there is no way of confirming this. In a letter smuggled out of prison in July 1981, Armando Villadares testified that three fellow prisoners were executed for trying to burn buses.

Let me try to put this in a framework that Sol Stern develops, because I don't think we can appreciate the horror of this. For a country the size of the United States, the Cuban political system would have the following:

As many as 425,000 political prisoners held in jail at one time or another.

250,000 people arrested each year and held without trial.

6,000 "long-term" political prisoners presently serving sentences of 15 to 20 years. (With 1,000 getting extra years at the end of their terms.)

Several hundred writers serving jail terms for writing poems or stories that displeased the country's political leaders.

Let me go back to Sol Stern's words:

It should be emphasized that these are conservative estimates and that the situation likely is worse, including the possibility that death sentences have been carried out. Of course, one reason we don't know more is that Cuba is one of the few countries that actively prevents any kind of independent monitoring of human rights violations.

Let me go back and repeat, because it is important to understand just how bad Castro and Cuba are. Not only are they a Communist tyranny, not only do they have their own Gestapo, not only do they do all sorts of bad things, not only are they a colony of the Soviet Union, they systematically prevent any kind of independent monitoring of human rights violations.

Now we have an election in El Salvador, every American who wants to goes down there. ABC, CBS, NBC, all are filming it live; the New York Times has reporters wandering all over the place; that is our side, but it is not good enough for the radical Democrats. They want to cut off aid.

We have Honduras, wide open, you can go in and film virtually anything. But that is not good enough for the radical Democrats. We have Costa Rica; no army, a completely democratic country; is it going to be protected? Well, we are not going to put the bases into Honduras to try to help, are we, because of the radical Democrats?

But what about Nicaragua? Nicaragua, which is a Communist-trained, Communist-developed, Communist-run colony of the Soviet Union with Cuba and totalitarians in there helping, well for the radical Democrats, Nicaragua is good enough to put a petition right here in the House Chamber, right in the Speaker's lobby. Nicaragua is good enough for the Speaker to say we are going to stop any aid from getting through to the freedom fighters. Nicaragua is good enough that the Speaker was quoted today as saying he has a plan and the plan is working.

It is an absolutely unbelievable situation.

Let me go back to quoting Sol Stern.

Still, what we do know is sufficient to conclude that the Castro regime has treated its dissenters with extreme vindictiveness and cruelty; that having began as the great alternative to Stalinism, the revolution has fallen back on standard Stalinist methods to maintain social and political control.

Given its human rights record at home, it is not surprising that the Castro government should be less than scrupulous about the kinds of regimes it supports abroad. Among the recipients of Cuban largess (including military support) have been Libya's Colonel Qaddafi and Syria's Hafez-el-Assad.

Let me stop for a moment, closing the quote on Mr. Stern and point out: Cuba helps the very same Qadhafi, who all of us saw with one of his diplomats killing a London policewoman on television 10 days ago.

Cuba helps the same Syrian dictator, Assad, who is involved in supporting and arming and training the people who were killing American marines in Lebanon. Systematically around the world, if you are a free religious Western society, there is an alliance of increasingly radical countries, which includes the Soviet Union, its colony in Cuba and allies in Libya and Syria.

Mr. Stern continues, and I quote:

But Castro's ally in Ethiopia, Mengistu, is in a league all by himself—and the story of their emergent friendship is a depressing companion piece to the chronicle of Cuba's internal repression.

Military interventions always come with wonderful-sounding testaments to humanity. When the Cubans marched into Ethiopia six years ago, they justified it as a selfless act of "revolutionary internationalism." In reality there hasn't been a recent case of interventionism that was more cynical or opportunistic.

Let me summarize because I do not want to read all of this; and I ask it all be included in the RECORD.

What Mr. Stern says is that 30,000 to 50,000 civilians were killed or wounded by the Ethiopian troops, aided and advised by the Cubans, nearly 1,000,000 more Ethiopians were turned into refugees; he just cites case after case after case. He cites an Amnesty International report on Ethiopia, October 1978, which Mr. Stern calls "One of the most gruesome documents it has ever published."

Here is an excerpt, quoting from Amnesty International:

"The government's 'Red Terror' campaign, beginning in mid-November 1977, was directed at alleged supporters of the EPRP and involved mass arrests of young people, the systematic use of torture and the summary killing of large numbers of those arrested. This was mostly carried out by kebele [local revolutionary committees] armed guards or 'revolutionary defense squads' attached to factories and other institutions. Killings took place arbitrarily when groups of young people were seen on the streets, during house searches for EPRP activists, and as a result of kebele tribunal decisions following hearings unregulated by legal formalities. In the case of those 'condemned' in this way the 'execution' followed immediately. It took place at night, the victim's body being left until morning with a warning placard attached to it, stating, "This was a counter-revolutionary," "The Red Terror will flourish," or some slogan. After these 'executions,' victims' relatives were either forbidden to mourn and ordered to join in public condemnation of those who had been killed, or were allowed to buy back the bodies for burial—'paying for the bullet,' as it was called.

"It is estimated that about 5000 young people aged between 12 and 25 were killed in this way in Addis Ababa during the Red Terror.

This is the ally of Cuba, the same Cuba undermining us in Nicaragua, the same Communist Nicaragua which today had propaganda placed in the Speaker's Lobby.

Thank you, Mr. Speaker.

CUBA AND REPRESSION: CASTRO'S VICTIMS

(By Sol Stern)

The new dictator seized power by shooting the chairman and most of the other members of the military junta during a meeting at the national palace. Then, when the Marxist student movement organized demonstrations against what they called his "fascist" regime, he unleashed his death squads. On the eve of a planned May Day demonstration in the capital, the dictator's security forces murdered 500 young people. The killings continued for weeks. The secretary general of the Swedish Save the Children Fund testified that "one thousand children have been massacred, and their bodies, lying in the streets, are ravaged by roving hyenas . . . the bodies of murdered children, mostly aged eleven to thirteen years, can be seen heaped on the roadside when one leaves the capital."

Readers of the Voice might guess it happened in some country like Guatamala or El Salvador, where the Reagan administration is trying to prop up murderous right-wing regimes with arms and advisers.

In this case it was Ethiopia. The dictator's name is Lieutenant Colonel Haile Mariam Mengistu. And it wasn't Ronald Reagan but Fidel Castro who embraced the bloody tyrant and sent an expeditionary force to keep him in power.

The story of Cuba's complicity in that crime is one that some people may still prefer not to hear about. I well understand why. Many of us once believed that Cuba was going to be different. That presumed "difference" was central to the ideological élan of the early New Left. Cuba proved that we did not have to be straitjacketed by the horrible choice between repressive communism or "end of ideology" liberal capitalism. Cuba meant new possibilities, a new humanistic radicalism.

And for a time Cuba did appear freer, more open than other Communist countries.

No longer, Cuba today is a fully totalitarian state. Its "difference" now is a rather melancholy one. The Castro regime actually suppresses opposition and ideological deviation with a ruthlessness unmatched anywhere in Eastern Europe, including the Soviet Union.

To see this clearly, one need only note that certain phenomenon associated with the post-Stalin period in the Soviet Union—"dissidents" and "samizdat," for example—are simply unthinkable in today's Cuba. In the Soviet Union, an Andrei Sakharov can be harassed, stripped of his work, driven out of the capital—yet he is still able to communicate with the West, thus able to speak. A Sakharov could not survive in Cuba. There is not even the possibility of a Cuban Roy Medvedev, the dissident Communist historian who supports the revolution and the basic outlines of the Soviet system but calls for changes in party policies and a more honest rendering of the Soviet past.

Cuba's potential Sakharovs and Medvedevs were either lucky enough to get out of the country (the novelist Edmundo Desnois or the journalist Carlos Franqui) or they wound up in prison.

Huber Matos, a leader of the insurrection against the Batista dictatorship, committed the crime of protesting the imposition of a Communist system. For that he was sentenced to 20 years in prison, seven of which were served in solitary confinement. Similarly, the poet Armando Valladeres expressed non-violent opposition to the regime and was sentenced to 30 years. As a result of mistreatment in prison, he was left an invalid.

Matos served to the very last day of his sentence. Valladeres managed to get out a few years early only through the intervention of the socialist president of France.

Matos and Valladeres, because they were "famous" prisoners, were lucky. Scores of other long-term politicals have been kept locked up years after their sentences expired. Amnesty International has reported on one of them, Oscar Rodriguez Terrero, whose 20-year sentence was up in February 1981 and who was then "summoned to the office of the director of Boniato Prison . . . where he faced a non-judicial 'trial,' without notification, and without being allowed legal representation or the opportunity to present his defense. He was charged with participating in hunger strikes and refusing to participate in the 're-education' program. A few days later he was informed that he had been sentenced to a further two years imprisonment."

The human rights organization Americas Watch recently approached the Cuban government and requested permission to send an official delegation to visit Cuba to investigate the human rights situation. The Cubans refused, despite the fact that Americas Watch has a clear record of opposing human rights violations by right-wing regimes throughout Latin America.

Americas Watch went ahead and investigated anyway, based on the best available information. This is the way its report summarized the state of human rights in Cuba today:

"At least 250 long-term political prisoners are confined in Cuban prisons under brutal conditions, many after their original sentences had been completed.

"1500 to 2000 former political prisoners languish as pariahs in Cuban society, denied decent work and respect, longing to leave.

"Freedom of expression does not exist.

"Civil liberties do not exist.

"Deviations from socially accepted norms, such as homosexuality, are extremely circumscribed and in some cases are not tolerated.

"No human rights monitoring group is able to operate in Cuba, and international human rights groups—such as Americas Watch—are not permitted to visit to conduct inquiries."

The writer of the report was Gregory Wallance, a New York attorney, human rights activist, and ex-Village Voice contributor. He spoke to me of the shock he experienced as he gathered the data.

"I've been to Czechoslovakia. I've been to Russia," he said. "But these sentences are the worst I've seen. They are terrible sentences.

"I was in Czechoslovakia in 1981 on a human rights mission and someone named Rudolf Battek was sentenced to seven and a half years. The European socialist community was just outraged. Willy Brandt and Kreisky, the Socialist International—they all issued statements. Ultimately, the sentence was cut to five years, which was still the harshest sentence since the Stalin period in that country. Even in Russia, Scharansky gets 10 years and Orlov gets seven. But these people [the Cuban long-term prisoners] have been down there since 1961, '62, or '63. It's unbelievable, but nobody really gets that outraged. They are simply forgotten."

The Cuban "difference" is even more pronounced in the area of cultural freedom. Throughout the Soviet bloc writers are censored, harassed, sometimes arrested. Yet they continue to write. If they can't be published at home, they are often published in the West, both in their own language and in translation. They can still be read by their countrymen through smuggled copies of their works published overseas, or through samizdat. It's not a pleasant situation. Still, at least some critics have suggested that Soviet bloc writers are producing superior literature because of their situation of "extremity."

But such speculations are not even applicable to Cuba. Most of the best writers have had to leave the country. For those left behind who still aspire to write honestly, Cuba is indeed, as one writer put it, "The Island of Dangerous Manuscripts." Writers go to jail not just for smuggling literary works abroad, but for the mere possession of unacceptable manuscripts in their own homes.

For a novel and poems critical of the regime, the journalist Gomez Boix was sentenced to eight years in prison. The Americas Watch report highlighted the case of Rene Ariza, sentenced to over three years for possessing unacceptable manuscripts. According to the state prosecutor's charge, Ariza was guilty of "devoting himself to writing short stories . . . the content and point of view of which are based on the amplest sort of ideological diversionism . . . that all this literary material lacking artistic value is written against the interests of our people, of our first minister Commandante Fidel Castro Ruz. . . ."

No one really knows for sure how many political prisoners are now being held in Cuba. At one point the government denied there were any political prisoners at all. Later Castro admitted to 15,000. In 1978, during a period of improving relations with the Carter administration, the regime officially conceded it was then holding 4500 political prisoners. This became the basis for what came to be known as the "Dialogue" with 75 prominent Cubans residing in the United States. As a result of negotiations with the emigré group, 3500 prisoners were subsequently released.

There is another category of people, however, who have been arrested and held for up to six months without trial under Cuba's preventive-detention laws. These people may be suspected of ordinary crimes, but many also fall into the political or "antisocial" category. The Harvard political scientist and highly regarded expert on Cuba's political system, Jorge Dominguesz, has estimated (based on official Cuban sources) that as many as 10,000 people are detained each year.

Under the new Cuban penal code, the death sentence can be imposed for a number of crimes, such as "sedition," "sabotage," "terrorism," or "acts against the security of the state." Several hundred executions were carried out in the early years of the revolution, but the government has never released any official figures on the number of death sentences. Emigré groups now claim that political executions are carried out every year—but there is no way of confirming this. Still, what we do know is sufficient to conclude that the Castro regime has treated its dissenters with extreme vindictiveness and cruelty; that having begun as the great alternative to Stalinism, the revolution has fallen back on standard Stalinist methods to maintain social and political control.

REPRESSION ABROAD

Given its human rights record at home, it is not surprising that the Castro government should be less than scrupulous about the kinds of regimes it supports abroad. Among the recipients of Cuban largess (including military support) have been Libya's Colonel Qadhafi and Syria's Hafez-el-Assad. But Castro's ally in Ethiopia, Mengistu, is in a league all by himself—and the story of their emergent friendship is a depressing companion piece to the chronicle of Cuba's internal repression.

Military interventions always come with wonderful-sounding testaments to humanity. When the Cubans marched into Ethiopia six years ago, they justified it as a selfless act of "revolutionary internationalism." In reality there hasn't been a recent case of interventionsim that was more cynical or opportunistic.

It's not that the 1974 revolution that toppled Ethiopia's emperor Haile Selassie was undeserving of international support. Indeed, it is hard to think of a country more desperately in need of a revolution than Ethiopia at that time. Under Selassie's feudal and corrupt tyranny Ethiopia was one of the world's poorest, most backward nations. While thousands of people died of starvation, emergency food stores sent by international relief agencies rotted in warehouses because of corruption and mismanagement.

The group of army officers that finally ousted the emperor in 1974 constituted themselves as a national military council, called the Dergue (the committee), and instituted a series of radical and widely supported reforms. The revolution was moving in a socialist direction, but Cuba showed little interest or sympathy during its first two years. (Ethiopia's principal supplier of arms and foreign aid during that period was the United States.) The reasons for Cuba's distance were partly geopolitical, partly ideological. In coordination with Soviet policy, Cuba was heavily committed to socialist Somalia, which had irredentist designs on Ethiopia's Ogaden region, populated by ethnic Somalis. Cuba also supported the liberation movement in the province of Eritrea, which had been waging a guerrilla war for independence from Ethiopia for nearly 15 years.

Cuba had particularly good cause for supporting the Eritreans. Ethiopia's claims to sovereignty over the contested territory were juridically and historically very weak. Eritrea had been an Italian colony from the end of the 19th century until 1941, when Britain captured it and held it for 10 years. Under pressure from the United States, the UN voted in 1951 to turn Eritrea over to Ethiopia in a federated status. By 1961, Selassie unilaterally annexed the territory, with U.S. backing. The Soviet bloc supported independence for Eritrea—by any standard of international justice, the Soviets were right.

For the Cubans, support for the Eritrean guerrillas had another ideological dimension: the leaders of the Eritrean movement were sophisticated Marxists. Gerard Chaliand, the highly regarded French socialist writer, and expert on the third world, has called the Eritrean insurgents "by far the most impressive revolutionary movement produced in Africa in the last two decades." Cuban support for the Eritreans was not merely verbal. It also involved training the guerrillas.

All this turned around suddenly in February 1977, after Lieutenant Colonel Mengistu emerged from the bloody shoot-out at the national palace, proclaimed himself the new chairman of the Dergue and announced that the Ethiopian revolution henceforth would be Marxist-Leninist. The smoke at the palace had hardly cleared when Mengistu received a congratulatory telegram from Fidel Castro. Soon a top Cuban general was in Addis Ababa surveying Mengistu's military needs. Within months, Cuban military advisers were in the country training the expanding Ethiopian army with their new Soviet weapons.

It was the most abrupt foreign policy flip-flop in recent history. The Somalis and the Eritreans were abandoned. The big geopolitical prize in the area was Ethiopia, but in order for the Soviets and Cubans to savor their prize, the empire—the same empire ruled over by Haile Selassie—had to be held together.

Accordingly, when the Mengistu regime met its first serious challenge, in the form of a Somali military incursion into the Ogaden, 17,000 Cuban combat troops went in to counter the Somalis. After repulsing the threat from the east, Mengistu turned his forces north to finally stamp out the Eritrean rebellion. He proved that he could be more ruthless and determined to maintain the empire than even Haile Selassie. Estimates are that half of Mengistu's 300,000-man army (the largest in black Africa) was thrown into a brutal drive to "pacify" Eritrea. The military techniques were straight out of Vietnam—napalm, air assaults on defenseless villages, arrests and torture of thousands. By Mengistu's own admission, in a June 7, 1978, radio broadcast, 30,000 to 50,000 civilians had been killed or wounded by his troops. Nearly a million more were turned into refugees.

In this endeavor the Cubans were Mengistu's loyal, if occasionally embarrassed, helpers. Gone were the days of solidarity with the Eritrean rebels. Now Castro spoke of the necessity of maintaining Ethiopia's "territorial integrity," and of the Eritreans as "secessionists." Though Castro begged off on a direct combat role for his troops, there is considerable evidence from a number of journalistic sources that the Cubans were supplying logistical and technical support for the Ethiopean army offensive.

At the time the Cubans moved into Ethiopia in force, Mengistu was also directing a campaign of terror against his domestic opposition. The principal civilian opposition movement was the Ethiopian Peoples Revolutionary Party (EPRP), with a strong base in the urban centers, among students and civil servants. The EPRP was a Marxist movement which had played a significant role in the agitation against Selassie but which now opposed the militarization of the revolution. In its escalating opposition to the Dergue, the EPRP also began turning toward terrorism. Mengistu responded with what he unashamedly and officially called the "Red Terror campaign." In 1977-78, indiscriminate killings by the Dergue's security forces were so extensive that it put Ethiopia into a class with the worst human rights violators in the world, according to Amnesty International. AI issued a special 16-page report on Ethiopia in October 1978—one of the most gruesome documents it has ever published. Here is an excerpt:

"The government's 'Red Terror' campaign, beginning in mid-November 1977, was directed at alleged supporters of the EPRP and involved mass arrests of young people, the systematic use of torture and the summary killing of large numbers of those arrested. This was mostly carried out by kebele [local revolutionary committees] armed guards or 'revolutionary defense squads' attached to factories and other institutions. Killings took place arbitrarily when groups of young people were seen on the streets, during house searches for EPRP activists, and as a result of kebele tribunal decisions following hearings unregulated by legal formalities. In the case of those 'condemned' in this way the 'execution' followed immediately. It took place at night, the victim's body being left until morning with a warning placard attached to it, stating, 'This was a counter-revolutionary,' 'The Red Terror will flourish,' or some slogan. After these 'executions,' victims' relatives were either forbidden to mourn and ordered to join in public condemnation of those who had been killed, or were allowed to buy back the bodies for burial—'paying for the bullet,' as it was called.

It is estimated that about 5000 young people aged between 12 and 25 were killed in this way in Addis Ababa during the Red Terror, particularly during December 1977, January and February 1978, when . . . an average of about 100 people were killed each night."

In April 1978, with the killings still going on, chairman Mengistu made a triumphal state visit to Cuba. He was received as a hero, embraced by Fidel Castro as a fellow revolutionary and Marxist-Leninist and awarded the Playa Giron (Bay of Pigs) medal. Half a million Cubans turned out at a rally to hear Mengistu and Castro compliment each other and toast their military alliance sealed in blood. The next day virtually the entire issue of Granma, the only daily newpaper Cubans are allowed to read, was devoted to the Mengistu visit.

The spectacles of Mengistu being hailed in Havana as an exemplary Marxist would make for a nice bit of comic opera were it not also the venue for so much human misery. A career army man with no serious education, Mengistu knew nothing of Marxism but a good deal about survival. To that end he had managed to kill most of the actual Marxists in his own county. Yet in his brief immersion in international politics he had also learned that there are times when it helps to fly the red flag. In the spring of 1977 the Carter administration cut off military aid to Ethiopia because of human rights violations. But the Cubans came with no assistant secretaries for human rights, no human rights commissions.

Twelve thousand Cuban troops remain garrisoned in Ethiopia today though the country faces no external threat. The "revolution" they are there to defend has kept the people of Ethiopia as miserable as ever. In fact Mengistu is another emperor in all but name. His military policies have kept the empire together, but the price has been the most massive and desperate refugee problem anywhere in the world. According to a report to the UN high commissioner on refugees, approximately two million people have fled Ethiopia to neighboring states, where they are kept in miserable camps. Another two million have been displaced within Ethiopia. Partly as a result of the dislocations caused by the wars and the enormous military burden, drought and famine are once again plaguing Ethiopia. As for political freedoms and human rights, the people can only look back longingly to the days of Haile Selassie. Gerard Chaliand offered perhaps the saddest epitaph for the Ethiopian revolution when he wrote: "By killing many of the nation's students, the revolution may have killed its own and the country's future."

The approaching 25th anniversary of the Cuban revolution will be a time for judgments on its accomplishments. We are likely to hear a good deal about advances in health and eduction, about the popularity of the regime, about Cuba's determination in the face of American efforts to topple or strangle the revolution. All this is worth consideration, and I do agree that American policy toward Cuba has been both immoral and stupid, and may have contributed to the climate of repression there.

Yet it is also appropriate to pause and reflect on the Cuban revolution from the point of view of its victims. I believe that those of us who once supported the revolution as a "humanist alternative" have a special obligation to say something regarding their plight.

Unfortunately, too many people on the left refuse even to acknowledge the victims, preferring still to celebrate the jailers. Such a left will continue to discredit itself and is all the less likely to be taken seriously when it protests the many moral outrages committed elsewhere in the world.

SELF-DETERMINATION FOR THE PEOPLE OF HONG KONG

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under a previous order of the House, the gentleman from New York (Mr. KEMP) is recognized for 60 minutes.

● Mr. KEMP. Mr. Speaker, the 5 million inhabitants of Hong Kong, both on Victoria Island and in the New Territories, are facing a fundamental change in the nature of their governing authority upon the expiration of the United Kingdom's 99-year leasehold in 1997.

Although we are 13 years away from that expiration date, Great Britain and the People's Republic of China are currently negotiating questions of sovereignty as well as the political, economic, and social institutions that will emerge after 1997. Since Great Britain has signaled its intention to abandon all claims to Hong Kong, including Victoria Island, the people of Hong Kong are apparently to be left to the will of the very government from which most of them fled as refugees.

Of all the rights with which we as free people are concerned, the inalienable right of self-determination is most dear. This right is not open to negotiations between the British and the PRC. Free nations must promote respect for the fundamental human rights and freedoms of all people.

Accordingly, my colleague TOM LANTOS and I are introducing the following concurrent resolution expressing the sense of Congress that the right of the people of Hong Kong to self-determination should be respected, and that no new government should be instituted in Hong Kong absent the consent of the governed. We urge all of our colleagues to join us in this effort to support the rights of the people of Hong Kong.

I would also like to call my colleagues' attention to Tuesday's editorial in the Wall Street Journal, which compellingly presents the democratic and humanitarian perspective on the crisis facing the people of Hong Kong. As the Journal editors point out, "How China reacts to Hong Kong's demands for self-rule will tell the world much more about the real China and its prospects for liberal reform" than the warm reception accorded President Reagan during his 6-day visit.

Also reprinted below is an article from the Financial Times to provide background information on Hong Kong and the status of the negotiations:

H. CON. RES. 299

SUPPORTING SELF-DETERMINATION FOR THE PEOPLE OF HONG KONG

Whereas the United States supports the principle that all people should have the right to determine the form of government under which they live, and

Whereas this principle is embodied in the Declaration of Independence which reads that "governments are instituted among men deriving their just powers from the consent of the governed", and

Whereas the principle of self-determination is an integral part of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights, which has been endorsed by the great majority of states in the world, including the People's Republic of China and Great Britain, and

Whereas the five million inhabitants of Hong Kong are facing a fundamental change in the nature of their governing authority, upon the expiration of the United Kingdom's leasehold over the New Territories in 1997, and

Whereas the best evidence available indicates that a majority of the population of Hong Kong are refugees from the mainland, who in leaving the mainland after 1949 rejected the mainland government's authority over their lives, and

Whereas Hong Kong has a separate and distinct international identity, and a unique and prosperous economic and social heritage and potential, and

Whereas the sovereign government intimately touches and affects the daily lives of each individual citizen of Hong Kong, and

Whereas uncertainty concerning the future of Hong Kong, and frustration over their inability to choose their future political course, have caused many individuals and many key business enterprises to leave the island,

Now therefore be it Resolved by the House of Representatives (the Senate concurring), That it is the sense of Congress that the right of the people of Hong Kong to self-determination should be respected, and that no new government should be imposed on Hong Kong absent the consent of the citizens of Hong Kong.

THOSE HONG KONG BLUES

We've been following President Reagan's China tour, and it has been a good show: Mr. Reagan viewing that incredible clay army uncovered at Xian, the first lady hugging the adorable pandas, the president joking with students about the benefits of an acting course in college. The pundits, too, are praising China's "free-market reforms" and "pragmatic" leadership.

But White House spokesman Larry Speakes said yesterday that Mr. Reagan hadn't changed his fundamental views towards communism. And China's leadership cadres, for their part, made sure that May Day pictures of Stalin and Mao were up in Peking even as the president departed for Shanghai. Maybe reality has been preserved, but just barely.

A sense of reality about the U.S.-Chinese relationship is important because there are issues yet to be resolved between China and the West that are far more serious than trade and cultural exchanges. A week before Mr. Reagan arrived in China, British Foreign Minister Howe ended a visit and admitted publicly for the first time that Hong Kong will become a part of China in 1997, when the British lease on most of the colony expires. The five million free citizens of Hong Kong watched the American president's tour from a very different perspective, no doubt wondering if they were being sold out.

The news that Britain had ceded sovereignty had merely confirmed the worst suspicions. It also reinforced the need for China to do something to convince Hong Kong's people that it won't destroy their free-market achievements. Increasingly, Hong Kongers are saying that the answer is self-rule.

That may sound unrealistic. Even the benign British haven't permitted self-rule. And China doesn't put up those Stalin and Mao posters for nothing. But democratic stirrings have been growing in Hong Kong, and for good reason. It seems like the only solution for that very large proportion of the colony's people who can't flee a Chinese takeover, either for lack of money or lack of passports and visas. Some already have fled the communists once. Life in China has recently improved, certainly, but the government remains totalitarian, the Communist Party brooks no dissent and the economy still runs largely by state command. Any illusions ought to have been shattered when the Chinese twice censored President Reagan's comments on the virtues of capitalism and the danger posed by the Soviet Union.

No free nation has ever willingly accepted communist rule, and Hong Kongers are probably the least likely people in the world to willingly succumb. Already, the appointed Legislative Council, which helps the British governor write laws, has voted to debate any agreement signed by Britain and China. Unofficial citizens groups have also formed, arguing for some voting rights. Ironically, China itself once endorsed this idea: Early in its negotiations with Britain, communist commentators spoke of "Hong Kong people governing Hong Kong" in order to discredit British rule. A few Hong Kongers took them at their word. But China has since backtracked, even publicly rebuking talk of democracy.

The time is ripe to challenge Peking's obstinacy. Having conceded sovereignty, Britain now will ask China for specific promises about the way it will rule Hong Kong. A vocal, self-governing Hong Kong population could help explain to Peking what those promises should be—for example, a free press, its own currency and the right to travel freely. China has already made Hong Kong a "special administrative zone" in its new constitution, allowing it to have laws distinct from the mainland's. But by itself this legalism isn't worth much; Tibet has been a similar "autonomous zone" but was trampled on anyway. Offering Hong Kong people the rights of self-rule might be enough substance to make that promise believable.

The only sure way to preserve Hong Kong's prosperity is for China to convince the Hong Kong people it won't meddle with their lives. Hong Kongers already are holding a referendum of sorts, voting with their wallets by reducing private investment and with their feet by scrounging for foreign passports. Without any better guarantees from China, that exodus will continue, a deterioration not unlike Zimbabwe's since Robert Mugabe took power. How China reacts to Hong Kong's demands for self-rule will tell the world much more about the real China and its prospects for liberal reform than the good show put on these last six days.

HONG KONG'S FUTURE—HOW CHINA GOT ITS WAY

(By Robert Cottrell)

The veil of secrecy covering Hong Kong's future was lifted just enough last week for Sir Geoffrey Howe, the Foreign Secretary, to tell the territory that its days of British administration are numbered. In 1997, when Britain's lease over most of Hong Kong expires, British authority will cease, and the colony will become once more a part of China.

"The Chinese government," Sir Geoffrey said, "have made it clear publicly that they recognise the special circumstances of Hong Kong, and that they want its social and economic systems and lifestyle—in many ways so different from those of mainland China—to remain unchanged. We share with the Chinese Government the strongest possible common interest in these objectives."

Amid the confidence and enthusiasm marking this final leg of Sino-British negotiations, it would be easy to assume that this is exactly what Britain has been negotiating for ever since Mrs. Margaret Thatcher, the Prime Minister, went to Peking and raised the Hong Kong question in September 1982.

The fact is, however, that the settlement now in the process of being reached contains precisely those elements which produced such fear and volatility in Hong Kong only a few months ago—withdrawal of British administration, and the subjection of the territory to Chinese sovereignty with only a paper agreement to separate the territory's liberal capitalism from China's socialism. What has changed?

To start with, the Hong Kong issue has been an extraordinary public relations triumph for China. Its tactics have been an unsophisticated stratagem of carrot-and-stick, but far in advance of Britain's silent shuffling.

While Britain was observing the confidentiality which it was agreed should surround the Sino-British negotiations China was announcing regularly through quasi-official channels the state of the talks, the good fortune which would be Hong Kong's under Chinese sovereignty, and the perils of supporting a continued British administration.

China had the immense negotiating advantage of a simple declared objective—reunification of the motherland, described as a "sacred duty" in the preamble to the Chinese constitution.

Britain, by contrast, has been negotiating on behalf of a territory which it manages at arm's length, in which it has no direct economic interest, and which has itself no substantial democratic means of expressing an opinion of its own.

With the coming into force of the British Nationality Act, Britain publicly underlined the limits of its commitment to the people of Hong Kong while in the middle of negotiating their future. This, together with rows over overseas student's fees, and the negotiation of world textile quotas, in which the interests of Britain and Hong Kong were opposed, did nothing to win popular sympathy for Britain in the territory.

Until Mrs. Thatcher's visit 18 months ago to Perking, Chinese leaders had set out two objectives: resumption of sovereignty and maintenance of Hong Kong's prosperity.

It seems unlikely that China would have been willing to negotiate some indefinite form of continued British linkage but Mrs. Thatcher's public defence of the legality of Britain's claim to sovereignty over Hong Kong effectively foreclosed that option. From that point onward, China's two main objectives seemed to become: resumption of sovereignty, and the ousting of British administration.

China appears to have conceded nothing of significance at the negotiating table. In July 1983, when regular rounds of formal diplomatic talks began, Chinese leaders issued a "10-point plan" for Hong Kong to a delegation from the Hong Kong Federation of Students (HKFS) on a visit to Peking. The HKFS document is regarded as containing the basics of the settlement which Britain as likely—a year or so later—to initial.

At first, Britain argued that a continued British-linked administration would be the best guarantee of maintaining Hong Kong's "stability and prosperity."

Even then, Britain probably saw its role in Hong Kong being very gradually phased out. But it wanted this to be done over the long term, without a deadline only 14 years away.

China's public anger at Britain's proposals strained the confidence of Hong Kong's businessmen and investors, culminating in the collapse of the Hong Kong dollar in September 1983, which in turn helped bring down a local bank. Both the dollar and the bank were eventually rescued, but China's evident willingness to jeopardise Hong Kong's social and economic stability persuaded Britain to drop its own plans for continued British administration.

The game was effectively over: China had prevailed.

Britain appears to have nursed some hopes early on that China's promises of autonomy to Hong Kong could be in some way "guaranteed," though quite how is not clear. To judge by Sir Geoffrey's comments on Friday, Britain is now looking for "assurances" rather than "guarantees"—those assurances would amount simply to the publication of China's promises in the form of a detailed agreement between the two countries.

China would prefer a shorter, more general, more abstract document. It regards the "basic law" of post-1997 Hong Kong as something to be drawn up by China in consultation with the people of the territory, not as something to be negotiated by Britain in exchange for a cession of sovereignty.

It is therefore far from certain, that Britain will get as detailed an agreement as it might like on Hong Kong's future. But if this situation seems more "acceptable" to Hong Kong than it did two years ago, it is probably for several related reasons:

China convinced Hong Kong relatively early in the negotiations that a cession of British sovereignity and administration was inevitable.

China greeted any British opposition to its plans with outbursts of public anger calculated to frighten Hong Kong and destabilise its financial markets.

Hong Kong people are so tired of uncertainty that the prospect of a settlement is welcome if only as something to plan towards.

At least China will not touch Hong Kong until 1997, leaving 13 more years of the status quo.

To some Britain has seemed weak and aloof while China's strength has been clear for all to see.

Britain has no real negotiating cards left to play now—not even withholding its approval of an agreement. China has set its September deadline, not necessarily for reaching an agreement with Britain, but for announcing unilaterally its own plans for Hong Kong's future if agreement has not been reached. If anything, Britain may need an agreement more than China, if it wants a sure and stable basis on which to rest its administration of Hong Kong until 1997.

When an agreement does come, it may be as much what is left unsaid, as what is said, which will determine how well the territory works after 1997. The agreement will no doubt promise Hong Kong people a succession of "freedoms." It is not likely to mention in passing that such freedoms are already promised to China's people under China's existing constitution, but go unobserved in what remains a totalitarian State.

The agreement may promise Hong Kong a "democratic" government—though Sir Geoffrey spoke on Friday of a "representative" government, and ducked a request to distinguish between democracy and representation. If so, it will be worth bearing in mind that Xu Jiatun, Peking's senior representative in Hong Kong, has said that socialism as practised by China represents democracy in its widest sense.

The agreement is likely to include words to the effect that China will not send down cadres from Peking to interfere with Hong Kong's autonomous government. But it can hardly speak of other, more subtle, ways of influencing the territory through fear or favour.

What of Peking's already-extensive business presence in Hong Kong? Will such firms, and their respective ministries, be able for example to restrain themselves from using political "clout" in commercial transactions?

By the time any Sino-British agreement on Hong Kong's future comes into force, it will already be 13 years old. Most of the administrators who negotiated or ratified it will have retired. Hong Kong's autonomy will ultimately depend not on negotiations, nor agreements, but on the strength and impartiality of its future administrators, and the extent to which those virtues command respect in Peking.●

BANKING ON SUCCESS WITH OLYMPIC COINS

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under a previous order of the House, the gentleman from Illinois (Mr. ANNUNZIO) is recognized for 5 minutes.

● Mr. ANNUNZIO. Mr. Speaker, when we started the Olympic coin program, I knew that once we promoted the fact that all profits go to the athletes and made the coins available to the public, Americans would purchase the coins with enthusiasm. I anticipated that a large sector of the American public shared my concern that our athletes receive enough funding to maintain necessary training levels. As the 1984 Los Angeles Olympics approach, I can see my prediction becoming reality. The Olympic coin program which I introduced is in place, and I predict that sales will be at such high levels that banks will barely be able to order enough coins to satisfy the public's demand.

In Louisiana, the Rayne State Bank & Trust Co. did not even get a chance to offer its initial order of the coins to the public. When the bank received the first shipment, Rayne State Bank's own employees and friends purchased all coins available. As the bank's customers clamored for the coins, director of marketing, Linda Brooks placed a second order for 1984 silver and gold commemorative coins. She expects this shipment to be a sell-out as well. The bank is pleased to be a participant in this successful program, and plans to actively promote Olympic coin sales by advertising the coins on Rayne State Bank's marquee and by displaying Olympic coin literature in the lobby.

Over 1,800 banks throughout our country have agreed to display and encourage the sale of Olympic coins. By making the coins so available to the consumer, banks are fast becoming active contributors to the Olympic effort. We have already raised over $35 million for the American Olympic athletes through the coin program. If banks everywhere lend the same enthusiasm to Olympic coin sales as Rayne State Bank and its customers and employees, we will reach the $100 million mark in no time.

The Olympic athletes will be giving their best for our country in Los Angeles this summer. We can all show our appreciation and support for these wonderful young Americans through the purchase of Olympic coins. Financial institutions, such as Rayne State Bank, can have a significant positive impact while encouraging our Olympic team. And as the world watches the XXIII Olympiad, financial institutions and their customers can feel proud of the contribution made to the American Olympic effort.●

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under a previous order of the House, the gentleman from Oregon (Mr. WEAVER) is recognized for 10 minutes.

Mr. WEAVER. Mr. Speaker, I came on the House floor tonight with the intent of engaging in debate the gentleman from New York (Mr. KEMP) in monetary policy, but we have intervened with a debate on our policy in Central America and on the Cuban Government and I would just like to comment briefly that the case made by the gentleman from Georgia and the facts that he outlined shows very clearly that the world is fast going toward totalitarian brutality of both the left and the right, and it is a very dangerous thing for the people of the world, for our own security.

The polarization in this world today by the extremist forces, the totalitarian forces of both communism and fascism lead me to believe that the era of 1930 when we had the rise of Stalin, the rise of Hitler, is coming again.

So we must, by all odds, assure ourselves of freedom here in this Nation.

I only want to make one comment on what the gentleman from Georgia has said tonight. He outlined very carefully and in great detail the brutality of certain Communist governments. And, indeed, this is tragic and horrible.

But he had little to say about the brutality of what is happening in San Salvador where the Americans, American nuns of the Catholic Church have been murdered by rightwing death squads and those murderers have not been brought to justice by that government. We have had reported as many as 37,000 people killed, murdered, by death squads that have at least the acquiescense of the Government of El Salvador and little has been done about it.

But the tragedy here is while we do not support the totalitarian regimes and brutality of other countries, we are supporting this brutal regime in El Salvador and I do not believe this country should enforce the double standard. if we oppose, as we should, brutality and repression and tryranny in one form, we should oppose brutality, tyranny, and repression in another form.

But just the opposite is occurring. The gentleman from Georgia tonight said that we should be sending this regime in El Salvador money, taxpayers' money, millions and hundreds of millions of dollars of it and possibly even troops of our Army. I think that this would be tragic. It would exacerbate the condition that this world is finding itself in of brutality and tyranny on both sides. A precarious situation for our world.

But I want to mention, as my intent was to debate monetary policy, because there was so much time taken by only one point of view tonight on monetary policy, and debate on monetary policy is very healthy. I think we should be talking a lot about it. My own district in Oregon has heavy unemployment. Lumber prices that the economy of my district depends upon in its wood products industry have fallen drastically in the last few months to a point where it is going to be difficult for our mills to remain open. We have never even come out of the depression for the last 4 years.

It was said that the Federal Reserve Board is the problem today. I hold very little brief for the Federal Reserve Board. I think that they are an accumulation of people who represent the large banks in this Nation and very little else.

Because Mr. KEMP of New York felt that all problems revolved about the Federal Reserve Board, I feel that Mr. KEMP, the author, or at least the promoter of supply-side economics, is using the Federal Reserve Board in this instance as a scapegoat for the failure of his own supply-side economics.

There is no question that supply-side economics has failed and failed miserably. It was supposed to, as debate of 3 years ago before the House had promised, it was supposed to bring in additional revenues to the Federal Government from income tax from people who are making much more money because supply-side economics would boost our economy so greatly. This, of course, has failed abysmally. The income has not been produced.

On the contrary we face terrifying deficits of $200 billion a year and it is those deficits that is giving the economy right now its temporary and very false and ephemeral boost. If you pour $200 billion of borrowed money into an economy right now, of printed money, you are going to have prosperity for a while. It will not last long, but you will. You take any community and suddenly bring a great deal of printed money into that community and give it to people and let them spend it in the stores and the places of business in that community and you will have a sudden prosperity. But then you have to pay the piper, because you are going to get inflation and higher interest rates and things will start closing down.

Indeed, that is what is happening today because of those $200 billion deficits interest rates are rising sharply. I think people are not aware that long-term U.S. Treasury bonds today are at over 13 percent in return. Now that is higher than Treasury bond interest rates were in 1979, in the year that we began to go into the recession, or that led to the recession. It is a very dangerous thing.

The gentleman from New York had mentioned that our economy is booming but is now being curtailed by the Federal Reserve Board.

On the contrary, manufacturers' orders reported this week were up, yes, and it looks like the economy is booming, manufacturers' orders being up. But if we look at what those orders were, 57-percent increase in military orders caused that rise. If we took all other orders, they actually fell. In the general economy, manufacturers' orders fell for the month of March.

But because of the enormous amounts of money, the billions of dollars that we are spending today on the military, this money being pumped into the economy is giving us a false sense of prosperity that will not last. And it cannot last because, as I say already interest rates are going up with U.S. Treasury bond long-term rates that affect the mortgage rates so critical to my district up above 13 percent today.

So I say that supply-side economics has failed miserably. It has led to these huge deficits as supply-side economics with its tax cuts for the wealthy and the increase now in military spending are really what is undermining our economy today.

I feel that the Federal Reserve Board is certainly not helping things because all it is concerned about, without any question, are the largest international banks and they will represent the large international banks as they did over 2 years, when the Mexican Government could not make its payments to the banks. The Federal Reserve Board called an emergency meeting on that famous 13th of August and after that meeting wrote out a check for $2 billion to Mexico which was handed to the international banks in New York City.

I wish they had the same concern, the Federal Reserve Board, for our various businesses and manufacturers in this country, including the ones so critical to my own district, the timber industry.

With that, I wanted just simply to say these few remarks, Mr. Speaker, in response to the debate earlier this evening by the gentleman from New York (Mr. KEMP), who I commend for introducing a debate on monetary policy.

I think it is critical, but I wanted to show that there are other aspects to it. That is why I make the remarks tonight.

RESULTS OF POLL OF NINTH CONGRESSIONAL DISTRICT ON BUDGET

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under a previous order of the House, the gentleman from California (Mr. STARK) is recognized for 5 minutes.

● Mr. STARK. Mr. Speaker, during the coming weeks, Members of the House will be called on for a number of difficult votes in the areas of military spending, foreign aid, and the conference report on the tax reform bill.

All of these bills are key to finding ways to reduce the budget deficits. I believe a recent poll which I took in my congressional district should add some strength to our resolve to make necessary reforms and budget cuts.

I still do not think the Congress has gotten the word on how very much the American people want deficits reduced and military waste stopped.

In mid-February, I polled the Ninth California Congressional District on whether they would increase, decrease, or keep the same spending levels in the major budget categories. I then asked these voters to add up their tax totals and spending totals and see what deficit figure they came up with.

There was a good response to the poll. Results are still coming in, because it was a somewhat hard poll to complete and because hundreds of people chose to write additional letters and comments. We have tabulated about 2,700 responses.

Mr. Speaker, do you know what the average deficit these voters came up with?

Thirty-nine billion dollars.

And here we sit debating how to amend the President's proposals just to reduce the deficit from $180 billion to $170 or $165 billion.

We sit here worrying about what people will say about tax increases. But the response in my district clearly shows that citizens are willing to raise taxes to reduce the deficit. For example, 71 percent of the respondents tabulated support a rise in corporate income taxes. An even larger percentage, 77 percent, favor raising excise charges, such as those on tobacco.

As our country sinks deeper and deeper into debt, citizens plead for Congress to act courageously. To close tax loopholes, to crack down on unfair tax giveaways, and, ultimately, to raise taxes in a fair and evenhanded way.

The poll results send another urgent message: Reduce military spending. The people of California's Ninth District understand all too well that the Pentagon budget is out of control. And they are angry about it; 86 percent of those who responded want defense spending reduced; 86 percent. It is hard to imagine a clearer mandate for congressional action.

My constituents are willing to pay their fair share to reduce the deficit, but they will not blindly support more huge increases for the Defense Department. And, after all, how can Congress in good conscience ask citizens to help raise revenues while Pentagon spenders pay $9,000 for a 12-cent wrench?

On other points, overwhelmingly, people want reductions in funding of agricultural programs, especially price supports. Similarly, the vast majority of respondents favor a decrease in international affairs spending, with many expressing outrage at U.S. support of corrupt dictatorship. In other areas of Federal expenditures, such as education, health, welfare, and transportation, constituents were more supportive of current spending levels, though many urged a redoubling of efforts to eliminate waste and inefficiency.

I want to express my appreciation to all who responded to the survey. People gave serious thought to the questions and provided many interesting and useful insights. I hope the exercise was as educational for them as it was for me.

I also hope that we can do better than we have done to date. My budget votes will be cast for sharper reductions in the deficit totals.●

THE COURTS AND EMPLOYER SANCTIONS

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under a previous order of the House, the gentleman from Kentucky (Mr. MAZZOLI) is recognized for 10 minutes.

● Mr. MAZZOLI. Mr. Speaker, I would like to draw my colleagues attention to a recent editorial that appeared April 23 in my hometown paper, the Louisville Times, commenting on a recent Supreme Court decision, Immigration and Naturalization Service against Delgado.

This decision upheld the legality of "factory sweeps" by the Immigration Service in which immigration officers sweep through places of employment asking for immigration documents. Many undocumented aliens are apprehended through this method.

The Louisville Times editorial correctly points out that while such searches may have a place in immigration law enforcement, the effort lacks balance so long as the employer—who often exploits the undocumented worker—goes scot-free.

Mr. Speaker, that the employer is not now a player in this drama makes no sense. Mr. Justice Powell, in a concurring opinion in Delgado, agrees. There, he writes that while illegal workers are penalized "our law irrationally continues to permit U.S. employers to hire them. Many employers actively recruit low-paid illegal immigrant labor, encouraging—with Government tolerance—illegal entry into the United States. This incongruity in our immigration statutes is not calculated to increase respect for the rule of law."

Mr. Speaker, Congress has before it the vehicle to solve that incongruity. H.R. 1510, the Immigration Reform and Control Act would properly balance the legal burdens of enforcing the Nation's immigration laws by penalizing those employers who knowingly hire undocumented workers as well as the undocumented alien.

These employers hurt American labor just as much as the illegal workers do. Employer sanctions such as those contained in H.R. 1510 would balance the solution to our current immigration problems. Any reform that does not include employer sanctions is no reform at all.

Mr. Speaker, I would like to insert in the RECORD the Louisville Times editorial of May 23, 1984. Once again, the editors are to be commended for their timely and thoughtful analysis of this complex issue.

TARGETING WRONG LAWBREAKERS

Advocates of the Mazzoli-Simpson immigration bill have a new U.S. Supreme Court decision to support the need for the reform legislation.

The ruling, which is soundly based in existing law, allows authorities to "sweep" farms, factories and other workplaces to determine whether illegal aliens are employed in them. The illegal workers are subject to penalties, including deportation.

Certainly such searches have a place. But the burden ought to be shifted from the workers—many of whom are poorly educated and are working at jobs that American citizens shun. Instead, the penalty should be paid by employers, who in most cases now escape sanctions. Mazzoli-Simpson, which is cosponsored by Louisville Rep. Romano Mazzoli, would crack down on the exploiters.

Certainly the sweeps seem to be effective. Immigration and Naturalization Service officials, according to The New York Times, say they are the source of 20,000 arrests a year in Los Angeles alone. However, the 9th Circuit Court of Appeals in that city struck down the procedure as an unconstitutional "seizure," violating the Fourth Amendment.

When the case reached the Supreme Court, Justice William Rehnquist, in his majority opinion, held that "mere questioning" fails to constitute a seizure. Six other justices came to the same conclusion. In a concurring opinion, Justice Lewis Powell suggested that sweeps should be considered essentially the same as border inspections, where the authority of immigration officials is not disputed.

But dissenters William Brennan and Thurgood Marshall made a valid point. They claimed that the sweeps create a "frightening picture of people subjected to wholesale interrogation" under essentially captive conditions.

However, those who violate the law should be punished. Congress has an obligation to crack down on employers—not just those whom they hire. When that happens, the exploitation of illegal immigrants can be reduced, thus making U.S. borders more secure by cutting the temptation to sneak into the country to find work.●

LEGISLATION TO ADVANCE THE CONTADORA PROCESS

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under a previous order of the House, the gentleman from California (Mr. PANETTA) is recognized for 10 minutes.

● Mr. PANETTA. Mr. Speaker, yesterday the House joined in unanimous approval of legislation (H. Con. Res. 261) expressing support for the Contadora regional peace efforts. That vote, reaffirming House passage of similar legislation last November, demonstrates this body's continued commitment to making the negotiated settlement of the conflict in Central America a central aspect of U.S. foreign policy. I rise at this time to offer legislation to bring tangible meaning to our words of support.

Mr. Speaker, Congress and the American people have watched with growing alarm each chapter in the deepening quagmire of U.S. military involvement in Central America. The recent revelation of the secret U.S. role in the mining of three Nicaraguan ports came as a great shock to Congress, as it did to the Nation as a whole. Yet the mining ought not to be viewed as an isolated incident, but rather as indicative of the administration's focus on military solutions to the complex challenges posed by the unrest in Central America.

In recent months we have witnessed a dramatic expansion of the U.S. military presence and role in Central America. In addition to its much publicized involvement in the fighting in Nicaragua and El Salvador, it is now reported that the United States has developed plans for and is in the position to assume a direct combat role in Central America. Just last week the Navy began a series of extensive exercises in the Caribbean—Ocean Venture I—which will eventually involve 350 ships and 30,000 American servicemen. Likewise, recent incidents of hostile fire directed at Americans in Honduras have drawn increasing attention to the presence of several thousand U.S. troops and an ambitious military construction program in that country.

With the details of its military strategy unfolding at a rapid rate, the lack of any real diplomatic initiative in the administration's Central American policies has become increasingly apparent. Without question the United States has an overriding security interest in promoting stability in this hemisphere. It is equally clear, however, that if the means used to achieve security are primarily military, the outcome will be decided—if only in the short term—by the balance of military strength. Such a policy inevitably moves the spectre of a direct U.S. combat role in Central America closer and closer to reality. In such a contest, moreover, the forces of moderation have little chance of making themselves heard.

Mr. Speaker, the dangers of such a course are evident from the record of past U.S. involvement in Central America. Periodic U.S. military intervention in the region has not provided a foundation for lasting peace and stability. In fact, our experience in Central America has shown that military force is a poor substitute for foreign policy. America's best prospect for reasserting its leadership lies in promoting a collective approach to the region's economic and security problems. This approach would seek to involve our Latin neighbors as economic partners and sovereign equals, working in concert with the United States to advance shared national goals.

The idea of a peace based on regional cooperation is more than an idle dream: it is the promise embodied in the 21-point agreement already accepted by the key Central American states under the sponsorship of the Contadora nations—Mexico, Venezuela, Colombia, and Panama. As my colleagues are aware, the Contadora effort reached a significant milestone earlier this year when the participating foreign ministers agreed to establish three working commissions to prepare proposals for treaties based on the framework for peace first established last fall. These commissions seek to:

Establish agreed upon limits on the levels of military force in the region;

Eliminate foreign military advisers from the region and all forms of support for insurgents;

Perfect mechanisms of communications for resolving incidents among states;

Promote national reconciliation on the basis of justice, freedom, and democracy with full respect for human rights;

Create independent electoral bodies to insure popular participation under conditions of equality; and

Foster greater cooperation among states in pursuing regional economic development and refugee assistance efforts.

Those negotiations are entering an extremely delicate stage and American activities in the region will inevitably play a powerful role in determining their success or failure. For its part, the administration has pledged full U.S. support for the Contadora process. In fact, the President's Bipartisan Commission on Central America concluded that U.S. support for the development of regional relations such as those proposed under the Contadora plan ought to be a "key objective" of U.S. policy.

But despite its professed support, the administration continues to withhold the kind of substantive backing which could lead to the fulfillment of the Contradora process. Moreover, by choosing to pursue policies which emphasize military solutions, the administration makes the goal of a comprehensive peace settlement ever more remote.

Mr. Speaker, by definition the United States cannot be supporting the Contadora initiative and at the same time stepping up the "secret" war against Nicaragua, escalating the war in El Salvador, and preparing to fight a regional war. This inconsistency was underscored in a recent communique issued by the four foreign ministers of the Contadora Group decrying the grave deterioration in Central America caused by the U.S. mining of Nicaragua's ports.

If the United States is committed to the Contadora process, then we ought to act now to enforce its conditions. We must match our deeds with our words by bringing to an immediate halt those policies which run counter to the spirit of the Contadora process.

The legislation I am proposing today attempts to reestablish diplomacy as the central priority of United States-Central American policy by calling for direct consultations with and support for the Contadora Group and by suspending all military activities—overt and covert—in Central America for a period of 3 months.

With regard to the former, my bill directs the President to initiate direct dialog with the Contadora Group for the purpose of developing a common strategy for peace, and to make available such advisory and technical services as may be requested. In addition, it calls upon the President to work actively to persuade other governments involved in the region to join in observing the conditions for peace established by Contadora.

The second component of this legislation provides for a temporary suspension of U.S. support for or participation in military or paramilitary activities in Central America in order to promote a favorable climate for the Contadora negotiations. This 90-day respite would afford the peace process time essential to reaching an agreement, free from the threat of escalating conflict.

To conform with the conditions laid down last January, this suspension necessarily would apply to: First, U.S. military assistance and construction programs in the region; second, military training exercises; third, reconnaissance flights on behalf of the armed forces of other nations; and fourth, support for military or paramilitary operations in Nicaragua. In addition, the measure would cap the number of U.S. personnel stationed in Central America at the current level.

No single actor in the Central America drama has a greater capacity to shape the future direction of events in that region than the United States. The success of the Contadora process cannot, of course, be brought about solely by U.S. action. For these reasons, the legislation I propose also directs the President to report to Congress by the end of the 3-month period on the progress of the Contadora negotiations and on the good faith demonstrated by the participating states in adhering to the agreed-upon conditions. In proceeding, it is clear that the United States must take into account whether those nations have demonstrated equivalent restraint on the military buildup of the region. This will provide a basis for future U.S. initiatives in Central America.

Mr. Speaker, this country has an essential role to play in the Americas, but that role must be one of leadership and cooperation, not of domination. It is the purpose of this legislation to lead us away from the morass of military intervention in Central America by seizing the opportunity presented by the Contadora process. We must act now, before the military escalation in the region precludes the option of diplomacy and makes direct U.S. military intervention all but inevitable.

The President recently spoke of the need for a consensus with regard to U.S. policy in Central America. If that consensus exists, it exists in the opposition of the American people to a U.S. combat role in Central America. I urge my colleagues to join this effort to avert the unfolding tragedy in Central America.

The text of the bill follows:

H.R. 5577

A bill to provide for direct consultations between the United States Government and the participants in the Contadora process in order to develop a common policy for promoting peace in Central America, and to provide for a temporary suspension of United States support for or participation in military and paramilitary activities in Central America in order to provide a favorable climate for the Contadora process

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That (a) the Congress finds that—

(1) the achievement of security in Central America depends on the resolve and the cooperation of the people and governments of the hemisphere in working through peaceful means to resist subversion and destabilization, as exemplified by the diplomatic efforts of the Contadora nations of Colombia, Mexico, Panama, and Venezuela in working with the nations of Costa Rica, El Salvador, Guatemala, Honduras, and Nicaragua;

(2) a significant and hopeful milestone in the development of a system of regional relations was reached with the adoption by the foreign ministers of those five nations on January 8, 1984, of "Principles for the Implementation of the Commitments Undertaken in the Document of Objectives", establishing three working commissions to prepare proposals for treaties which would—

(A) establish agreed-upon limits on the levels of military force in the region;

(B) eliminate foreign military advisers from the region and eliminate all forms of support for insurgents;

(C) perfect mechanisms of communication for resolving incidents among states;

(D) promote national reconciliation on the basis of justice, freedom, and democracy with full respect for human rights;

(E) create independent electoral bodies to ensure popular participation under conditions of equality; and

(F) foster greater cooperation among states in pursuing regional economic development and refugee assistance efforts; and

(3) the United States can make a significant contribution in facilitating the translation of the agreed principles into practical and concrete arrangements by offering such assistance and support as may be requested and by pursuing policies toward the countries of that region which are sensitive to the principles embraced by the participants in the Contadora process and which promote a climate of peace.

(b) Therefore, it is the purpose of this Act to provide—

(1) for direct consultations between the United States Government and the participants in the Contadora process in order to develop a common policy for promoting peace in Central America; and

(2) for a temporary suspension of United States support for or participation in military and paramilitary activities in Central America in order to promote a favorable climate for the Contadora process.

SEC. 2. (a) The United States—

(1) shall initiate a dialogue with the participants in the Contadora process for the purpose of developing a common strategy for promoting regional stability; and

(2) should assist, through nonmilitary means, efforts to implement of the objectives established in the "Principles for the Implementation of the Commitments Undertaken in the Document of Objectives" by offering such advisory services as may be requested in accordance with the terms of that agreement and by exerting vigorous diplomatic efforts to persuade other governments involved in the Central American region to observe these conditions.

(b) In order to help achieve a regional peace agreement, the United States should announce its willingness to pursue multilateral negotiations with the Central American countries for the purpose of obtaining agreement on the treaties described in subsection (a) of the first section of this Act.

SEC. 3. (a) During the 3-month period beginning on the date of enactment of this Act—

(1) the United States shall suspend—

(A) all assistance under chapter 2 or chapter 5 of part II of the Foreign Assistance Act of 1961 or under the Arms Export Control Act for Central American countries, and

(B) all sales of, export licenses for, and other transfers of defense articles or defense services under the Arms Export Control Act for Central American countries, except that this paragraph does not apply with respect to the provision of medical facilities or supplies (which may not include any equipment which will be armed or otherwise used for combat, troop support, or any other nonmedical purpose) or to the provision of medical training or services;

(2) the United States shall suspend all construction activities with respect to military facilities in Central American countries, including any construction, modification, or improvement of any existing or new military facility;

(3) United States Armed Forces shall not participate in any training exercises in or off the shores of Central American countries, and any such participation occurring on the date of enactment of this Act shall be terminated immediately;

(4) the number of members of the United States Armed Forces in any Central American country may not exceed the number in that country on the date of enactment of this Act, except that this paragraph shall not preclude the introduction of United States Armed Forces into a Central American country in order to meet a clear and present danger of hostile attack upon the United States or to meet a clear and present danger to, and to provide for the essential and immediate evacuation of, United States citizens;

(5) the United States shall suspend all air reconnaissance flights by aircraft operated by or in behalf of the United States Government for the purpose of providing tactical intelligence information for combat operations by the armed forces of any Central American country; and

(6) there shall be no obligation or expenditure of any funds available to the Central Intelligence Agency, the Department of Defense, or any other agency or entity of the United States involved in intelligence activities, for the purpose or which would have the effect of supporting, directly or indirectly, military or paramilitary operations in Nicaragua by any nation, group, organization, movement, or individual.

(b) As used in this Act, the term "Central American countries" means Costa Rica, El Salvador, Guatemala, Honduras, and Nicaragua.

SEC. 4. Not later than 3 months after the date of enactment of this Act, the President shall submit to the Congress a report—

(1) describing the steps he has taken to carry out section 2(a)(1) of this Act;

(2) discussing the progress being made in bringing about a peaceful resolution of the conflict in Central America on the basis of the Contadora process;

(3) assessing whether, durng the temporary suspension pursuant to this Act of United States support for and participation in military and paramilitary activities, the Central American countries conducted themselves in a manner consistent with the "Principles for the Implementation of the Commitments Undertaken in the Document of Objectives"; and

(4) making recommendations on the actions the United States should take in the future to promote the peaceful resolution of the conflict in Central America.●

EXPLANATION OF TITLE X—CENTRAL AMERICA—OF H.R. 5421

(Mr. FASCELL asked and was given permission to extend his remarks at this point in the RECORD and to include extraneous matter.)

● Mr. FASCELL. Mr. Speaker, the following statement is a section-by-section analysis of title X of H.R. 5421. When the Committee on Foreign Affairs reported H.R. 5119, the fiscal year 1985 foreign assistance bill, on March 21, the committee did not include any provisions on or assistance for the countries of Central America. It was determined that the committee needed additional time to review developments in the region and to reach agreement on the appropriate congressional response.

Subsequently, a majority of the members of the Democratic caucus of the Committee on Foreign Affairs reached a consensus agreement on the issues involving Central America. A clean bill was introduced, H.R. 5420, which includes the committee-reported bill, H.R. 5119, titles I–IX, plus the caucus position on Central America, title X. H.R. 5421, which is to be the text for floor consideration, is identical to H.R. 5420 with one exception. H.R. 5420 includes a provision, section 1003(h), for expedited procedures for consideration of a joint resolution approving the second portion of security assistance for El Salvador. Mr. MOAKLEY introduced H.R. 5421, which deletes subsection (h) of secton 1003, in order to meet the concern of members of the Rules Committee that this expedited procedure provision would circumvent the role of that committee.

I am placing the following section-by-section explanation in the RECORD in order that Members be fully informed on the provisions in title X on Central America of H.R. 5421, which is scheduled for floor action the week of May 7.

SECTION-BY-SECTION ANALYSIS—TITLE X (H.R. 5421)

This title contains recommendations on H.R. 4874, the Administration's request for Central America, which was entitled "Central America Democracy, Peace and Development Initiative Act of 1984" and which comprises both the normal bilateral assistance program for Central America and the Administration's requests pursuant to the recommendations of the National Bipartisan Commission on Central America (the "Kissinger Commission").

Title X authorizes the appropriation of funds for fiscal years 1984 and 1985 for economic and security assistance to the countries of Central America as follows:

SECTION 1001—FISCAL YEAR 1985 AUTHORIZATIONS

This section authorizes the appropriation of funds for fiscal year 1985 for Central America. These authorizations are in addition to those contained in earlier titles in the bill, which do not include any money for Central America.

Subsection (a)(1) authorizes $30,000,000 under section 23 of the Arms Export Control Act for on-budget direct credits for foreign military sales, in addition to amounts otherwise available, and increases the aggregate ceiling on such credits by $30,000,000. This amount is the same as the Executive branch request, and includes $15,000,000 for El Salvador, $10,000,000 for Guatemala, and $5,000,000 for Panama.

Subsection (a)(2) authorizes, in addition to amounts otherwise available, the following amounts to carry out provisions of the Foreign Assistance Act of 1961: $199,800,000 under chapter 2 of part II for grant military assistance programs (a 10 percent cut from the Executive request); $3,510,000 under chapter 5 of part II for international military education and training programs (a 10 percent cut from the Executive request); and $479,000,000 under chapter 4 of part II for Economic Support Funds (the ESF level reflects the following cuts: −$30,000,000 from Guatemala, −$50,000,000 from El Salvador, −$20 million from Honduras, and −$61,600,000 from regional programs). All funds cut in this subsection were transferred to the Reconstruction Fund established in Section 1007.

Subsection (a)(3) amends section 515(c)(1) of the Foreign Assistance Act to allow more than six military personnel to manage security assistance programs in El Salvador and Honduras.

Subsection (b)(1) authorizes, in addition to amounts otherwise available, the following amounts to carry out provisions of the Foreign Assistance Act of 1961: $65,562,500 under section 103 for bilateral agriculture, rural development, and nutrition programs; $14,183,750 under section 104(b) for bilateral population assistance programs; $38,975,000 under section 104(c) for bilateral health assistance programs; $81,803,750 under section 105 for bilateral education and human resources development programs; and $82,275,000 under section 106 for bilateral energy, private voluntary organizations, and selected development activities programs. These amounts reflect a $10,000,000 cut from the Executive request for development assistance for Guatemala, spread over the five accounts, and a $20,000,000 increase in the education account for scholarship programs. The subsection also authorizes $6,016,000 under section 667 for AID operating expenses.

Subsection (b)(2) increases the ceiling on housing guaranties outstanding at any one time under title III of chapter 2 of part I of the Foreign Assistance Act of 1961 by $80,000,000, the same as the Executive request.

Subsection (c) authorizes, in addition to amounts otherwise available, $9,000,000 for the Peace Corps, the same as the Executive request.

Subsection (d) provides that amounts appropriated pursuant to this section are authorized to remain available until expended.

SECTION 1002—SUPPLEMENTAL AUTHORIZATIONS

This section authorizes the appropriation of supplemental funds for fiscal year 1984, and for fiscal year 1985. These authorizations are in addition to those previously enacted.

Subsection (a)(1) authorizes the following amounts to be appropriated for fiscal year 1984, in addition to funds otherwise available, to carry out provisions of the Foreign Assistance Act of 1961: $7,200,000 under section 104(c) for bilateral population assistance programs; $4,000,000 under section 105 for bilateral education and human resources development programs; and $19,088,000 under section 106 for bilateral energy, private voluntary organizations, and selected development activities programs. These amounts relect a $5,000,000 cut from the Executive request for development assistance for Guatemala, spread over each of the accounts. This subsection also authorizes $18,250,000 under chapter 4 of part II for Economic Support Funds for fiscal year 1984, a $101,500,000 cut from the Executive request.

Subsection (a)(2) authorizes an additional $1,000,000 for the Peace Corps for fiscal year 1984, the same as the Executive request.

Subsection (a)(3) authorizes an additional $10,000,000 (the same as the Executive request) for fiscal year 1985 for the purposes of the reserve fund established pursuant to section 223 of the Foreign Assistance Act (the housing guaranty program).

Subsection (a)(4) authorizes an additional $17,000,000 for fiscal year 1985 for the United States Information Agency to carry out international information, educational, cultural, and exchange programs for Central America. This amount is $3,000,000 less than the Executive request.

Subsection (b) provides that amounts appropriated pursuant to this section are authorized to remain available until expended.

SECTION 1003—CONDITIONS ON SECURITY ASSISTANCE TO EL SALVADOR

This section provides that security assistance for fiscal year 1985 may be provided to El Salvador only if certain conditions are met. Basically, this section provides that one-third of the military aid and one-half of the economic aid approved by the Congress will be available if the President can certify that the Salvadoran government has made demonstrated progress in achieving all the objectives set out in this section. The remainder of the aid would be available only if the President certified, and the Congress agreed through a joint resolution of approval, that the Salvadoran government has achieved certain objectives (relating to control of death squads, compliance with the Geneva Convention, and good faith negotiations), and has made additional demonstrated progress on the remainder of the objectives (relating) to detention of political prisoners, judicial reform, freedom of the press and freedom of association, and land reform).

Subsection (a) states that the President shall ensure that military assistance and economic support assistance are furnished to El Salvador in a manner which fosters demonstrated progress toward the political development, economic development, and security of that country.

Subsection (b)(1) requires that not later than September 30, 1984, the President shall submit to the Congress a detailed report fully describing the policies of the Government of El Salvador for achieving the objectives referred to above. This report shall also include a determination by the President whether the Government of El Salvador has made demonstrated progress in achieving the objectives outlined in subsection (c), the President's detailed assessment of the strengths and weaknesses of the policies of the Government of El Salvador in protecting and advancing human rights in that country with respect to each of those objectives, and a comprehensive review of the factors contributing to the political, economic, and security situation in that country.

Subsection (b)(2) requires that if, at any time during fiscal year 1985, the President determines that the Government of El Salvador (A) has achieved the objectives described in paragraphs (1) (death squads), (2) (Geneva Convention), and (3) (negotiations) of subsection (c), and (B) since the report was submitted pursuant to subsection (b)(1) has made additional demonstrated progress in achieving the objectives described in paragraphs (4), (5), (6), and (7) of subsection (c), then the President shall submit a second report to the Congress containing the material described in subjection (b)(1).

Subsection (c) states that the objectives for the Government of El Salvador referred to in the previous two subsections are the following:

(1) Removal from military, security, and police forces of those individuals repsonsible for or associated with the death squads, and establishment of effective control over those forces and over paramilitary groups which receive any assistance or support from those forces.

(2) Compliance by the Government of El Salvador with the 1949 Geneva Convention and the 1977 Protocol relating to the Protection of Victims of Non-International Armed Conflicts.

(3) Participation by the Government of El Salvador in negotiations with all major parties to the conflict in El Salvador, in good faith and without preconditions, for the purpose of achieving an equitable political solution (elements of which would include free and fair elections determined through negotiations and reforms within the security and police forces), unless the Government of El Salvador is unable to engage in such negotiations because of the refusal of the major opposition parties to participate.

(4) Elimination of the practice of detaining political prisoners, and repeal of legislation or decrees providing for such detention.

(5) Establishment of the rule of law and an effective judicial system, as demonstrated at a minimum by vigorous steps to bring to trial and discipline (A) all those directly or indirectly responsible for the murders and disappearances of U.S. citizens or for any related coverup; and (B) substantial numbers of those directly or indirectly responsible for the abduction, torture, or murder of Salvadoran citizens.

(6) Protection of effective freedom of the press and freedom of association.

(7) Documented progress in implementing the land reform program, with no action taken which would modify, suspend, or terminate the land reform program in a manner detrimental to the rights of the beneficiaries or potential beneficiaries.

Subsection (d) states that military assistance and economic support assistance may be provided for El Salvador for fiscal year 1985 only as follows:

(1) Up to $64,800,000 of military assistance and up to one half ($80,000,000) of the economic support assistance approved by the Congress for El Salvador may be provided if the President determines and states in the first report required by subsection (b) that the Government of El Salvador has made demonstrated progress in achieving all the objectives described in subsection (c).

(2) Not to exceed an additional $124,500,000 of military assistance, and the remaining amounts ($80,000,000) of economic support assistance approved by the Congress for El Salvador, may be provided if the President submits a second report pursuant to subsection (b) stating his determination that the Salvadoran Government has achieved the objectives described in paragraphs (1), (2), and (3) of subsection (c) and, since the first report was submitted, has made additional demonstrated progress in achieving the objectives described in the remaining paragraphs of subsection (c); and if the Congress enacts a joint resolution stating that the Congress agrees with the President's determinations.

Subsection (e) provides a definition of the term "military assistance and financing" and "economic support assistance".

Subsection (f) limits the total number of U.S. military advisers in El Salvador to 55 at any time. U.S. military advisers are defined to include any members of the U.S. Armed Forces performing defense services, conducting international military education and training activities, or performing management functions under the Foreign Assistance Act or the Arms Export Control Act, and to exclude members of the Armed Forces who are in El Salvador solely for the purpose of performing medical training or services.

Subsection (g)(1) prohibits the use of the special drawdown authority in section 506 of the Foreign Assistance Act with respect to El Salvador for fiscal years 1984 and 1985.

Subsection (g)(2) prohibits the use of section 21(d) of the Arms Export Control Act for El Salvador for fiscal years 1984 and 1985, unless the President first reports to the Congress that an emergency has arisen which requires immediate military assistance to that country and which cannot be met under any other law.

Subsection (g)(3) provides that if section 614(a) of the Foreign Assistance Act is used to waive any provision of this section, such waiver shall cease to be effective thirty days after the President submits the written notification required by that section, unless during that thrity-day period the Congress enacts a joint resolution approving the waiver.

SECTION 1004—ECONOMIC SUPPORT FUNDS FOR EL SALVADOR

This section establishes certain additional conditions for providing economic support funds to El Salvador for fiscal year 1985.

Subsection (a)(1) requires that all local currencies generated in El Salvador by ESF funds shall be deposited in a special account established by the Government of El Salvador (in accordance with Section 609 of the Foreign Assistance Act) and shall be available only for purposes of agrarian reform, employment generation, restoration of public services, policy development, assistance for displaced persons, and other humanitarian assistance. (Section 609 requires that local currencies generated in a commodity import program be placed in a special account or be used to fund specific programs.)

Subsection (a)(2) prohibits ESF funds provided to El Salvador from being credited directly to its Central Reserve Bank or mixed in any way with its foreign exchange reserves.

Subsection (a)(3) requires that not less than one quarter of the balance of payments support provided under ESF to El Salvador shall be in the form of a Commodity Import Program. This provision would allow a gradual phase-in of that program if adequate controls on balance of payments assistance cannot be implemented.

Subsection (b) establishes the following criteria for the Commodity Import Program for El Salvador for fiscal year 1985:

(1) Eligible importers under the program shall include agencies charged by the Salvadoran Government with implementing the land reform program, and Salvadoran businesses which employ less than 25 people.

(2) All imports under the program shall be appropriate to the development needs of El Salvador.

(3) The prices charged in El Salvador for imports acquired under the program shall be their fair market value.

Subsection (c) requires A.I.D. to report on the activities and commodities financed pursuant to this section as part of the annual congressional presentation materials.

Subsection (d)(1) requires that each fiscal year, prior to expending any ESF funds to El Salvador for economic stabilization purposes, the President shall be satisfied that the Central Reserve Bank has implemented or taken appropriate steps toward implementing the major recommendations contained in the report entitled "Foreign Exchange: Policy and Management Within the Central Reserve Bank of El Salvador".

Subsection (d)(2) requires the President to report to the Congress not later than January 31, 1985, on the implementation of this report and on ongoing efforts to improve the management, allocation, and control of foreign exchange.

This section was included as a result of reports by the General Accounting Office, the Inspector General of the Agency for International Development, and Arthur Young and Company, that U.S. aid funds have not been expended for the intended purposes and that controls over the use of U.S. funds are weak.

SECTION 1005—RESTRICTIONS ON THE INTRODUCTION OF UNITED STATES ARMED FORCES INTO HONDURAS AND LIMITATIONS ON MILITARY ASSISTANCE FOR HONDURAS

This section limits the purposes for which U.S. Armed Forces may be introduced into Honduras, and sets a ceiling on military assistance to that country.

Subsection (a) prohibits the introduction of U.S. Armed Forces into Honduran territory for training exercises or (except as provided in subsection (d)) for any other purposes unless: (1) they are responsible for providing security at the U.S. Embassy in Honduras, or (2) they are performing functions pursuant to the Foreign Assistance Act or the Arms Export Control Act, except that not more than 300 members of the Armed Forces may be in Honduras under this paragraph at any one time.

Subsection (b) prohibits the obligation or expenditure of funds appropriated by the Congress for the introduction of U.S. Armed Forces into Honduran territory except as provided in this section.

Subsection (c) requires any members of the U.S. Armed Forces in Honduras on the date of enactment of this Act who are not covered by one of the exceptions provided in this section to be immediately withdrawn from that country.

Subsection (d) states that, consistent with section 3 of the War Powers Resolution, the President shall consult with the Congress before introducing U.S. Armed Forces into hostilities in Honduras or into situations in Honduras where imminent involvement in hostilities is clearly indicated by the circumstances.

Subsection (e) limits the aggregate total of grant military assistance and international military education and training grants provided to Honduras to $56,000,000 for fiscal year 1984 and to $41,000,000 for fiscal year 1985. It further prohibits the issuance of foreign military sales credits and loan guarantees for Honduras for fiscal years 1984 and 1985.

SECTION 1006—LIMITATIONS ON MILITARY ASSISTANCE AND SALES FOR GUATEMALA AND ON JOINT MILITARY EXERCISES WITH GUATEMALA

This section prohibits military assistance for Guatemala except under special circumstances.

Subsection (a) prohibits military assistance, training, and sales to Guatemala for fiscal year 1984 and 1985 under the Foreign Assistance Act, the Arms Export Control Act, and the Export Administration Act, except as provided in subsection (b). It further prohibits the assignment or detailing of members of the U.S. Armed Forces to Guatemala to carry out functions under the Arms Export Control Act or the Foreign Assistance Act, or to participate in joint military exercises with the armed forces of Guatemala. It also provides that funds appropriated by the Congress may not be obligated or expended for participation by U.S. Armed Forces in any such exercises.

Subsection (b) states that the prohibitions contained in subsection (a) do not apply with respect to (1) sales of construction equipment and mobile medical facilities to assist in development programs that will directly assist the poor in Guatemala, (2) sales of training, to be provided outside Guatemala, which is related to the sales of construction equipment or mobile medical facilities, or (3) a total for both fiscal year 1984 and 1985 of no more than $10 million in FMS loan guaranties and direct credits for sales described in (1) and (2) above. It further states that the exceptions to the prohibition on military assistance and sales for Guatemala provided by this subsection are provided only to enable the military forces in that country to obtain equipment and training for civilian engineering and construction projects and mobile medical teams.

SECTION 1007—FUND FOR RECONSTRUCTION AND DEVELOPMENT OF CENTRAL AMERICA

This section establishes a fund for the reconstruction and development of Central America, and provides guidelines and requirements for its use. The amounts for the Fund taken from a portion of the funds requested for other accounts. The purpose of the Fund is to encourage a comprehensive settlement to the conflict in Central America.

Subsection (a) states the sense of the Congress that the achievement of democracy, human rights, peace, and equitable growth in Central America depends primarily on the cooperation and the human and economic resources of the people and governments of Central America, and that the Congress recognizes that the United States can make a significant contribution to such development through a consistent and coherent policy which includes a long-term commitment of assistance. This policy should be designed to support democracy, political reform, and human rights; to promote equitable economic growth and development; and to foster dialogue and negotiations to achieve peace based on a reduction in armament and on national reconciliation.

Subsection (b) states that in recognition of the principles described in subsection (a), there are authorized to be appropriated $250,000,000 for fiscal year 1984, to be used for bilateral and regional economic assistance programs of reconstruction and development with respect to Belize, Costa Rica, Guatemala, Honduras, El Salvador, and Nicaragua. These funds may be obligated only if the President determines and reports to the Congress that, (1) the countries of the region have entered into a comprehensive peace agreement based on the principles of noninterference in the affairs of another country, national reconciliation, and democracy; (2) a regional development plan has been formulated by the countries of Central America which includes detailed proposals for each country and includes plans for the reestablishment of the Central America Common Market; and (3) a donor coordination group has been established which includes individual donor countries as well as multinational development institutions and which is responsible for coordinating all development and reconstruction assistance funds for the region.

Subsection (c) states that the amounts authorized to be appropriated by this section are in addition to amounts otherwise available for the purposes specified in subsection

(b), may be appropriated in subsequent fiscal years if not appropriated for fiscal year 1984, and are authorized to remain available until expended.

Subsection (d) states the expectation of the Congress that in seeking the goals described in subsection (b), the efforts of the Contadora countries (Mexico, Panama, Venezuela, and Colombia) will be encouraged and supported and the United States will actively assist these countries in seeking a regional settlement to the conflict in Central America.

Subsection (e) states the expectation of the Congress that, consistent with the recommendations of the National Bipartisan Commission on Central America (the "Kissinger Commission"), once the goals described in subsection (b) have been attained, U.S. economic assistance for Central America will continue at a level comparable to the aggregate level authorized by this section and other sections of this Act.

SECTION 1008—CENTRAL AMERICAN DEVELOPMENT ORGANIZATION

This section sets forth Congressional findings on and requirements for the proposed Central American Development Organization.

Subsection (a) states a Congressional finding that participation by Central American countries in an effective forum for dialogue on Central America's political, economic and social development would foster cooperation between the United States and Central American countries.

Subsection (b) states the sense of the Congress that, (1) the President should enter into negotiations with the countries of Central America to establish a Central American Development Organization, and (2) the establishment of such an organization should be based on the following principles: participation in the organization should be open to the United States, other donors, and those Central American countries that commit themselves to progress on human rights, building democracy, and encouraging equitable economic growth through policy reforms; the organization should be structured to include representatives from both the public and the private sectors; the organization should meet periodically to carry out its functions and should be supported by a limited professional secretariat; the organization should make recommendations affecting Central American countries on such matters as political, economic and social development objectives, mobilization of resources and external assistance needs, and reform of economic policies and structures; the organization should have the capacity for monitoring country performance on the recommendations issued; for each fiscal year after that in which the President has agreed to participate in the organization, the disbursement of 25 percent of the economic assistance funds allocated by the United States for each Central American country should be deferred until the United States and the organization have both approved disbursement; the President should encourage other donors to designate a percentage of their direct economic assistance for Central American countries for joint approval with the Organization; and the U.S. AID Administrator, or his designee, should be chairman of the organization.

Subsection (c) authorizes the President to participate in the Central American Development Organization, subject to certain limitations.

Subsection (d)(1) states that the AID Administrator, under the supervision of the Secretary of State, shall prepare a detailed proposal to carry out this section and shall keep the Committee on Foreign Affairs and the Committee on Foreign Relations fully and currently informed concerning the development of the proposal.

Subsection (d)(2) states that to facilitate full congressional involvement in the establishment of this organization, the Chairman of the House Foreign Affairs Committee and the Senate Foreign Relations Committee shall each designate at least three members of their respective committees who shall be kept fully and currently informed of all developments concerning the establishment of that organization.

Subsection (d)(3) requires the President to transmit to the Congress any agreement for the establishment of and United States participation in the Central American Development Organization no less than sixty days prior to signing such agreement. It futher provides that the United States shall not participate in the implementation of any such agreement for at least 60 days after such transmittal, and that during that 60-day period there shall be full and formal consultations with the Congress and review by the Committees in accordance with the procedures applicable to reprogramming notifications.

SECTION 1009—LAND REFORM PROGRAMS

This section amends section 620(g) of the Foreign Assistance Act to permit U.S. assistance provided to a foreign government in accordance with a land reform program to be used for compensation of nationals of the recipient country whose land has been expropriated, if the President determines that monetary assistance for such a land reform program will further the national interests of the United States.

SECTION 1010—ADMINISTRATION OF JUSTICE

This section amends Chapter 4 of Part II of the Foreign Assistance Act by adding a new section 538.

Subsection (a) states that the President may provide ESF funds to countries and organizations in order to strengthen the administration of justice in Central American and Caribbean countries. Such assistance may only include support for specialized professional training, scholarships, and exchanges for continuing legal education; programs to enhance prosecutorial and judicial capabilities and portection for participants in judicial cases; strengthening professional organizations in order to promote services to members and the role of the bar in judicial selection, enforcement of ethical standards, and legal reform; increasing the availability of legal materials and publications; seminars, conferences, and training and educational programs to improve the administration of justice and to strengthen respect for the rule of law and human rights; and revision and modernization of legal codes and procedures.

Subsection (b) provides that not more than $20,000,000 of the ESF funds available in any fiscal year shall be available to carry out this section, in addition to amounts otherwise available for such purposes.

SECTION 1011—RURAL ELECTRIFICATION

This section states the sense of the Congress that funds appropriated for fiscal years 1984 and 1985 for bilateral agricultural assistance programs should be used for a comprehensive rural electrification program in Central America in order to establish conditions of stability and a foundation for economic development.

SECTION 1012—TRADE CREDIT INSURANCE PROGRAM

This section authorizes special credits for U.S. exports to the countries of Central America and the use of Economic Support Fund monies for the payment of defaults.

Subsection (a) authorizes the Agency for International Development to provide guarantees and insurance to cover the risk of loss or nonpayment of short-term trade credits to finance goods and services for use by the private sector in the countries of Central America. These guarantees and insurance shall be such as cannot be extended by the Export-Import Bank because they do not meet the criteria of the Bank that there be a reasonable assurance of repayment.

Subsection (b) restricts the repayment period on the credits to not longer than one year.

Subsection (c) terminates the authority to issue these guarantees and insurance on September 30, 1989.

Subsection (d) authorizes the use of such sums as may be necessary from Economic Support Funds for the payment of any default.

Subsection (e) requires that guarantees and insurance may be issued only in such amounts as provided in appropriations Acts, but not to exceed $300 million in fiscal year 1985.

Subsection (f) provides that any recoveries, after deduction for expenses, from the payment of guarantees and insurance shall be deposited in the Treasury.

Subsection (g) provides that the Export-Import Bank shall provide such administrative and technical assistance to the Agency for International Development as is necessary and appropriate to carry out this section. It is assumed that the Export-Import Bank will process applications and undertake the necessary review and evaluation of applications, and transmit the appropriate applications to AID only after the normal Export-Import review is completed and it is determined that there is no reasonable assurance of repayment.

SECTION 1013—ELECTIONS IN PANAMA

This section states the sense of the Congress that the United States should support, in the strongest terms possible, elections in Panama which are free, fair, and honest. It further states the sense of the Congress that if the upcoming elections are not held or if there is an attempt to tamper with the election results, the President should consider options to demonstrate to the Panamanian authorities the deep concern of the United States, including the option of whether it is in the interest of the United States to terminate military assistance to Panama.

SECTION 1014—RELATIONS BETWEEN BELIZE AND GUATEMALA

This section states the sense of the Congress that the United States should use its good offices and influence to encourage the Government of Guatemala to recognize the independence of Belize and to enter into a mutual nonaggression treaty with Belize.

SECTION 1015—EFFECTIVE DATE

This section provides that this title shall take effect on the date of enactment of this Act.

(b) Amounts appropriated pursuant to this section are authorized to remain available until expended.

CONDITIONS ON MILITARY ASSISTANCE AND FINANCING FOR EL SALVADOR

SEC. 1003. (a) The President shall ensure that military assistance and financing are furnished to El Salvador in a manner which fosters demonstrated progress toward the political development, economic development, and security of that country. To this end, the President in every appropriate instance shall impose conditions (in addition to those specified in subsection (d) of this section) on the furnishing of military assistance and financing to El Salvador in order to achieve those goals, including the objectives described in subsection (c) of this section.

(b) Not later than August 31, 1984, and no later than January 31, 1985, the President shall submit to the Speaker of the House of Representatives and the Chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations of the Senate a detailed report fully describing the policies of the Govenment of El Salvador for achieving political development, economic development, and conditions of security. This report shall also review comprehensively the factors contributing to the political, economic, and security situation in that country, including such factors as human rights, land reform, the economy of the country, refugees and displaced persons, the military situation, and guerrilla activity.

(c) The reports described in subsection (b) shall include the President's detailed assessment of the strengths and weaknesses of the policies of the Government of El Salvador in protecting and advancing the human rights, and in particular the right to security of person, of all persons in El Salvador during the period covered by the report with respect to each of the following objectives:

(1) An end to the involvement in or support for acts of unlawful violence, secret detention, abduction, torture, and murder by members of military, security, or police force.

(2) The establishment of an effective judicial system, operating under fair and efficient procedures, in which those charged with crimes are brought to timely justice and private disputes and grievances are resolved on the basis of respect for the rule of law, free from the taint of corruption and intimidation, and in particular, the taking of necessary measures to investigate, and prosecute those responsible for, the murders of the four American churchwomen, two labor advisers, and other American citizens.

(3) Effective freedom of the press and freedom of association, including the enforcement of measures against intimidation of the press and labor and peasant union members and leaders.

(4) Participation by the Government of El Salvador in a dialogue with all major parties to the conflict in El Salvador, in good faith and without preconditions, for the purpose of achieving an equitable political solution, based upon free and fair elections and conditions which will assure the physical security of all participants before, during, and after those elections.

(5) Compliance by the Government of El Salvador with applicable rules of international law governing the conduct of armed conflict, and in particular those humanitarian principles for the protection of noncombatants.

(6) Full implementation of the land reform program, including the taking of necessary measures against illegal evictions and the furnishing of necessary credits, administrative support, technical assistance, and services to beneficiaries.

(d) Military assistance and financing may be provided for El Salvador for the fiscal year 1985 only as follows:

(1) If the President determines and states in the first report required by this section that the Government of El Salvador has made demonstrated progress in achieving the objectives described in subsection (c), up to one-half of the aggregate amount of military assistance and financing approved by the Congress for El Salvador may be provided after the end of the 30-day period beginning on the date on which the Congress receives that report.

(2) The remaining amounts of military assistance and financing approved by the Congress may be provided if the President determines and states in the second report required by this section that, since the first such report, the Government of El Salvador has made additional demonstrated progress in achieving the objectives described in subsection (c) unless, within 30 calendar days after receiving the second report, the Congress enacts a joint resolution stating in substance that the Congress disagrees with the President's determination.

(e) As used in this section, the term "military assistance and financing" means any funds obligated for assistance under chapter 2 or chapter 5 of part II of the Foreign Assistance Act of 1961 and any foreign military sales financing provided under the Arms Export Control Act.

(f) It is the sense of the Congress that the total number of United States military advisers in El Salvador not exceed 55 unless the Congress is first consulted. For the purposes of this subsection, United States military advisers include all members of the United States Armed Forces performing training activities under the Foreign Assistance Act of 1961 or the Arms Export Control Act, but do not include members of the Armed Forces who are in El Salvador solely for the purpose of performing medical training or services.

CENTRAL RESERVE BANK OF EL SALVADOR

SEC. 1004. Prior to disbursing any assistance to the Government of El Salvador under chapter 4 of Part II of the Foreign Assistance Act of 1961 for economic stabilization purposes, the President shall be satisfied that the Central Reserve Bank of El Salvador has implemented or has taken appropriate steps toward implementing the major recommendations, as defined below, contained in the study entitled "Foreign Exchange: Policy and Management within the Central Reserve Bank of El Salvador" relating to management, allocation, and controls on the use of official foreign exchange. For purposes of this section such major recommendations are as follows:

(1) Further development, refinement, and application of objective and impartial criteria and procedures for the allocation of foreign exchange in relation to the needs of the economy of El Salvador. This shall consist of:

(A) publishing periodic lists of those receiving foreign exchange;

(B) publicizing foreign exchange allocation criteria; and

(C) undertaking semi-annual audits by a United States public accounting firm to determine compliance with policy, criteria, and procedures.

(2) Adoption of measures to expedite the decision-process regarding allocation of foreign exchange in accordance with availabilities and established criteria. This shall consist of:

(A) taking steps to complete the mechanization of the foreign exchange allocation process; and

(B) refining the forecasting of foreign exchange availabilities to serve as a basis for foreign exchange approvals.

(3) Continued improvement in the capacity of the Central Reserve Bank's price verification unit to reduce the potential for over-valuation of imports and under-valuation of exports. This shall consist of:

(A) increasing the price verification unit staff to at least ten and enhancing it:

(B) having in place qualified technical assistance to support the operations of the price verification unit;

(C) having the unit regularly conduct statistically-significant random samples of all import transactions approved by the Bank; and

(D) implementing a policy to levy sanctions against those who over-value imports.

MILITARY EXERCISES

SEC. 1005. For the fiscal years 1984 and 1985, the President shall notify the Committee on Foreign Affairs of the House of Representatives and the Committee on Foreign Relations of the Senate 30 days in advance of assigning or detailing members of the United States Armed Forces to, or otherwise introducing members of the United States Armed Forces into, any country in Central America for the purpose of commencing joint military exercises with the armed forces of any Central American country.

LIMITATIONS ON MILITARY ASSISTANCE FOR GUATEMALA

SEC. 1006. (a) For the fiscal years 1984 and 1985—

(1) funds may not be obligated for assistance for Guatemala under chapter 2 or 5 of Part II of the Foreign Assistance Act of 1961; and

(2) letters of offer may not be issued to and credits may not be extended and guaranties may not be issued for Guatemala under the Arms Export Control Act.

(b) The prohibitions contained in subsection (a) do not apply with respect to (1) sales of construction equipment and mobile medical facilities to assist in development programs that will directly assist the poor in Guatemala, (2) sales of training, to be provided outside of Guatemala, which is related to the sales described in clause (1), or (3) a total for both fiscal years 1984 and 1985 of no more than $10,000,000 in loans and loan guaranties under the Arms Export Control Act for sales described in clauses (1) and (2). The exceptions to the prohibition on military assistance and sales for Guatemala provided by this subsection are provided only to enable the military forces in that country to obtain equipment and training for civilian engineering and construction projects and mobile medical teams.

CENTRAL AMERICAN DEVELOPMENT ORGANIZATION

SEC. 1007. (a) The Congress finds that participation by Central American countries in an effective forum for dialogue on, and the continuous review and advancement of, Central America's political, economic, and social development would foster cooperation between the United States and Central American countries.

(b) It is the sense of the Congress that—

(1) the President should enter into negotiations with the countries of Central America to establish a Central American Development Organization; and

(2) the establishment of the Central American Development Organization should be based upon the following principles:

(A) Participation in the Organization should be open to the United States, other donors, and those Central American countries that commit themselves to, among other things, progress on human rights, building democracy, and encouraging equitable economic growth through policy reforms.

(B) The Organization should be structured to include representatives from both the public and private sectors, including representatives from the labor, agriculture, and business communities.

(C) The Organization should meet periodically to carry out the functions described in subparagraphs (D) and (E) of this paragraph and should be supported by a limited professional secretariat.

(D) The Organization should make recommendations affecting Central American countries on such matters as—

(i) political, economic, and social development objectives, including the strengthening of democratic pluralism and the safeguarding of human rights;

(ii) mobilization of resources and external assistance needs; and

(iii) reform of economic policies and structures.

(E) The Organization should have the capacity for monitoring country performance on the recommendations issued in accordance with subparagraph (D) of this paragraph and for evaluating progress towards meeting such country objectives.

(F) For each fiscal year after that in which the President has completed negotiations and agreed to participate in the Organization, the disbursement of 25 percent of the economic assistance funds authorized by this title and allocated by the United States directly for each Central American country should be deferred until the United States and the Organization have both approved disbursement.

(G) The President should encourage other donors similarly to designate a percentage of their direct economic assistance for Central American countries for joint approval with the Organization.

(H) The administrator of the agency primarily responsible for administering part I of the Foreign Assistance Act of 1961, or his designee, should be chairman of the Organization and should carry out his functions in that capacity under the continuous supervision and general direction of the Secretary of State.

(c) Subject to subsection (d)(3), the President is authorized to participate in the Central American Development Organization.

(d)(1) The Administrator of the Agency for International Development, under the supervision and direction of the Secretary of State, shall prepare a detailed proposal to carry out this section and shall keep the Committee on Foreign Affairs of the House of Representatives and the Committee on Foreign Relations of the Senate fully and currently informed concerning the development of the proposal.

(2) To facilitate full congressional involvement in the establishment of Central American Development Organization, the Chairman of the Committee on Foreign Affairs of the House of Representatives shall designate at least three members of that committee, and the Chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations of the Senate shall designate at least three members of that committee, who shall be kept fully and currently informed by the executive branch of all negotiations or discussions with donor countries and recipient countries concerning the establishment of that Organization.

(3) The President shall transmit to the Committee on Foreign Affairs of the House of Representatives and the Committee on Foreign Relations of the Senate a copy of the text of any agreement which he proposes to sign providing for the establishment of and United States participation in the Central American Development Organization no less than 60 days prior to his signature. The United States shall not participate in the implementation of any such agreement for at least 60 days after such transmittal. During that 60-day period there shall be full and formal consultations with and review by those committees in accordance with procedures applicable to reprogramming notifications pursuant to section 634A of the Foreign Assistance Act of 1961.

LAND REFORM PROGRAMS

SEC. 1008. Section 620(g) of the Foreign Assistance Act of 1961 is amended by adding at the end thereof the following sentence: "This prohibition shall not apply to monetary assistance made available for use by a government or political subdivision or agency of such government to compensate nationals of that country in accordance with a land reform program, if the President determines that monetary assistance for such land reform program will further the national interests of the United States."

ADMINISTRATION OF JUSTICE

SEC. 1009. Chapter 4 of part II of the Foreign Assistance Act of 1961, as amended by sections 202 and 804 of this Act, is further amended by adding at the end thereof the following new section:

"SEC. 538. ADMINISTRATION OF JUSTICE.—(a) The President may furnish assistance under this chapter to countries and organizations, including national and regional institutions, in order to strengthen the administration of justice in Central American countries and the countries of the Caribbean. Assistance under this section may only include support for specialized professional training, scholarships, and exchanges for continuing legal education; programs to enhance prosecutorial and judicial capabilities (including judicial investigations and protection for participants in judicial cases); strengthening professional organizations in order to promote services to members and the role of the bar in judicial selection, enforcement of ethical standards, and legal reform; increasing the availability of legal materials and publications; seminars, conferences, and training and educational programs to improve the administration of justice and to strengthen respect for the rule of law and human rights; and revision and modernization of legal codes and procedures.

"(b) Not more than $20,000,000 of the funds made available to carry out this chapter for any fiscal year shall be available to carry out this section, in addition to amounts otherwise available for such purposes. The President shall notify the Committee on Foreign Relations of the Senate and the Committee on Foreign Affairs of the House of Representatives not less than fifteen days in advance of obligating funds for programs or activities authorized by this section which were previously subject to section 660 of this Act."

RURAL ELECTRIFICATION

SEC. 1010. It is the sense of the Congress that funds appropriated for the fiscal years 1984 and 1985 under section 103(a)(2) of the Foreign Assistance Act of 1961 should be used for a comprehensive rural electrification program in Central America in order to establish conditions of stability and a foundation for economic development.

TRADE CREDIT INSURANCE PROGRAM

SEC. 1011. Title III of chapter 2 of part I of the Foreign Assistance Act of 1961 is amended by adding at the end thereof the following new section:

"SEC. 224. TRADE CREDIT INSURANCE PROGRAM.—(a) In order to enable the Export-Import Bank of the United States (hereafter in this section referred to as the "Bank") to determine that there exists reasonable assurance of repayment as required under section 2(b)(1)(B) of the Export-Import Bank Act of 1945, the agency primarily responsible for administering part I of this Act (hereafter in this section referred to as the "Agency") is authorized to provide guarantees to the Bank for liabilities to be incurred by the Bank in connection with guarantees or insurance provided under the Export-Import Bank Act of 1945 for financing for transactions involving the export of goods and services for the use of the private sector in Central American countries.

"(b)(1) Guarantees provided by the Agency pursuant to the authority of subsection (a) shall be for short-term guarantees and insurance extended by the Bank which shall be repayable within a period not to exceed one year from the date of arrival at the port of importation of the goods and services covered by such guarantees or insurance. Guarantees or insurance extended by the Bank and guaranteed by the Agency pursuant to subsection (a) shall be provided by the Bank in accordance with criteria and procedures agreed to by the Agency and the Bank. Such agreement shall also provide for the establishment of a reserve fund by the Agency, with such funds made available to the reserve as the Agency deems necessary to discharge liabilities under guarantees provided by the Agency pursuant to subsection (a).

"(2) The administrator of such agency shall transmit a copy of such agreement to the Speaker of the House of Representatives and to the Committee on Foreign Relations and the Committee on Banking, Housing, and Urban Affairs of the Senate.

"(c) The Agency shall not enter into any commitments to guarantee under subsection (a) after September 30, 1989.

"(d) Of the funds authorized to be appropriated for chapter 4 of Part II of this Act, there are authorized to be made available such sums as may be deemed necessary by the Agency to discharge liabilities under guarantees entered into under subsection (a).

"(e) Commitments to guarantee under subsection (a) are authorized only to the extent and in the amounts provided in appropriations Acts, not to exceed $300,000,000 in the fiscal year 1985.

"(f) To the extent that any of the funds made available pursuant to subsection (d) are paid out for a claim arising out of liabilities guaranteed under subsection (a), amounts received after the date of such payment, with respect to such claim, shall be credited to the reserve fund referred to in subsection (b), shall be merged with the funds in such reserve, and shall be available for the purpose of payments by the Agency to the Bank for guarantees under subsection (a).

"(g) Beginning on a date six months after the date of enactment of this section, and at intervals of six months thereafter, the administrator of the agency primarily responsible for administering part I of this Act and the President of the Export-Import Bank of the United States shall prepare and transmit to the Speaker of the House of Representatives and the Chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations of the Senate a report on the amount and extension of credits during the preceding six-month period.

"(h) The Export-Import Bank shall provide without reimbursement such administrative and technical assistance to the Agency as the Bank and the Agency deem appropriate to assist the Agency in carrying out this section.".

EFFECTIVE DATE

TITLE V—PERSONNEL MANAGEMENT

WAIVER OF CIVILIAN PERSONNEL CEILING FOR FISCAL YEAR 1985

SEC. 501. The provisions of section 138(c)(2) of title 10, United States Code, shall not apply with respect to fiscal year 1985 or with respect to the appropriation of funds for that year.

WOMEN IN THE ARMED FORCES

SEC. 502. (a) The Secretary of the Air Force shall provide that of all persons originally enlisting in the Regular Air Force during the period beginning on October 1, 1985, and ending on September 30, 1988—
(1) not less than 19 percent of those enlisting during fiscal year 1986 shall be women;
(2) not less than 22 percent of those enlisting during fiscal year 1987 shall be women; and
(3) not less than 25 percent of those enlisting during fiscal year 1988 shall be women.

(b)(1) Chapter 7 of title 10, United States Code, is amended by adding at the end thereof the following new section:

"§ 179. Defense Advisory Committee on Women in the Services

"(a) There is in the Department of Defense an advisory committee known as the Defense Advisory Committee on Women in the Services (hereinafter in this section referred to as the 'committee').

"(b)(1) The committee shall be composed of 30 members appointed by the Secretary of Defense from persons who are not members of the armed forces on active duty or in an active status and who are particularly qualified by training, education, or experience for service on the committee. In selecting members of the committee, the Secretary shall ensure that the membership of the committee is fairly balanced in terms of the points of view represented and the functions to be performed by the committee and that there is broad geographic diversity among the membership of the committee.

"(2) Members shall serve for a term of three years, except that a member appointed to fill a vacancy occurring before the end of a term shall be appointed only for the remainder of that term.

"(3) The chairman of the committee shall be designated by the Secretary of Defense.

"(c) The committee shall provide the Secretary of Defense with advice on matters relating to service of women in the armed forces and shall recommend measures to ensure effective use of the capabilities of women in the armed forces. The committee shall consider all aspects of military service as it relates to women, including recruitment, training, categories of assignment, housing, health, and morale and general welfare.

"(d)(1) The committee shall meet not less often than twice a year at the invitation of the Secretary.

"(2) The Secretary shall supply such staff assistance, facilities, and other administrative support as is necessary for the performance of the committee's functions.

"(3) Members of the committee shall serve without compensation but may be allowed travel expenses, including per diem in lieu of subsistence, as authorized by section 5703 of title 5.

"(e)(1) The committee shall submit an annual report on its activities to the Secretary. The Secretary shall transmit a copy of each such report, together with any comments of the Secretary on the report, to the Committees on Armed Services of the Senate and House of Representatives.

"(2) The committee shall continue in existence until terminated by law.".

(2) The table of sections at the beginning of chapter 7 of such title is amended by adding at the end thereof the following:

"179. Defense Advisory Committee on Women in the Services.".

(3) Each individual serving on the Defense Advisory Committee on Women in the Services as constituted on the day before the date of the enactment of this Act shall continue to serve on the committee as constituted under the amendment made by paragraph (1) in accordance with the appointment of such individual.

(c) The Secretary of Defense shall study the propensity of young women to serve in the military and shall submit a report to Congress with the Secretary's review and analysis of that propensity not later than six months after the date of the enactment of this Act.

TITLE VI—COMPENSATION MATTERS

MILITARY PAY RAISE FOR FISCAL YEAR 1985

SEC. 601. (a) Any adjustment required by section 1009 of title 37, United States Code, in elements of the compensation of members of the uniformed services to become effective during fiscal year 1985 shall not be made.

(b)(1) Except as provided in paragraph (2), the rates of basic pay for members of the uniformed services and the rates of monthly cadet pay and midshipman pay under section 203(c)(1) of title 37, United States Code, are increased by 3.5 percent effective on January 1, 1985.

(2) The increase in rates of basic pay provided for in paragraph (1) shall not apply to the rate of basic pay for pay grade E-1.

TITLE VII—EDUCATIONAL ASSISTANCE PROGRAMS

"The purposes of this chapter are—
"(1) to provide a new educational assistance program to assist in the readjustment of members of the Armed Forces to civilian life after their separation from military service;
"(2) to promote and assist the All-Volunteer Force program and the Total Force Concept of the Armed Forces by establishing a new program of educational assistance based upon service on active duty or a combination of service on active duty and in the Selected Reserve (including the National Guard) to aid in the recruitment and retention of highly qualified personnel for both the active and reserve components of the Armed Forces; and
"(3) to give special emphasis to providing educational assistance benefits to aid in the retention of personnel in the Armed Forces.

"§ 1402. Definitions

"For the purposes of this chapter—
"(1) The term 'basic educational assistance' means educational assistance provided under subchapter II of this chapter.
"(2) The term 'supplemental educational assistance' means educational assistance provided under subchapter III of this chapter.
"(3) The term 'program of education' has the meaning given such term in section 1652(b) of this title.
"(4) The term 'Selected Reserve' means the Selected Reserve of the Ready Reserve of any of the reserve components (including the Army National Guard of the United States and the Air National Guard of the United States) of the Armed Forces, as required to be maintained under section 268(b) of title 10.

"(5) The term 'Secretary concerned' means the Secretary of Defense with respect to members of the Armed Forces under the jurisdiction of the Secretary of a military department and the Secretary of Transportation with respect to the Coast Guard when it is not operating as a service in the Navy.

"(6) The term 'active duty' does not include any period during which an individual (A) was assigned full time by the Armed Forces to a civilian institution for a course of education which was substantially the same as established courses offered to civilians, (B) served as a cadet or midshipman at one of the service academies, or (C) served under the provisions of section 511(d) of title 10 pursuant to an enlistment in the Army National Guard or the Air National Guard, or as a Reserve for service in the Army Reserve, Naval Reserve, Air Force Reserve, Marine Corps Reserve, or Coast Guard Reserve.

"Subchapter II—Basic Educational Assistance

"§ 1411. Basic educational assistance entitlement for service on active duty

"(a) Except as provided in subsection (b) of this section, each individual who—

"(1) after September 30, 1984—

"(A) serves at least three years of continuous active duty in the Armed Forces; or

"(B) serves in the Armed Forces and (notwithstanding section 3103A of this title) is discharged or released from active duty for a service-connected disability, for hardship, or, in the case of an individual who completed not less than 30 months of active duty, for the convenience of the Government;

"(2) before completion of the service described in clause (1) of this section, has received a secondary school diploma (or an equivalency certificate); and

"(3) after completion of the service described in clause (1) of this section—

"(A) is discharged from service with an honorable discharge, is placed on the retired list, is transferred to the Fleet Reserve or Fleet Marine Corps Reserve, or is placed on the temporary disability retired list;

"(B) continues on active duty; or

"(C) is released from active duty for further service in a reserve component of the Armed Forces after service on active duty characterized by the Secretary concerned as honorable service; is entitled to basic educational assistance under this chapter.

"(b) An individual who receives a commission as an officer in the Armed Forces upon graduation from the United States Military Academy, the United States Naval Academy, the United States Air Force Academy, or the Coast Guard Academy or upon completion of a program of educational assistance under section 2107 of title 10 is not eligible for educational assistance under this section.

§ 1412. Basic educational assistance entitlement for service in the Selected Reserve

"(a) Except as provided in subsection (c), each individual who—

"(1) after September 30, 1984—

"(A) serves at least two years of continuous active duty in the Armed Forces characterized by the Secretary concerned as honorable service; and

"(B) subject to subsection (b) of this section and after completion of the service on active duty described in clause (A) of this paragraph, serves at least four years of continuous duty in the Selected Reserve during which the individual participates satisfactorily in training as required by the Secretary concerned;

"(2) before completion of the service described in clause (1) of this section, has received a secondary school diploma (or an equivalency certificate); and

"(3) after completion of the service described in clause (1) of this section—

"(A) is discharged from service with an honorable discharge, is placed on the retired list, or is transferred to the Standby Reserve or an element of the Ready Reserve other than the Selected Reserve after service in the Selected Reserve characterized by the Secretary concerned as honorable service; or is entitled to basic educational assistance under this chapter.

"(B) continues on active duty or in the Selected Reserve;

"(b)(1) The requirement of four years of service under clause (1)(B) of subsection (a) of this section is not applicable to an individual who is discharged or released from service in the Selected Reserve for a service-connected disability, for hardship, or (in the case of an individual discharged or released after three and one-half years of service) for the convenience of the Government.

"(2) Continuity of service of a member in the Selected Reserve for purposes of such clause shall not be considered to be broken—

"(A) by any period of time (not to exceed a maximum period prescribed by the Secretary concerned by regulation) during which the member is not able to locate a unit of the Selected Reserve of his Armed Force that he is eligible to join or that has a vacancy; or

"(B) by any other period of time (not to exceed a maximum period prescribed by the Secretary concerned by regulation) during which the member is not attached to a unit of the Selected Reserve that the Secretary concerned, pursuant to regulations, considers to be inappropriate to consider for such purpose.

"(c) An individual who receives a commission as an officer in the Armed Forces upon graduation from the United States Military Academy, the United States Naval Academy, the United States Air Force Academy, or the Coast Guard Academy or upon completion of a program of educational assistance under section 2107 of title 10 is not eligible for educational assistance under this section.

"§ 1413. Duration of basic educational assistance

"(a) Subject to section 1795 of this title and subsection (b) of this section, each individual entitled to basic educational assistance under this chapter is entitled to (1) one month of educational assistance benefits under this chapter for each month of active duty served by such individual, and (2) one month of educational assistance benefits under this chapter for each four months served by such individual in the Selected Reserve (other than any month in which the individual served on active duty).

"(b) No individual may receive basic educational assistance benefits under this chapter for a period in excess of 36 months (or the equivalent thereof in part-time educational assistance).

"§ 1414. Payment of basic educational assistance

"The Administrator shall pay to each individual entitled to basic educational assistance who is pursuing an approved program of education a basic educational assistance allowance to help meet, in part, the expenses of such individual's subsistence, tuition, fees, supplies, books, equipment, and other educational costs.

"§ 1415. Amount of basic educational assistance

"(a) Subject to section 1442 of this title and except as otherwise provided in subsection (b) of this section a basic educational assistance allowance under this subchapter shall be paid—

"(1) at the monthly rate of $300 for an approved program of education pursued on a full-time basis; or

"(2) at an appropriately reduced rate, as determined under regulations which the Administrator shall prescribe, for an approved program of education pursued on less than a full-time basis.

"(b) In the case of an individual who has a skill or specialty designated by the Secretary concerned as a skill or specialty in which there is a critical shortage of personnel or for which it is difficult to recruit, the Secretary concerned, pursuant to regulations to be prescribed by the Secretary, may increase the rate of the basic educational assistance allowance applicable to such individual to such rate in excess of the rate prescribed under subsection (a) of this section as the Secretary considers appropriate, but any such increase may not exceed $400 per month.

"§ 1416. Inservice enrollment in a program of education

"A member of the Armed Forces who has completed at least two years of service on active duty after September 30, 1984, has continued on active duty or in the Selected Reserve without a break in service (except as described in section 1412(b)(2) of this title), and who but for section 1411(a)(1) or 1412(a)(1) of this title would be eligible for basic educational assistance may receive educational assistance under this chapter for enrollment in an approved program of education while continuing to perform the duty described in section 1411(a)(1) or 1412(a)(1) of this title.

"Subchapter III—Supplemental Educational Assistance

"§ 1421. Supplemental educational assistance for additional service

"(a) The Secretary concerned may be regulation provide for the payment of supplemental educational assistance under this subchapter to any individual eligible for basic educational assistance under section 1411 of this title who—

"(1) serves five or more consecutive years of active duty in the Armed Forces in addition to the years of active duty counted under section 1411(a)(1) of this title without a break in such service; and

"(2) after completion of the service described in clause (1) of this subsection—

"(A) is discharged from service with an honorable discharge, is placed on the retired list, is transferred to the Fleet Reserve or Fleet Marine Corps Reserve, or is placed on the temporary disability retired list;

"(B) continues on active duty without a break in service; or

"(C) is released from active duty for further service in a reserve component of the Armed Forces after service on active duty characterized by the Secretary concerned as honorable service.

"(b) The Secretary concerned may by regulation provide for the payment of supplemental educational assistance under this subchapter to any individual eligible for basic educational assistance under section 1412 of this title who—

"(1) serves two or more consecutive years of active duty in the Armed Forces in addition to the years of active duty counted under section 1412(a)(1) of this title and four or more consecutive years of duty in the Selected Reserve in addition to the years of duty in the Selected Reserve counted under such section without a break in service; and

"(2) after completion of the service described in clause (1) of this subsection—

"(A) is discharged from service with an honorable discharge, is placed on the retired list, is transferred to the Fleet Reserve or Fleet Marine Corps Reserve, or is placed on the temporary disability retired list; or

"(B) continues on active duty or in the Selected Reserve.

"(c) Continuity of service of a member in the Selected Reserve for purposes of subsection (b)(1) of this section shall not be considered to be broken—

"(1) by any period of time (not to exceed a maximum period prescribed by the Secretary concerned by regulation) during which the member is not able to locate a unit of the Selected Reserve of his Armed Force that he is eligible to join or that has a vacancy; or

"(2) by any other period of time (not to exceed a maximum period prescribed by the Secretary concerned by regulation) during which the member is not attached to a unit of the Selected Reserve that the Secretary concerned, pursuant to regulations, considers to be inappropriate to consider for such purpose.

"(d) A period of active duty or duty in the Selected Reserve that occurs before the period of duty by which the individual concerned qualifies for basic educational assistance may not be counted for purposes of this section.

"§ 1422. Amount of supplemental educational assistance

"(a) Subject to section 1442 of this title and except as otherwise provided under subsection (b) of this section, supplemental educational assistance under section 1421 of this title shall be paid—

"(1) at a monthly rate of $300 for an approved program of education pursued on a full-time basis; or

"(2) at an appropriately reduced rate, as determined under regulations which the Administrator shall prescribe, for an approved program of education pursued on less than a full-time basis.

"(b) In the case of a member of the Armed Forces for whom the Secretary concerned has provided for the payment of supplemental educational assistance who has a skill or specialty designated by the Secretary concerned as a skill or specialty in which there is a critical shortage of personnel, the Secretary concerned, pursuant to regulations to be prescribed by the Secretary, may increase the rate of the supplemental educational assistance allowance applicable to such individual to such rate in excess of the rate prescribed under subsection (a) of this section as the Secretary considers appropriate, but any such increase may not exceed $300 per month.

"§ 1423. Payment of supplemental educational assistance under this subchapter

"The Administrator shall increase the monthly basic educational assistance allowance paid to an individual who is entitled to supplemental educational assistance under this subchapter by the monthly amount of the supplemental educational assistance to which the individual is entitled.

Subchapter IV—Transfer of Entitlement to Dependents

"§ 1431. Authority to authorize members of the Armed Forces with critical specialties to transfer entitlement to dependents

"(a) Under regulations prescribed under section 1432(a) of this title, the Secretary concerned may authorize a member of an Armed Force who—

"(1) has served 10 or more continuous years on active duty;

"(2) has a skill or specialty designated by the Secretary concerned as a skill or specialty in which there is a critical shortage of personnel; and

"(3) is entitled to basic educational assistance, to transfer to one or more of such member's dependents all or any part of such member's entitlement to educational assistance under this chapter.

"(b) Subject to regulations prescribed under section 1432(b) of this title, a transfer of entitlement under this section, once authorized, may be made at any time and may be revoked, in whole or in part, or may be modified at any time.

"§ 1432. Regulations

"(a) The Secretary concerned shall prescribe regulations for the establishment of eligibility of members to transfer entitlement under this subchapter, and any transfer of entitlement under this subchapter shall be made in accordance with such regulations. In prescribing such regulations, the Secretary of Defense—

"(1) shall designate the skills or specialties in which there is a critical shortage of personnel which qualify a member for consideration for authorization to transfer entitlement under this section; and

"(2) shall establish such other terms and conditions for authorization to transfer entitlement as the Secretary considers appropriate considering the needs of the service.

"(b) The Administrator shall prescribe regulations for the administration of the transfer of educational assistance entitlement under this subchapter by members authorized under the regulations prescribed pursuant to subsection (a) of this section to be eligible to make such a transfer and for the provision of such assistance to the dependents to whom such entitlement is transferred. In prescribing such regulations, the Administrator may place such limits upon the changing and revoking of transfers of entitlement as the Administrator considers necessary for efficient administration and may provide for any such revocation to be effective at the end of any semester, quarter, or other unit of instruction in which a dependent to whom entitlement had been transferred is engaged in at the time of the revocation.

"§ 1433. Status of dependents to whom entitlement is transferred

"(a)(1) A dependent to whom entitlement is transferred under this subchapter is entitled to educational assistance under this chapter in the same manner and under the same terms and conditions as the individual from whom the entitlement was transferred would be entitled, except that such assistance may only be provided while the individual from whom the entitlement was transferred continues on active duty or upon the death, discharge for hardship or service-connected disability, or completion of 20 years of active duty by the individual.

"(2) The period of eligibility of a child to whom educational assistance is transferred under this subchapter shall be determined in accordance with section 1712(a) of this title.

"(b) If an individual transfers entitlement under this section to two or more dependents, the educational assistance payable under this chapter shall be divided (1) in such manner as the individual specifies, or (2) if the individual is deceased or is otherwise unable to specify the manner in which the assistance shall be divided, as determined under regulations prescribed under section 1432 of this title.

"(c) Assistance may not be paid under this chapter to an individual who at the time the benefits would otherwise be paid is not a child or spouse or surviving spouse of the individual who transferred the benefits, notwithstanding that the individual was a dependent at the time the election was made to transfer the benefits.

"§ 1434. Definition

"For the purposes of this subchapter, the term 'dependent' means—

"(1) a child of an individual; and

"(2) the spouse or surviving spouse of an individual.

"Subchapter V—Time Limitation for Use of Eligibility and Entitlement; General and Administrative Provisions

"§ 1441. Time limitation for use of eligibility and entitlement

"(a) Except as provided in subsections (c) through (e) of this section, the period during which an individual entitled to educational assistance under this chapter may use such individual's entitlement expires at the end of the 10-year period beginning on (1) the date of such individual's last discharge or release from active duty, or, (2) the date of the accrual of such entitlement, whichever is later.

"(b) Except as provided in subsection (e) of this section, the period during which a dependent with entitlement transferred under section 1431 of this title may use such entitlement expires at the end of the 10-year period beginning on the earlier of—

"(1) the date on which the dependent begins to use such entitlement; or

"(2) the same date that applies to the individual from whom the entitlement was transferred.

"(c) In the case of any eligible individual who has been prevented, as determined by the Administrator, from pursuing a program of education under subchapter II or III of this chapter within the 10-year period prescribed by subsection (a) of this section because such individual had not met the nature of discharge requirement of such subchapter before (1) the nature of such discharge or release was changed by appropriate authority, or (2) with respect to educational assistance under subchapter II of this chapter, the Administrator determined, under regulations prescribed by the Administrator, that such discharge or release was under conditions described in section 1411(a)(3) or 1412(a)(3) of this title, such 10-year period shall not run during the period of time that such individual was so prevented from pursuing such program of education.

"(d) In the case of an individual eligible for educational assistance under the provisions of this chapter who, after such individual's last discharge or release from active duty, was detained by a foreign government or power, the 10-year period described in subsection (a) of this section shall not run (1) while such individual is so detained, or (2) during any period immediately following such individual's release from such detention during which such individual is hospitalized at a military, civilian, or Veterans' Administration medical facility.

"(e) In the case of an individual eligible for educational assistance under this chapter (including a dependent to whom entitlement under this chapter has been transferred pursuant to section 1431 of this title)—

"(1) who was prevented from pursuing such individual's chosen program of education before the expiration of the 10-year period for use of entitlement under this chapter otherwise applicable under this section because of a physical or mental disability which was not the result of the individual's own willful misconduct, and

"(2) who applies for an extension of such 10-year period within one year after (A) the last day of such period, or (B) the last day on which such individual was so prevented from pursuing such program, whichever is later, such 10-year period shall not run with respect to such individual during the period of time that such individual was so prevented from pursuing such program and such 10-year period will again begin running on the first day following such individuals recovery from such disability on which it is reasonably feasible, as determined under regulations which the Administrator shall prescribe, for such individual to initiate or resume pursuit of a program of education with educational assistance under this chapter.

"(f)(1) If an individual eligible for educational assistance under this chapter (including an individual to whom entitlement has been transferred) is enrolled under this chapter in an educational institution regularly operated on the quarter or semester system and the period of such individual's entitlement under this chapter would, under this section, expire during a quarter or semester, such period shall be extended to the end of such quarter or semester.

"(2) If an individual eligible for educational assistance under this chapter (including an individual to whom entitlement has been transferred) is enrolled under this chapter in an educational institution regularly operated on the quarter or semester system and the period of such individual's entitlement under this chapter would, under this section, expire after a major of the course is completed, such period shall be extended to the end of the course or for 12 weeks, whichever is the lesser period of extension.

"§ 1442. Limitation on educational assistance for certain individuals

"(a) In the case of an individual entitled to educational assistance under this chapter (including an individual to whom such entitlement has been transferred) who is pursuing a program of education—

"(1) while on active duty; or

"(2) on less than a half-time basis, the amount of the monthly educational assistance allowance payable to such individual under this chapter is the amount determined under subsection (b) of this section.

"(b) The amount of the educational assistance allowance payable to an individual described in subsection (a) of this section is the lesser of (1) the amount of the educational assistance allowance otherwise payable to such individual under this chapter, or (2) the established charges for tuition and fees that the educational institution involved requires similarly circumstanced nonveterans enrolled in the same program to pay.

"§ 1443. Bar to duplication of educational assistance benefits

"(a) An individual entitled to educational assistance under a program established by this chapter (including an individual to whom such entitlement has been transferred) who is also eligible for educational assistance under a program under chapter 31, 32, 34, or 35 of this title or under chapter 106 or 107 of title 10 may not receive assistance under both programs concurrently but shall elect (in such form and manner as the Administrator may prescribe) under which program to receive educational assistance.

"(b) A period of service counted for purposes of repayment under section 902 of the Department of Defense Authorization Act, 1981 (10 U.S.C. 2141 note), of an education loan may not also be counted for purposes of entitlement to educational assistance under this chapter.

"§ 1444. Program administration

"(a) Except as otherwise provided in this chapter, the provisions of sections 1663, 1670, 1671, 1673, 1674, 1676, 1682(g), and 1683 of this title and the provisions of subchapters I and II of chapter 36 of this title (with the exception of sections 1777, 1780(a)(5), 1780(b), 1786, 1787, and 1792 of such chapter) shall be applicable to the provision of educational assistance under this chapter. The term 'eligible veteran', as used in those provisions, shall be deemed to include an individual who is eligible for educational assistance under this chapter.

"(b) An educational assistance allowance for any period may not be paid to an individual enrolled in or pursuing a program of education under this chapter until the Administrator has received—

"(1) from such individual a certification as to such individual's actual attendance during such period; and

"(2) from the educational institution a certification, or an endorsement of the individual's certificate, that such individual was enrolled in and pursuing a program of education during such period.
